Immigration officials say limited resources had forced them to adopt a "pecking order" of immigrant criminals to detain. But John P. Torres, director of detention and deportation operations at the immigration agency, said it had stepped up screening in city and county jails, focusing on the centers with large numbers of immigrants.

Despite the political furor, there have been no moves to curtail prison terms for illegal immigrants or to deport them before they finish serving their sentences, corrections officials said.

In some states, the agency has signed agreements with corrections departments to let prison staff members screen immigrant inmates. Immigration agents then place "holds" on the immigrants to be deported when they are released.

Now the bottleneck is detention space. A center with 340 beds in Aurora, a Denver suburb, is for all the detained immigrants from Colorado, Idaho, Montana and Wyoming, all with booming immigrant populations.

The center is run by the Geo Group of Boca Raton, Fla., a large company in the prison industry. Detainees said the center was clean and orderly. But they live in bunk barracks with at least 24 people to a room, and overcrowding often forces them to sleep in plastic cradles on the floor.

Criminal immigrants are held in a separate wing, with mauve walls. One inmate, María del Carmen Ramírez, 29, said immigration agents determined she had no legal documents in a screening in a county jail. Ms. Ramírez said she had worked for 12 years cleaning the houses of wealthy people in Denver.

"I'm here illegally, like every other Mexican," she said.

She had thrown a punch at her husband in a feud, she said, and he had called the police.

"I didn't hurt an American," Ms. Ramírez said. "I hit one of my own people."

Now scheduled for deportation, Ms. Ramírez said she would leave behind three young children.

In Colorado, sympathy for immigrants like Ms. Ramírez is dwindling. In 2006, the State Legislature adopted six bills that focused on illegal immigration. They include a law that requires the police to report suspected illegal immigrants to immigration authorities if they are arrested for any crime other than minor traffic violations or domestic violence.

Another measure that Gov. Bill Owens signed last week created a State Patrol unit of 24 officers to combat smuggling.

Republican lawmakers joined with former Gov. Richard D. Lamm, a Democrat, in a campaign to place an item on the ballot in November to bar illegal immigrants from using any state public service, except emergency medical care and public schools.

"We've got enough of our own homegrown criminals," Mr. Lamm said. "Why are we importing more?"

Seeking A Safer Border Crossing; In D.C., Protest Bricks Put To Work (WSJ)

A MEATY ISSUE: A cursory look at census data show immigration patterns now affect many rural areas. In Iowa, to take an example used by blogger Brendan Nyhan last week1, the proportion of foreign-born residents surged in the 2000 Census, making the state home to the 10th-fastest growing immigrant population. But what are they doing there in Iowa?

This week Mr. Nyhan revisits the Iowa example and, with the help of two researchers, determines that Hispanic Hawkeyes tend to follow2 the meat-packing industry. Using a graph of Hispanic population growth since 1990, which is rendered as a sleek topographical map of the state, Mr. Nyhan provides visual evidence that Iowa's Hispanics are most prevalent around major meatpacking plants3.

"Given that many of the Latinos taking the dangerous, grueling jobs in meatpacking facilities are likely to be undocumented immigrants," he concludes, "it's not surprising that Iowans are concerned about the issue of illegal immigration."

But just how dangerous are those meatpacking jobs? On the left-leaning academic blog Crooked Timber, political scientist Henry Farrell catches two major publications at odds4 over conditions at the same North Carolina slaughterhouse.

In the Economist this week, Smithfield Foods' massive Tar Heel plant is heralded as American Dream job for illegal immigrant Alberto Queiroz -- a far cry from the sort of 19th century nightmare depicted in Upton Sinclair's "The Jungle." "Wages of more than $10 an hour enabled [Mr. Queiroz] to buy a house back in Mexico," the magazine attests5. "Cutting up pigs was easier than picking blueberries … because he did not have to toil under the sun all day."

In the New York Times, as Mr. Farrell notes, op-ed columnist Bob Herbert takes a much more critical view6 of the exact same meatpacking plant. Smithfield, he writes this week, is "a case study in both the butchering of hogs (some 32,000 are slaughtered there each day) and the systematic exploitation of vulnerable workers." Most of the plant's 5,500 workers are Latino or black, Mr. Herbert writes, and attempts to unionize Smithfield to provide workplace protections have been repeatedly suppressed. * * *

DEADLY JOURNEY: For some immigrants, the long journey from Mexico to the U.S. "will lead either to a more promising life or an ugly death," writes Dudley Althaus in the Houston Chronicle. A record number of migrants died7 trying to enter the U.S. from the Mexican border last year, he reports, with more than 200 fatalities in Arizona's desert borderlands. More than 100 have been found dead so far this year during what some call "the season of death."

"The great majority of people who come don't comprehend the heat," says Francisco Garcia, who runs a Roman Catholic migrant shelter in Altar, Mexico. "They think they are going to be walking in the shade of the trees. But there are no trees here."

Volunteers in Arizona are trying to prevent these deaths8 by placing water tanks in the desert outside of Tucson. The water stations are marked by blue flags and can be found in areas where the most illegal immigrants have died. "We try to save people from dying from dehydration," said Paula Mich, a volunteer with Humane Borders. * * *

A HOME IN HOUSTON: Many homesick Argentines who flocked to U.S. cities like Miami, Los Angeles and New York during their country's economic collapse are heading home again. But Houston appears to have a greater hold9 on this immigrant group, especially those who came here with a job or started their own business, writes Jenalia Moreno in the Houston Chronicle. "We came to establish roots. We didn't come here to return," says home builder Alejandro Prebisch.

In the wake of Argentina's economic turmoil, about 4,000 Argentines landed in Houston, more than doubling that community's population, Ricardo Gauthier, the Argentine consul general in Houston, says in the article.

Unlike other Argentines who left home with little planning, migrants to Houston obtained work permits, finding jobs at the Texas Medical Center, the energy industry or schools, says Mark Jones, a political science professor at Rice University.

"You don't come to Houston for the weather, and not for the scenery," said Lucy Keeper, a local real-estate agent who moved to the city from Argentina four decades ago. "You come here because you know there's an opportunity to work." * * *

ENTER AT YOUR OWN RISK: Some Texas ranchers tired of repairing cattle fences damaged by illegal U.S.-Mexico border crossers have installed an easier route -- ladders10. "It's an attempt to get them to use the ladders instead of tearing the fences," said ranch owner Scott Pattinson. But the ladders may look too good to be true. "They ignore it a lot," says Paul Johnson, who owns an exotic game ranch along the Texas border. "They're afraid that they're monitored by the Border Patrol."

Rancher Michael Vickers has taken a harsher approach, and says he has 220 volts of electricity coursing through his fence. "I've had a dose of it myself, it's not fun," he said. "That's just my attitude, why make it easier for them to trespass?" * * *

SOCRATIC METHOD: Classicist Victor Davis Hanson, writing in the Washington Times, looks to Socrates for wisdom11 in the immigration debate. The great Athenian philosopher accepted death by hemlock under his city's laws rather than make an easy escape to exile -- arguing, as Plato tells us, that a consensual society cannot afford to have its members pick and choose which laws to obey.

"Yet few have criticized illegal immigration solely because millions have, with impunity, flouted the law," Mr. Hanson writes. "But Socrates would do just that, and also point to our hypocrisy." Employers are just as liable under this Socratic standard as Mexican migrants, on Mr. Hanson's view: "The employer expects trespassing laws to be enforced to keep vagrants off his premises, but then assumes the same vigilant police will ignore the illegal status of his cheap labor force." * * *

PARSING PENCE: Mark Kirkorian, writing in the National Review, examines a little known but potentially influential attempt to stake out the middle ground12 in the political debate over immigration -- this time from conservative Rep. Mike Pence13 (R., Ind.). "It starts out well enough," says Mr. Kirkorian of the four-step plan. "The first step is securing the border, and he included the entire enforcement bill passed by the House in December (with two minor modifications) in his measure."

From there, in Mr. Kirkorian's analysis, things fall apart. The second step, a rejection of amnesty, flies in the face of step three: a guest-worker program "explicitly designed to allow all illegal aliens to keep their jobs and domiciles in the United States without interruption."

"Step four really takes the cake: a promise -- really, truly, cross-my-heart-and-hope-to-die -- to enforce the ban on hiring illegals in the future," Mr. Kirkorian writes. "This is exactly the bait-and-switch Congress perpetrated in 1986 -- legalization first, enforcement later (i.e., never)." * * *

COMES AT A COST: Students in Round Rock, Texas, a suburb near Austin, are still dealing with the consequences14 from the immigration protest of March. "Across the country, educators punished protesters with detention, suspension, and even canceled their extracurricular activities. But some school districts got the police involved," writes Kris Axtman in the Christian Science Monitor. Students, like Jennifer Avilez, were arrested and issued tickets for violating truancy laws, a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of up to $500, the article says. More than 100 students in Round Rock have decided to either pay a fine or do community service. The other 98 have requested trials.

But a city free-speech ordinance makes the issue unique. Violators must show beyond a reasonable doubt that they were actually exercising their right to assemble, "and not just running roughshod through the city," writes Eric Poteet, with the Round Rock Police Department. He says that only a certain percentage of marchers were actually protesting immigration reform. "The rest were just skipping school." * * *

STRANDED AT THE ALTAR: During one of the busiest months for marriages, wedding plans are on hold15 for 10,000 U.S. citizens seeking visas for their foreign brides and grooms, according to an Associated Press article. Spurred by stories of mail-order brides being abused by their American husbands, Congress approved new protections for the women in December. But the new forms weren't available until March 6. The applications in question are being held because they don't address new visa requirements that help determine the criminal history of potential spouses. "We were ready to get married this year, but I can't really make a date until we get the approval," said Bill Hall, 41, a construction foreman from Burlington, Vt., who applied for visas for his Canadian fiancée and her two sons. * * *

BAD FOR THE JEWS? In a freewheeling op-ed published in the Forward, Stephen Steinlight makes the case that illegal immigration is indeed bad for the Jews16 -- and everyone else. Mr. Steinlight, a policy analyst at the pro-enforcement Center for Immigration Studies and a Jew himself, warns that "massive immigration will obliterate Jewish power by shrinking our percentage of the population -- to a fraction of 1% in 20 years." Moreover, he tackles the assumption that Latino newcomers are little different that the waves of Jewish immigrants of the 20th century: "Jews were refugees and asylum seekers escaping religious persecution, tyranny and pogroms," Mr. Steinlight asserts. "Most immigrants, by contrast, are not refugees: They come to make money."

If Jewish Americans want to truly honor their immigrant heritage, they should do so by improving U.S. support for persecuted refugees and legal immigrants, he concludes, "not by pushing for legislation that betrays America's workers, devastates America's poor, exploits Mexicans, threatens America's social cohesion and endangers Jewish interests." * * *

SPECIAL DELIVERY: Remember Send-A-Brick.com17, the online campaign that hopes to demonstrate support for a wall along the Mexican border by mailing bricks to politicians? (See earlier coverage18.) At least one part of official Washington has taken note of the campaign. Earlier this month, the Architect of the Capital's office hauled some 2,100 bricks away, according to a report in the Christian Science Monitor19. A spokeswoman at the Architect of the Capitol's office told Border Lines that the bricks were donated to a Washington, D.C., nonprofit organization for public projects.

Big Cities Balk Over Illegal Migrants (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, June 20, 2006

CHICAGO — Despite a federal effort to enlist help from local police to catch illegal immigrants, some of the USA's biggest cities are declining to enforce immigration laws.

Police chiefs, mayors and city councils are ordering local cops not to get involved as federal agents crack down on people in the country illegally.

“Vulnerable people have always needed to see the police as being there to protect and serve, and that can't happen when the first words out of a cop's mouth are, ‘I need to see your papers,' ” Minneapolis Mayor R.T. Rybak said.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement has been visiting police conventions in an effort to have departments join a voluntary program. ICE has trained officers in seven jurisdictions to identify, process and detain illegal immigrants, said Robert Hines, who heads the program started in 1996. Participants include state police in Alabama and Florida, the Arizona corrections department and sheriff's departments in San Bernardino, Los Angeles and Riverside counties in California and Mecklenburg County, N.C.

Several jurisdictions have refused to help. Chicago police and city workers are prohibited from asking immigrants about their legal status. Rybak asked ICE agents last month to stop identifying themselves as “police.” New York City's public hospitals promised last month that they would keep secret an immigrant's legal status.

In the broadest signal of opposition, a national group representing 57 big-city police chiefs warned this month that local enforcement of federal immigration laws would “undermine trust and cooperation” among immigrants.

The Major Cities Chiefs Association said in recommendations to President Bush and Congress that police have long worked with federal agents to pursue illegal immigrants suspected of crimes. The group said helping identify those suspected only of being in the USA illegally could backfire.

“We have spent many years … getting special communities to talk to us, to report crime, to be witnesses,” said Houston Police Chief Harold Hurtt. “If we stop individuals (to ask about immigration status), we would lose all of that.”

The association — including police chiefs from Los Angeles, Detroit, Seattle and Miami — said most departments can't afford to spend time quizzing immigrants. Members fear that “the call for local enforcement of immigration laws signals the beginning of a trend towards local police agencies being asked to enter other areas of federal regulation or enforcement.”

Hines said, “The cooperation we get for the most part is outstanding.” Illegal immigration “is all of our problem, because these people are here in violation of law.”

Immigration Consensus (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Finally a consensus has been reached on immigration. No, not among politicians, who can't agree on a rational immigration reform. The agreement is among professional economists.

In an open letter to President Bush and Congress last week, more than 500 prominent economists, including five Nobel laureates, proclaim that "immigration has been a net gain for American citizens." The letter adds that "while a small percentage of native-born Americans may be harmed by immigration, vastly more Americans benefit from the contributions that immigrants make to the economy, including lower consumer prices. As with trade in goods and services, gains from immigration outweigh the losses." Alan Greenspan often made this same point about the benefits of immigration while he was Federal Reserve Chairman.

What is striking about this immigration letter is that it is signed by economists from different fields of research, political affiliations and ideologies. It is possible that no other issue in the economic field, with the exception of the benefits of free trade, inspires such unanimity of professional opinion as immigration does.

Several years ago the Cato Institute surveyed the past presidents of the American Economic Association and the past chairmen of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. Eighty percent agreed that immigration has had "a very favorable impact on the nation's economic growth," and 70% said that even illegal immigrant workers "have a positive economic impact." These experts agree that on balance immigrants don't displace native workers, depress wages or abuse welfare. If only these economic facts could break through an immigration debate that is dominated by emotion and political fear.

TAX:

Executive Accused Of Tax Fraud And Witness Intimidation (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

The owner of the nation's largest computerized machine tool maker was arrested yesterday morning at his California home and charged with orchestrating a tax fraud that cost the government nearly $20 million as well as intimidating witnesses and a federal agent investigating the case.

Gene F. Haas, 54, of Camarillo, Calif., the owner of Haas Automation and other companies, was accused in a 52-page indictment of running a bogus invoicing scheme to create fake tax deductions. Mr. Haas was held without bail after his arraignment in Federal District Court in Los Angeles.

In court papers asking that Mr. Haas be held until his trial, the Justice Department said that he could flee the country in his Cessna jet and head for China, where he has business interests. The Justice Department said China did not have a treaty allowing extradition of accused tax cheats. It called him a flight risk, saying he has few ties to the community, is single, has no children and faces about 20 years in prison if convicted.

Haas Automation, in a statement, said that Mr. Haas was not guilty and that the tax issues "revolve around" the company's former chief financial officer, John Phillips. It said the indictment would have no effect on the business.

Last month, Haas Automation won, by default, a lawsuit filed in Ventura County Superior Court accusing Mr. Phillips of cheating the company out of $27.5 million.

The transactions described in that lawsuit are among those listed in the federal indictment, Peter Zierhut, the company spokesman, confirmed.

Mr. Phillips, identified only by his initials in the indictment, went to the F.B.I. in April 2001 and told them that he had been ordered by Mr. Haas eight months earlier to cheat the government out of more than $8.9 million in taxes, the Justice Department said. Mr. Phillips is an unindicted co-conspirator.

The indictment identified Charles W. Todd of Minden, Nev., as the owner of a nonexistent company, Supermill, doing business as American Putter, that was paid $12 million for sham purchase orders and then funneled 98 percent of that back to Mr. Haas. Mr. Todd appeared in Federal District Court in Los Angeles yesterday and agreed to plead guilty to two tax evasion charges, the Justice Department said.

Another man, Kenneth Greene of Simi Valley, Calif., also agreed yesterday to plead guilty over his role in aiding the tax fraud.

Denis A. Dupuis, 51, of Newbury Park, Calif., a former general manager of Haas Automation, and Robert G. Cable, 73, of La Crescenta, Calif., a former salesman for the firm, were indicted, accused of helping fabricate the tax deductions. They were paid about 2 percent of the $23 million in face value of the sham invoices, the indictment said.

The other 98 percent of the money was funneled back to Mr. Haas, according to the indictment. It said Mr. Haas cheated the government out of $12.5 million on his personal tax returns and $7.7 million on Haas Automation's returns in 2000 and 2001.

The indictment also described two other invoicing schemes. One involved a Nascar race team sponsored by Haas Automotive and the other a land title company. The indictment gave few details other than stating that all the money paid in those two schemes was funneled back to Mr. Haas, suggesting that he may have operated them without confederates.

"The tax fraud schemes in this case stem from defendant Haas's dislike of the federal judicial system and anger towards a federal judge (Judge Leonie M. Brinkema) who presided over a patent infringement suit" that Mr. Haas lost in August 2000, according to the court papers. The indictment said that the primary purpose of the "tax fraud schemes was to recoup the patent infringement settlement payment by defrauding" the government.

The Justice Department said that when Mr. Haas learned that Mr. Phillips had gone to the F.B.I., he told him, "Don't make me hurt you." The indictment and related papers cite this as the first of a number of efforts by Mr. Haas and an unnamed private investigator to intimidate witnesses and an Internal Revenue Service special agent, with threats of financial and physical harm for themselves or their families.

The indictment said one witness, a partner with Mr. Phillips in a Kansas flower shop, told the authorities about threats by the private investigator, but she recanted them after developing a "personal relationship" with the private investigator.

Last year, President Bush cited Haas Automation's success in exporting machine tools as a reason to adopt a free trade agreement with Central American countries.

Key House Lawmaker Reveals Estate Tax Plan (AP-Y2)

By Mary Dalrymple

AP2, June 20, 2006

The House's top tax writer revealed a proposal Monday to reduce taxes on inherited estates and rewrite a quirky law that repeals the tax for only one year.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, R-Calif., introduced the bill after Senate Republican leader Bill Frist of Tennessee asked House GOP leaders for help reducing the estate tax before this fall's midterm elections.

Frist lost a bid this month to push forward legislation repealing the tax, unable to overcome opposition from most Democrats and a pair of Republicans.

Under President Bush's first tax cut, the estate tax decreases through the decade as the size of an estate exempt from taxation increases and the top tax rate decreases. This year, $2 million of an individual's estate and $4 million of a couple's is exempt from taxation. The remainder can be taxed at rates as high as 46 percent.

Bush's law abolishes the tax in 2010. But that temporary law expires a year later, and the estate tax reappears. Without a new law, an individual's exemption falls to $1 million and tax rates increase to 55 percent in 2011.

Thomas would instead increase the exemption to $5 million per person, or $10 million per couple, beginning in 2010. A surviving spouse could use any portion of the $5 million exemption not used by his or her deceased spouse.

Estates worth up to $25 million would be taxed at rates equal to capital gains rates, currently 15 percent. Estates worth $25 million or more would be taxed at rates twice those in place for capital gains, currently 30 percent.

The structure of the proposal matches one advanced in the Senate by Jon Kyl, an Arizona Republican who has worked for a year to try to strike a compromise with Democrats interested in lowering estate tax rates.

Kyl, however, proposed taxing estates worth up to $30 million, instead of $25 million, at capital gains tax rates. Thomas also included a new deduction for capital gains on timber in his bill.

Frist has said he wants to see a bill completed by the end of the month, before lawmakers recess to celebrate Independence Day.

House Republicans May Settle For A Muted Estate-Tax Reduction (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- In what could be a big step toward lowering estate taxes, House Republicans will vote this week on compromise legislation that would eliminate the levy for all but the richest Americans.

House approval of the proposal would likely force a vote on similar legislation in the Senate, where Republicans and Democrats have been at loggerheads over the tax for years. House leaders in the past had said they would settle for nothing short of full repeal.

House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas of California introduced legislation yesterday evening that would reduce the number of Americans subject to the estate tax by raising the per-person threshold for the tax to estates valued at more than $5 million beginning in 2010.

Mr. Thomas would set the tax rate for estates valued at less than $25 million to the capital-gains rate, currently 15%. The value of estates above $25 million would be taxed at a rate equal to twice the capital-gains rate. The new legislation would retain the "step up" in basis and would unify the estate, gift and generation-skipping transfer taxes.

To appeal to a few key Senate Democrats, Mr. Thomas included incentives for the timber industry. The legislation includes a new 60% deduction for qualified timber capital gains. House Republicans would like to approve the legislation this week, so the Senate would have time for a vote this summer.

The House has approved a full repeal of the estate tax several times. But in the Senate, Democrats have prevented Republicans from getting the 60 votes needed to overcome a filibuster. In a test vote earlier this month, the Senate fell three votes short.

When compromise talks between Republicans and Democrats in the Senate failed to yield results, Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee asked his House counterpart, Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, to propose a deal that could clear both chambers.

The specifics of the plan are less important than the fact that House leaders have decided to move forward with something less than full repeal. The shift represents the changing dynamic in Washington. Though Republicans have a majority in both houses of Congress, the party is expected to lose seats in the November elections. As a result, many Republican leaders believe now is the best chance to permanently reduce estate taxes.

Congress enacted a temporary phaseout of the estate tax when President Bush took office in 2001, but tax rates will snap back to as high as 55% when the bill expires in 2011. Under current law, $2 million of an estate is exempted from estate taxes for an individual, $4 million for a couple. The tax rate is now as high as 47%.

About 12,600 estates will be subject to estate taxes for the 2006 filing season, according to the Tax Policy Center.

Mr. Thomas's legislation aims to pick up the three Democratic votes in the Senate needed for passage. Republicans hope the plan can win the support of a few Senate Democrats who voted against full repeal earlier this month.

The new House bill tracks a proposal from Arizona Republican Sen. Jon Kyl, which would exempt all but 3,600 estates from the tax, the Tax Policy Center estimates. Mr. Kyl's plan would cost the government $275 billion over the next decade, according to his office.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Tanker Inquiry Finds Rumsfeld's Attention Was Elsewhere (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The topic was the largest defense procurement scandal in recent decades, and the two investigators for the Pentagon's inspector general in Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's office on April 1, 2005, asked the secretary to raise his hand and swear to tell the truth.

Rumsfeld agreed but complained. "I find it strange," he said to the investigators, on the grounds that as a government official "the laws apply to me" anyway.

It was a bumpy start to an odd interview, as Rumsfeld cited poor memory, loose office procedures, and a general distraction with "the wars" in Iraq and Afghanistan to explain why he was unsure how his department came to nearly squander $30 billion leasing several hundred new tanker aircraft that its own experts had decided were not needed.

Then-Inspector General Joseph E. Schmitz, who resigned last year to take a job with a defense contractor, told senators at a June 2005 hearing that the transcript of Rumsfeld's interview was deleted from his 256-page report on the tanker lease scandal because Rumsfeld had not said anything relevant.

But a copy of the transcript, obtained recently by The Washington Post under the Freedom of Information Act after a year-long wait, says a lot about how little of Rumsfeld's attention has been focused on weapons-buying -- a function that consumes nearly a fifth of the $410 billion defense budget, exclusive of expenditures in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The issue is relevant because a series of reports, including others by the inspector general and by the Government Accountability Office, indicate that five years into the Bush administration, the department's system of buying new weapons is broken and dysfunctional.

"DOD is simply not positioned to deliver high-quality products in a timely and cost-effective fashion," the comptroller general of the United States, David M. Walker, said in a little-noticed April 5 critique. The Pentagon, he said, has "a long-standing track record of over-promising and un-delivering with virtual impunity."

Walker based his blistering assessment on a detailed study of 52 different weapons costing a total of $850 billion, including five new multibillion-dollar weapons systems with cost overruns amounting to nearly 30 percent. "The all too-frequent result is that large and expensive programs are continually rebaselined, cut back or even scrapped after years of failing to achieve promised capability," he said. "A lot of it is because in the past, where there have been unacceptable outcomes, there hasn't been any accountability."

Some of the blame, Walker suggested, should be laid at Rumsfeld's office, which "does not seem to be pushing" for the dramatic overhaul of the Pentagon's system needs.

The tanker procurement scandal is the poster child for these problems. The Air Force in 2004 canceled its plan to lease the tankers from the Boeing Co., amid allegations of improper collusion with the company. Former Air Force procurement officer Darleen A. Druyun and one of the interlocutors at Boeing were sent to prison; subsequent investigations showed that Druyun manipulated other large Air Force contracts to benefit military contractors.

After a Senate investigation unearthed evidence that the tanker purchase was viewed inside the Pentagon as a politically tinged bailout for Boeing, Air Force Secretary James G. Roche and his top acquisitions deputy resigned from government. Boeing's chief executive was replaced, and last month the firm agreed to pay $615 million to settle all liability for the tanker scandal and an unrelated impropriety. It was the largest penalty paid by a defense contractor.

But the scandal never tarnished Rumsfeld, and in the previously undisclosed interview, conducted with principal Deputy General Counsel Daniel J. Dell'Orto at his side, the defense secretary makes clear that he does wars, not defense procurement. As a result, he could not recollect details of what subordinates told him about the tanker lease or what he said to them.

Rumsfeld is a former business executive and White House official who published a set of "Rumsfeld's Rules" that include the injunction: "Be precise -- a lack of precision is dangerous." But when investigators asked him whether he had approved the Boeing tanker lease in May 2003 -- despite widespread violations of Pentagon and government-wide procurement rules along the way -- Rumsfeld said: "I don't remember approving it. But I certainly don't remember not approving it, if you will."

Asked whether his subordinates, including former undersecretary of defense Edward C. "Pete" Aldridge, had accurately invoked Rumsfeld's approval when they signed documents authorizing the Boeing tanker lease to go forward, Rumsfeld said, "I may very well have said yes. I just don't remember. . . . I am not going to sit here and quibble over it." He did say he remembered approving a gun for a tank in 1976, during his first time as defense secretary.

When pressed about the tanker lease -- the largest such lease in U.S. history -- Rumsfeld offered two explanations for his distance from it. The first was related to his focus on what he called "the global war on terror," including the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, and what he termed the "continuing difficulties" with the Taliban and al-Qaeda.

"My time basically in the department was focused on those things and certainly not on acquisitions or -- or what have you," Rumsfeld said. "Basically I spend an overwhelming portion of my time with the combatant commanders and functioning as the link between the president . . . and the combatant commanders conducting the wars."

Asked if he was aware of concerns about the proposed Air Force lease from Capitol Hill and the Pentagon's own analysts, Rumsfeld responded, "I don't know what I knew then, compared to what I know now. . . . I am not able to go back and say . . . what did I know at a certain moment back in that period."

He also indicated that his office procedures are loose. "I work in here, I am going to guess, 12 hours a day. . . . I also know that people come in and out of this office all the time. Send me memos, half of which I -- are appropriate for me to have, some of which aren't, which I don't read. And call or come in and say I am going to do this or what do you think about that."

Rumsfeld said that given "all of those hours and hours in meetings and questions," he couldn't "say of certain knowledge" whether he provided any guidance about the lease to subordinates. He assumed, he said, that they were following "the normal rules that would apply to what it is they do."

This perplexed one of the investigators, who asked how Rumsfeld knew the information he got about the tankers was reliable if established procurement procedures were not followed. "In terms of knowledge that -- that -- from that period, I am without it," Rumsfeld replied.

The investigators tried a different tack. Tell us, one said, about the extent and nature of conversations with the White House about the tanker lease. The question related to the fact that in 2002 President Bush asked then-White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. to help reach a deal between the Pentagon and Boeing, which had substantial clout on Capitol Hill and was a major contributor to Bush's inaugural celebration.

"I have been told," Rumsfeld said, "that discussions with the president are privileged, and with his immediate staff." Large portions of text on the next five pages of the 38-page interview transcript were blacked out in the copy provided to The Post.

Part of the controversy over the tanker deal involved the department's failure to conduct an "Analysis of Alternatives" -- a routine comparison of options mandated by Pentagon rules before any large-scale weapons acquisition. When one investigator started asking about this, Rumsfeld demurred. "You are way out of my league on all of this," he said.

Rumsfeld went on to express frustration that some lawmakers responded to the scandal by blocking the promotions or new appointments of those involved. "We have practically no one left on the civilian side of the Air Force. . . . And the . . . damage that was done by the way this was handled has been terrible." Fortunately, he added, the lease "did not go through" because of "people in the Senate and others, whistleblowers, or whoever did what they did."

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman responded about two weeks ago that Rumsfeld views his role as setting top-level policy and keeping abreast of acquisition issues, not becoming involved in "day-to-day programmatic decisions." He created a video message stressing the importance of ethics in weapons-buying, Whitman said.

But in the past six years, while Rumsfeld occasionally mentioned procurement problems in his public appearances, he delivered only one major speech about the need for reform in how the Pentagon buys weapons. He complained in the speech that "our financial systems are decades old" and noted estimates that "we cannot track $2.3 trillion in transactions." He also said that the acquisition process was being improved and that "we now budget based on realistic estimates."

Rumsfeld's speech was delivered on Sept. 10, 2001.

Rice's Top Deputy To Leave State Department (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, one of the administration's most prominent figures in foreign and economic policy, said yesterday that he is resigning to join the Wall Street investment firm Goldman Sachs Group Inc.

Zoellick's interest in leaving his high-profile post had long been rumored, but it leaves a large hole in Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's foreign policy team. Zoellick spearheaded efforts to end the violence in Sudan's Darfur region and was the administration's main interlocutor in the delicate relationship between the United States and China.

In a ceremony in the Benjamin Franklin Room of the State Department, Rice said she was "deeply honored" that Zoellick had agreed to be her deputy and was making the announcement "not without considerable sadness."

In a one-hour interview Friday, Zoellick, 52, said he was leaving 16 months after he started because he had accomplished his objective of helping Rice set up her management team and get her tenure as secretary of state off to a fast start.

"The secretary is clearly up and running quite well," Zoellick said. "We now have a very good team, a team considered -- false modesty here -- one of the best, if not the best, Cabinet teams around."

Zoellick said he approached Rice early this year and told her that he was ready to move on. He had planned to stay until after Chinese President Hu Jintao visited Washington in April, but his departure was delayed because he became involved in rescuing faltering Darfur peace talks held in Nigeria.

Zoellick also felt that with Rice's key initiatives launched -- and Rice now such a high-profile figure around the globe -- that he would be left with increasingly lower-priority issues.

"We are at a point where with the major initiatives, they really have got to be driven by the secretary, in terms of the conduct of it. It's the way foreign policy works," Zoellick said. "The nature of the deputy job is you get a smorgasbord of what I'll call the second- and third- and fourth-order issues."

Zoellick handled less of the day-to-day management of State than his predecessor, Richard L. Armitage, and instead was given a meaty portfolio of foreign policy issues. Besides China and Sudan, they included Latin America, Southeast Asia, and economic and political reform in the Middle East.

Even the two issues for which he is best known -- Sudan and China -- have reached a certain plateau, Zoellick said. With the signing of the Darfur Peace Agreement by at least one rebel group, the focus will be on the implementation of the pact, he said. On China, Zoellick held a series of high-level talks with Chinese officials and in a major speech last year reframed U.S. policy and put forth the idea that the United States wanted China to be a "responsible stakeholder" in the world.

"This is not activity that will be solved in one year or two years," he said.

During President Bush's first term, Zoellick served as U.S. trade representative, a Cabinet position. After the president's reelection, Zoellick appeared on track to be selected as Bush's nominee as World Bank president when Rice unexpectedly approached him about the deputy secretary's job. (Former deputy secretary of defense Paul Wolfowitz instead got the World Bank post.)

Zoellick took the sub-Cabinet post with some misgivings, and there was little expectation he would stay a full four years. He recently has been mentioned for other Cabinet posts such as energy or Treasury secretary. Bush last month nominated Goldman Sachs chief Henry Paulson as Treasury secretary.

Zoellick said he is helping Paulson, an old friend, with the transition to Treasury, including assistance in hiring a staff. Zoellick will be a managing director and vice chairman of Goldman Sachs's international division.

Zoellick had a long association with Rice. He and two other top Rice aides, Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns and Counselor Philip Zelikow, worked closely with Rice on the reunification of Germany during the administration of George H.W. Bush. Zoellick at the time was a top aide to Secretary of State James A. Baker III while Rice, Burns and Zelikow worked on the National Security Council staff.

As trade representative, Zoellick forged close connections in Congress and with economic officials around the world, filling in a gap in Rice's background. He also brought State Department experience from his period with Baker, whom Rice viewed as one of her models for running the department, though Zoellick is no fan of the State Department bureaucracy.

Zoellick said he and Rice had a "very comfortable relationship" and he provided counsel on a range of matters. "I can almost read sometimes where she is a little uncomfortable on something so I can make a push," he said.

Randall L. Tobias, director of U.S. foreign assistance and former chief executive of Eli Lilly & Co., and Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert M. Kimmitt are potential candidates to succeed Zoellick. Kimmitt, however, may have been politically damaged by his involvement in the decision to approve the controversial sale of U.S. port operations to a Dubai-based company.

Burns also is frequently mentioned but appears unlikely to make the final cut because he is a career Foreign Service officer and not a political appointee.

Zoellick To Quit State Department For Goldman (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Susanne Craig

WASHINGTON -- Robert Zoellick, the State Department's No. 2 diplomat and lead voice on China policy, will leave next month to join Goldman Sachs Group Inc. as vice chairman, international.

Mr. Zoellick's departure will leave a vacuum in the Bush administration's China team, which Mr. Zoellick has led since early last year, while further burnishing Goldman's image as a mixing bowl for past and future top government officials. President Bush recently picked Goldman Sachs Chief Executive Henry Paulson as his next Treasury secretary. Former President Bill Clinton's Treasury chief, Robert Rubin, hailed from the same New York firm.

In his resignation letter, Mr. Zoellick said he was particularly proud of having "reframed" the administration's approach toward China. In a speech last summer, Mr. Zoellick called on China to become a "responsible stakeholder" in the international system. He also led a series of high-level dialogues between Washington and Beijing.

The former U.S. trade representative led a complex effort to stop the war in the western Sudanese region of Darfur. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice praised Mr. Zoellick as her "alter ego" but hasn't immediately named a successor.

U.S. officials say the likeliest candidates to succeed Mr. Zoellick are Nicholas Burns, the State Department's current No. 3 and an important player on Iran and India policy; Robert Kimmitt, deputy Treasury secretary; and Philip Zelikow, a special adviser to Ms. Rice.

Mr. Burns, a longtime foreign-service officer and former State Department spokesman, has become more active on many fronts than Mr. Zoellick was and is close to Ms. Rice.

Mr. Zoellick will join Goldman in September as a managing director and chairman of the firm's international advisers. In an internal memo sent to employees yesterday, incoming Goldman Sachs Chief Executive and Chairman Lloyd C. Blankfein said Mr. Zoellick will play a central role in advising Goldman on the firm's global strategy.

"Secretary Zoellick brings tremendous experience and judgment to the firm," said Mr. Blankfein, currently Goldman's president and chief operating officer. "His extensive knowledge of international affairs will be of great importance to the firm as we continue to expand our business around the world."

No. 2 State Department Official Resigns To Join Wall Street Firm (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick said Monday that he would be leaving his post as the State Department's second in command, as expected, to join the Wall Street investment house Goldman Sachs Group Inc. as a managing director.

Bush administration officials said the search was now on to find a replacement for Mr. Zoellick, a six- year administration veteran who spent his first four years as the United States trade representative.

R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, who is the department's third-ranking official, would be the logical front-runner for the job. Administration officials say Robert M. Kimmitt, the deputy Treasury secretary, is also in the running.

Mr. Burns, while close to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, is a career Foreign Service officer whose rise accelerated during the Clinton administration, when he served on the staff of the National Security Council, as State Department spokesman and as ambassador to Greece. He was appointed the American representative to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization during President Bush's first term.

Mr. Kimmitt, a former American ambassador to Germany, served in several posts in the administration of President Bush's father, including under secretary of state for political affairs.

He is widely respected in Washington, but some administration officials worry that Senate confirmation might be made difficult by his role in a decision this year to allow a company owned by the emirate of Dubai to take over operations at five American ports. The company, Dubai Ports, pulled out of the deal after it was denounced by Congressional Republicans as well as Democrats.

The departure of Mr. Zoellick has been widely anticipated. He was considered for Treasury secretary, but President Bush nominated Henry M. Paulson Jr., chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs.

During an interview on Friday, Mr. Zoellick said he had wanted the Treasury job but added that he understood why Mr. Bush had made the decision he did. "If it were a choice between Hank Paulson and me, I'd choose Hank Paulson," he said.

As Ms. Rice's deputy, Mr. Zoellick was the primary architect of the administration's policy toward Sudan and particularly the response to the crisis in Darfur. In May at talks in Abuja, Nigeria, he pushed Darfur's rebel leaders to sign a peace accord.

He was known in Sudan for understanding the many facets of the country and its people, reciting tribal names, affiliations and political leanings.

He is widely considered to be one of the administration's most experienced foreign policy hands.

But Mr. Zoellick's years as trade representative are regarded as more notable than his time at the State Department. He successfully managed the start of the world trade negotiations, still under way, that are meant to lower tariffs on manufacturing products and, more significantly, to reduce agriculture subsidies.

Mr. Zoellick also successfully managed the deeply divisive fight in Congress to obtain "fast track" authority for Mr. Bush to negotiate trade pacts that Congress can approve or reject but not amend.

As the trade representative, Mr. Zoellick worked closely with officials from developing countries. One of the first things he did in the job was to reaffirm a late policy shift by the Clinton administration that put the need for access to cheaper AIDS drugs in poor countries above the desires of American drug companies seeking to protect their patents.

Mr. Zoellick said he expected to stay on the job at the State Department until the middle of July.

Zoellick Takes Senior Post At Goldman (FT)

By Edward Alden

Financial Times, June 20, 2006

Robert Zoellick, US deputy secretary of state and former US trade representative, announced on Monday he would leave the government to take up a senior post at Goldman Sachs.

His resignation to take the job of vice-chairman, international, for Goldman Sachs is the latest in a string of departures of long-serving officials from the administration of President George W. Bush. These have included Andrew Card, White House chief of staff, and John Snow, Treasury secretary.

Mr Zoellick had been telling friends and colleagues for several months that he was preparing to leave the government after more than six years in the Bush administration but that he might stay if he were offered the Treasury job.

Mr Zoellick told the Financial Times he had hoped to be named Treasury secretary but never expected it. He praised the nomination of Hank Paulson, former chief executive of Goldman Sachs, who is now awaiting Senate confirmation. “If I had a choice between Hank Paulson and me, I’d choose Hank Paulson,” he said.

Mr Zoellick, who served four years as US trade representative before joining the State Department in February 2005, said he was leaving the department with a strong team in place and the issues under his direct responsibility well in hand. “The things I could do at the deputy level I feel I have accomplished,” he said.

Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, praised him as “one of my closest and most valued advisers on every single international issue”. She made no announcement on a replacement.

During his time at the State Department, Mr Zoellick led US efforts to respond to the crisis in Darfur, helping to negotiate a peace agreement in Sudan last month. He also played a big role in US relations with China, spelling out the administration’s approach in a speech last year in which he called for China to be-come a “responsible stakeholder” in the international system. Mr Zoellick served in the state and Treasury departments under President George H. W. Bush and was executive vice-president at Fannie Mae, the US mortgage group, from 1993 to 1997.

His move to Goldman Sachs continues the revolving door between the US’s most prestigious investment bank and Washington. He will rejoin – though probably only temporarily – John Rogers, his former state and Treasury department colleague who is Mr Paulson’s chief of staff and is likely to accompany Mr Paulson to Treasury.

Goldman said Mr Zoellick would “play a central role in advising the firm on its global strategy in both developing and developed markets”.

There are no clear indications of who might be named to succeed Mr Zoellick at the State Department. Nicholas Burns, the under-secretary of state for political affairs, is thought to be a frontrunner, as is Bob Kimmitt, deputy Treasury secretary.

State's Zoellick Resigns (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

Deputy Secretary of State Robert B. Zoellick, who has played a key role in the Bush administration on issues ranging from global trade to Sudan's civil war, announced yesterday that he will leave his post to take a top Wall Street job.

The decision by Mr. Zoellick, the top aide to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, was widely expected after President Bush last month named Goldman Sachs Chairman Henry M. Paulson to replace departing Treasury Secretary John W. Snow -- a job for which Mr. Zoellick also had been a candidate.

Ironically, the 52-year-old Mr. Zoellick has been hired by Mr. Paulson's old firm and will chair Goldman Sachs' international operations when he steps down, probably next month.

Miss Rice praised her deputy, saying at a State Department press briefing that she had worked closely with him since the first days of the Bush presidency, when she was national security adviser and he was U.S. trade representative.

"You have helped to guide American diplomacy with principle and prudence at a time when there are few precedents for action," she said.

Mr. Zoellick told reporters he happily would have accepted the Treasury post, but praised the choice of Mr. Paulson and said his decision to leave after more than five years in the administration was "independent of that."

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Mr. Zoellick "has been wanting to pursue options in the private sector, and now he's doing it."

Neither Miss Rice nor Mr. Zoellick would speculate publicly on who might take over the deputy secretary's post. Among those mentioned in the early handicapping are former pharmaceutical executive Randall Tobias, recently named to a new post as overseer of all U.S. aid programs, and Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, the department's No. 3 official.

Mr. Zoellick's selection by Miss Rice in early 2005 was seen as a victory for foreign-policy "realists" in the administration against the hard-line diplomacy favored by Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who were said to back State Department arms chief John R. Bolton. Mr. Bush used a recess appointment to make Mr. Bolton ambassador to the United Nations after a deadlocked Senate failed to confirm him.

Popular on Capitol Hill, the brainy, demanding Mr. Zoellick took charge of some major portfolios under Miss Rice, notably the strategic dialogue with Beijing and the crisis in Sudan's Darfur region. He also served as an economic aide under the first President Bush.

Darfur activists give him credit with pushing the negotiations that produced a cease-fire last month between the Sudanese government and the main faction of the largest rebel group.

But he was a less colorful figure than his outspoken predecessor, Richard Armitage, who was close politically and personally to former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell.

It was Mr. Burns who took the lead on several high-profile issues in recent days, notably the drive against Iran's nuclear programs and the talks that produced a major new nuclear accord with India.

Mr. Zoellick received relatively strong marks as U.S. trade representative, signing a number of bilateral free-trade deals and pushing for open global markets by helping to start the current "Doha round" of trade talks.

But Miss Rice teased her strait-laced, Harvard-educated deputy yesterday over a widely reprinted photo of Mr. Zoellick cradling a panda cub during one of his trips to China.

"We needed a deputy who would get up his courage, roll up his sleeves, and occasionally even hug a panda," she said.

Zoellick, State Dept.'s Strategist On Darfur And China, To Resign (LAT)

By Doyle McManus

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The No. 2 official in the State Department, Robert B. Zoellick, announced Monday that he is resigning, leaving his role as point man on U.S. efforts to end the violence in Sudan's Darfur region and on U.S. policy toward China.

Zoellick said he is quitting the job of deputy secretary of State after 16 months to join the New York-based investment firm Goldman Sachs.

"I've accomplished what I've set out to do and it's time for me to step down," Zoellick told reporters, noting that he worked in the Bush administration — first as U.S. trade representative, a Cabinet position, then as deputy to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice — for more than five years.

Zoellick, a hard-driving man with a reputation as a brilliant policy strategist in the administration of President Bush's father, worked on the mission of ending the violence in Darfur, where more than 180,000 civilians have been killed as a byproduct of fighting between rebels and the Sudanese government.

He traveled frequently to Africa and, aides said, delayed his resignation to fly to Nigeria last month to help push one of Darfur's rebel factions to sign a peace accord.

Rice has not decided who will inherit Zoellick's responsibilities for the Darfur issue and has not settled on a nominee for his job as deputy secretary of State, said a senior State Department official, who, like others, spoke on condition of anonymity while discussing internal deliberations. Officials said Rice's director of foreign aid programs, Randall L. Tobias, is a leading candidate.

Zoellick said Monday that the U.S. had done everything it could to stop the violence in Darfur. "That isn't to say that I'm not heartbroken by seeing the things that happen" there, he said in an interview on "The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer," a Public Broadcasting Service show.

"There's a lot of follow-up work to do," he acknowledged. "This peace accord … is just an opening…. There's no doubt that it's going to take a long time."

In addition to Darfur, Zoellick also oversaw the administration's complex relationship with China, and prided himself on coining a term for the role the United States has urged Beijing to play: a "responsible stakeholder" in world affairs. The American business term "stakeholder" kept Chinese translators busy for months with its ambiguity — just as Zoellick hoped it would, another official said.

Rice, in a public statement accepting Zoellick's resignation, praised him as "a seasoned diplomat [and] a masterful strategist … a deputy who would get up his courage and roll up his sleeves and occasionally even hug a panda."

She was referring to an incident last year when, on a visit to China, the normally stiff Zoellick was suddenly presented by Chinese officials with a live baby panda. (It was a double-edged honor; "panda-hugger" is conservative jargon for a U.S. official who has gone soft on Beijing.)

Friends said Zoellick, who served in the Treasury and State departments in the administration of former President George H.W. Bush, would have stayed in government if the current president had named him Treasury secretary when that job became open earlier this year.

Zoellick acknowledged that he would have been enticed by the job. "If you're someone like me who is interested in public service, those are attractive possibilities," he told reporters.

But he said he had decided to leave the State Department months ago, and was not leaving because he did not get the Cabinet post.

Bush nominated Goldman Sachs chairman Henry M. Paulson Jr. for the Treasury job last month.

"I certainly knew I'd always be a contender [for the job], as the president and others told me, but … if I were the president, and I had a choice in Hank Paulson, I'd pick Hank Paulson," Zoellick said.

Paulson's old firm, Goldman Sachs, said Zoellick would carry the title, "vice chairman, international," and advise the investment bank on global strategy.

Polygraph Test Results Vary Among Agencies (WP)

By Shankar Vedantam

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

The National Security Agency denied a top-secret clearance to David Vermette this year after two polygraph tests. But the computer programmer still has access to sensitive, classified information -- from the CIA, which independently cleared him after administering its own "lie detector" test.

The FBI recently ran a background check on Wayne Johnson, which led to a five-year extension of his top-secret White House clearance. But when Johnson applied for a job at the FBI itself, the agency made him an offer -- then rescinded it after a polygraph exam.

The Defense Department has long issued Tara Wilk a top-secret clearance. But when Wilk tried to get similar clearance from the NSA, she failed three tests -- leaving her so frustrated she sought help from a hypnotist and a therapist.

In a region where a security clearance is a necessary ticket to countless jobs with the federal government and its thousands of contractors, it is not hard to find people caught in turf wars over clearance. Polygraph tests are often at the root of the problem.

"The CIA doesn't respect the NSA's polygraph and the NSA doesn't respect the CIA's polygraph," said Wilk, a computer engineer from Arnold, Md. "Nobody knows who the boss is, and they all think they are the most important."

The government recognizes the problem and plans to harmonize the process across the intelligence community, but Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte cannot say when that will happen, said spokesman John Callahan. "The goal is to streamline and fix things and make things better," he said.

"The legislation which founded the DNI actually requires the DNI have as one of its goals to unify this process," he said.

Even those who believe in the value of polygraphs acknowledge that they are far from objective. Using a polygraph device, which measures changes in heart rate and breathing as well as other cues to detect anxiety, is like searching in a dark room for an object whose shape is unknown. It is the examiner's job not only to figure out if someone is a spy but also to search for character flaws or past actions -- drug use, for instance -- that might make a person unfit to handle sensitive information.

Since polygraph examiners typically do not know what to look for in a candidate, they tend to home in on anything that hints at reticence or nervousness, said John Sullivan, who spent three decades at the CIA administering the tests and still supports them. During his career, he said, he used the tests to unmask seven double agents and spotted numerous criminal and character problems.

But Sullivan said that after the agency's polygraphers failed for years to detect the duplicity of Aldrich H. Ames, who compromised dozens of CIA operations by passing information to the Soviet Union before being sent to prison in 1994, agency examiners ratcheted up the level of intimidation during tests.

Sullivan believes polygraphers can elicit useful information without resorting to threats and harassment. But after Ames's case, he said, CIA examiners were told that if their subjects did not complain about rough handling, the examiners probably were not doing their job correctly: "People in many cases are too aggressive . . . we were so afraid of getting beat."

Asked why examiners disagree with one another, Sullivan said that interpreting polygraphs is more "art than science" and that examiners at different agencies range from "Rembrandts" to "finger-painters."

"I myself and most of my colleagues caught people who passed other people's polygraph examinations," said Sullivan, who is retired. "I don't want to disparage anyone else's program, but I really feel up until Ames, [the CIA] had the best polygraph program in the government."

Paul Gimigliano, a CIA spokesman, declined to discuss individual cases. But he said that "large numbers of highly qualified officers" have been cleared and hired after the agency's polygraph tests.

Don Weber, an NSA spokesman, also would not discuss individual cases but said the agency issues clearances based on approvals by other agencies. Slightly more than one in five contractor clearances last year were issued this way, he said. A number of factors influence why the NSA thinks more security procedures are needed for some people, he said.

Vermette, the computer programmer, said the six exams he has taken for three agencies have left him scared, angry and dubious.

Besides being asked whether he had ever revealed classified information, Vermette was quizzed about whether he had paid for sex or had gotten a woman drunk to seduce her. Examiners asked about his computer use, his contacts with foreign students and his volunteer work with junior high students at church -- down to a high-five he had given one teenager.

Vermette describes himself as naturally nervous and said he grew more flustered with each exam. After the second CIA polygraph test, he was called in to see a higher official, who said he wanted to talk "man to man."

After telling Vermette that "there's no way you are not lying to me," the examiner pressed him on whether he was sexually involved with the teenager at church. The examiner then asked Vermette about her bra size. When Vermette said he did not know, the examiner asked him to guess -- after explaining bra sizes.

"He gave me a list of numbers to choose from, and I gave up and guessed one. Then he went on to ask about hair color, eye color, height and weight, all of which I am sure are absolutely vital to national security," Vermette wrote in an account of the episode. "I felt bad afterwards that I answered any of these questions but was under extreme psychological pressure and humiliation."

After the interview, Vermette filed a complaint. An investigation ensued, and the CIA apologized in writing, acknowledged that the questions were inappropriate and gave him his security clearances.

But it was not over. Late last year, Vermette's employer decided he ought to get clearances from the NSA as well. Although Vermette had been given top-secret and Sensitive Compartmented Information clearances by the CIA and the National Reconnaissance Office, which operates U.S. reconnaissance satellites, the NSA gave him new polygraph tests.

Vermette said the last straw was being asked by NSA examiners to talk about the incident with the CIA. When he refused and explained that the CIA had apologized for the episode, the NSA denied his clearance -- citing his "failure to cooperate with security processing."

Whereas Vermette found himself caught between agencies, Wayne Johnson said he was snared by seemingly conflicting decisions at the same agency. Johnson was stunned to discover there was a problem with his FBI polygraph test, given that the agency had done a recent background investigation that led to a renewal of his top-secret credentials at the White House.

Like Vermette, Johnson said the polygraph made him nervous, even though he had nothing to hide. When asked about drug use, Johnson, who is black, found himself worrying about stereotypes that link blacks to drug use. Johnson said he had never touched an illegal narcotic but believed his examiner, who is white, did not believe him.

The race question was always at the back of Johnson's mind, he said, and his fears may have shown up on the polygraph -- and perhaps were misinterpreted as a sign of deception.

Paul Bresson, an FBI spokesman, said that he could not discuss any individual case but that in general the White House makes its decisions on clearances after the agency forwards the results of its investigations. When someone seeks employment at the FBI, the agency uses investigative results to draw its own conclusions, he said.

Wilk, who flunked three tests at the NSA despite her security clearance from the Pentagon, said examiners do not seem to realize that innocent people can be nervous.

"People say if you don't have anything to hide you should not be worried, but I have nothing to hide and I am worried," she said. "A citizen's entire means of making a living boils down to answering one stupid question on a polygraph."

When examiners kept telling her she was hiding something, the thought that eventually went through her mind was: "Should I just make something up?"

Cheney Hearts Reporters (Not Really) (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, June 20, 2006

It was another ironic moment in the nation's capital Monday as Vice President Cheney was on hand to present Tom DeFrank, the Washington, D.C., bureau chief for the New York Daily News, with the Gerald R. Ford Prize for Distinguished Reporting on the Presidency. But the irony was muffled since Cheney didn't physically present the award to DeFrank, in a departure from previous years.

Maybe Cheney couldn't bear the thought of handing the award to a journalist whose coverage touched on his waning influence at the White House after the indictment of his former chief of staff, Scooter Libby. One of DeFrank's five stories submitted in the award-winning package began, "The CIA leak scandal has peeled back the veil on the most closely held White House secret of all: the subtle but unmistakable erosion in the bond between President Bush and Vice President Cheney."

The story quoted a longtime Bush associate describing Cheney as "wounded" by the CIA leak scandal and a presidential counselor as saying, "The relationship is not what it was." Cheney aides were "apoplectic" about the story at the time, one source told HOH.

DeFrank didn't mention that story, which was published Nov. 8, 2005, when he accepted the award during a luncheon at the National Press Club. Nor did Cheney, who, according to attendees, was gracious and said nice things about DeFrank.

But although Cheney presented the award to last year's winner, Jackie Calmes of The Wall Street Journal, President Ford's son Jack presented this year's award, the 19th annual.

Adding more intrigue, when the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Library and Museum recently named DeFrank this year's winner, it sent out a press release announcing that Cheney "is scheduled to present the award" to DeFrank at a June 19 luncheon at the press club.

Later, however, the Ford library released another notice clarifying that Cheney "is scheduled to speak" at the awards luncheon.

Though he had nothing but kind words to say Monday about his buddies in the Fourth Estate, Cheney sure didn't pull any punches at last year's awards luncheon, expressing his disdain for journalists when audience members submitted questions to the vice president on note cards.

As someone at the event recalls, one question had to do with the vice president's "ideal for excellence in journalism." With head bowed, Cheney paused and then, according to the source, answered something like, "I guess I'd know what it is if I'd ever seen it."

Ouch — that hurts like a shot in the face.

Condolences. Our condolences to the family and friends of Tony Nardelli, the longtime owner of The Tune Inn on Capitol Hill, who died Monday of cancer.

Tim Gerran, a friend of Nardelli's for nearly 30 years, said he got to know the family when Nardelli's father — who founded The Tune Inn — used to serve him breakfast at the bar back when Gerran lived across the street. Nardelli took over ownership in the early 1990s, according to Gerran.

"Tony's biggest thing was providing a real local bar for people on the Hill," the former Congressional aide-turned-lobbyist said. "It had nothing to do with Congress, nothing to do with anything in the area. He just wanted to be a good neighborhood bar."

Gerran described Nardelli as "a curmudgeon, just like his father," but he said that Nardelli would "give you the shirt off his back" if need be.

"He just made [the bar] a nice, cheap eats-and-drink place for a lot of young people, and a lot of young people went on to great things from here," Gerran said.

Gerran said Nardelli's daughter had just beaten her own battle with cancer and had given birth to boy about a month ago. She named her son after his grandfather.

Nardelli was around 64 years old, according to Gerran.

He's So Hot! Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.) is the newest hottest Senator, according a new poll conducted by the typically heady Web site Politics1.com. In a sampling of local, state and federal officeholders and candidates, Thune ranked fourth "hottest man in U.S. politics."

Among other House Members and Senators who made the cut, Rep. Harold Ford Jr. (D-Tenn.) finished sixth and Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) came in ninth of the 10 hot men in the poll. Though Thune beat his fellow Congressional hotties, the Senator's spokesman still couldn't believe that his boss didn't fare better overall. (The Senator is totally hot, for crying out loud.)

"Fourth?!?!?" an incredulous (and funny) Kyle Downey, Thune's spokesman, asked via e-mail. "What was the margin of error, sample size? This poll has no credibility, clearly they didn't ask Mrs. Thune."

Meanwhile, Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) finished first in the "hottest woman in U.S. politics" contest, besting Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.), who came in second, Rep. Mary Bono (R-Calif.), who finished sixth, and Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), who came in 10th out of 10 finalists. The rest were state and local politicians and candidates.

On the Laugh Circuit. Don't forget to catch Washington Post reporter Juliet Eilperin on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show" tonight. Eilperin will be talking about her new book — which isn't all that funny unless you get big yuks from partisan gridlock — called "Fight Club Politics: How Partisanship Is Poisoning the U.S. House of Representatives."

Eilperin, a former Roll Caller, has been on a whirlwind publicity tour across the country touting her book about how downright nasty Congress has become, but tonight's scheduled appearance, she thinks, takes the cake.

"While I've had a fabulous time speaking about the book in places everywhere from Corte Madera, Calif., to Lawrence, Kan., it's hard to imagine anything better than sitting across the table from Jon Stewart," Eilperin said. "I just have to remember the cardinal rule of 'The Daily Show': he's the one who gets to crack the jokes."

Crowded Agenda, But Few Easy Wins For GOP (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, June 20, 2006

Even as they wade through two weeks of debate over the Iraq war, Republicans also have been charting an aggressive summer to-do list — one they are gambling will be less wishful thinking and more reality as they seek to bolster their résumé of election-year victories.

Majority Republicans know they will need unity in their own party and the support of at least a few Democrats to make significant headway on their priorities in the next five weeks of legislating, a schedule that includes a raft of appropriations measures, the estate tax, line-item veto, executive nominations and outstanding conference reports on pensions, lobby reform and immigration. And the GOP knows that hopes of advancing those bills diminish as the clock ticks toward August and the November election creeps closer.

"It's do-or-die time," acknowledged one senior Senate GOP aide.

A spokeswoman for Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) said the GOP certainly has a lot on its plate this summer, but Republicans have become accustomed to trying to advance legislation in a divided chamber. Partisanship over policymaking seems to remain on high, said Amy Call.

"The first six months of the year have been characterized by a lot of progress in a tough year ... but there's a lot left that we'd like to get done," she said.

House Republicans wrapped up last week on a high note, securing bipartisan support for a resolution backing President Bush's policy in Iraq. Senate Republicans hope to do some of the same this week as they complete debate on the fiscal 2007 Defense authorization bill and secure party — and individual Senators' — positions on the conflict.

The Senate kicked off discussions on the Defense measure last week, and if the action on the floor was any indicator, debate this week will be equally charged.

Republicans hope to put Democrats on the defensive on the war, trying to bolster their own anti-terrorism credentials while branding the minority as a "cut and run party." A majority of Democrats in the meantime, will rally around an amendment that calls on the Bush administration to mark the end of 2006 with a beginning of troop withdrawal — knowing that public opinion is riding against Bush's handling of the war.

That amendment offered by Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) will take a more conservative approach than some other Democrats, including presidential aspirants Sens. John Kerry (Mass.) and Russ Feingold (Wis.), are pressing for. Feingold and Kerry want a set deadline for troop redeployment.

Chest pounding on the war aside, Republicans have other priorities for the coming weeks. GOP Senators and aides alike acknowledge they must push hard now if they want to get bills through and have a success-rich platform to take to voters over the August recess and beyond. That includes wrapping up the Defense bill, passing the flag-burning amendment, approving more judicial nominations and, hopefully, a few House-Senate conference agreements.

House Republicans acknowledge they also face a crowded agenda and will make a fast dash over the next two weeks to clear through the Defense authorization measure, the line-item veto and the Voting Rights Act, as well as energy reforms and spending measures. In July, the House is likely to take up matters including health information technology and federal efficiency measures, as well as a consumer protection bill.

But as in the Senate, House Republicans won't leave their base hanging.

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) has pledged to hold a vote on the federal marriage amendment, which failed to meet a procedural test to move forward in the Senate earlier this month. House Republicans also will take on a measure to keep the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Senate Republicans already believe they have padded their campaign credentials with a solid lineup of two years' worth of accomplishments, notably confirmation of two Supreme Court justices and passage of a tax reconciliation bill, class-action reform, last year's energy reform package, and reauthorization of the USA PATRIOT Act and Deficit Reduction Act.

"We've kept people's taxes low and security high," said one GOP Senate staffer. "The voter doesn't distinguish between this year and last year in terms of what's been accomplished."

But, this aided added: "We're going to have to do a lot more and communicate better our accomplishments, and where we want to lead. We have to do that over the next five months."

Don't expect that to be easy, as Democrats will ramp up their own efforts to bolster their agenda and a message that Republicans have forwarded the wrong priorities that have hurt the middle class and favored special interests.

Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.), who is running the campaign of his career to secure the seat given to him earlier this year by now-New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine (D), said atop his list of must-dos this year are energy reform, education initiatives and success in Iraq.

"There are things I'd like to see, but they aren't going to happen," he said.

Sen. Byron Dorgan (N.D.), chairman of the Democratic Policy Committee, said that Frist will spend the coming weeks "putting additional check marks on his agenda." Dorgan said he doesn't "hold out hope" that much will get done beyond the fiscal year spending measures that both parties have an interest in advancing.

But Republicans are far more optimistic. They say even though they face hurdles, they believe they can press ahead on a series of outstanding proposals. July and August should be marked by additional approval of circuit court nominations, a compromise on the end of the estate tax, passage of conference reports on lobby and pension reform and at least a couple of the key appropriations measures — homeland and defense.

The one area that Republicans concede they could fail is on immigration reform, which is stalled as it awaits movement to conference committee. The majority remains divided on the controversial matter that some believe may be too hot to handle this cycle.

Sen. Mel Martinez (R-Fla.), one of the architects of the Senate plan, hasn't lost all hope yet, but he said: "If we don't get the conference committee going in the next month, people recognize it might not get done."

Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.) said Republicans are not naive that there is some heavy lifting ahead. Kyl characterized it as "not a fear, but concern" that Republicans will be able to advance everything they'd like in what's an increasingly shorter period of time.

"A lot of it depends on the schedule," Kyl said. "We could work more days than we are."

Stay tuned.

Democrats Look To Keep Minimum Wage On Table (WSJ)

By David Rogers And Christopher Conkey

WASHINGTON -- Democrats aim to make the minimum wage a maximum political problem for Republicans this election year.

The minority party fired the first shot last week, when the House Appropriations Committee broke with its Republican leadership and approved a $2.10-an-hour increase as part of a spending bill for labor, health and education programs. Speaker Dennis Hastert responded by putting the measure on hold -- possibly until after the election.

But Democrats are poised to come back this morning and offer the same wage amendment as part of a second appropriations bill funding science and law-enforcement agencies.

"I gave the Republicans fair notice that we will attach it to anything we can," said Wisconsin Rep. David Obey, the committee's ranking Democrat. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.) went to the floor of Senate yesterday and proposed to add the same amendment to a pending defense-authorization bill.

"We think it's both the right thing and good politics," said House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D., Md.).

Efforts to raise the minimum wage since 1997 have failed under Republican control of Congress, as business groups oppose the measure and lobbied against it. A group of more than 20 business organizations are fighting an increase this year, as part of the "Coalition for Job Opportunities." One member -- the National Federation of Independent Business, which represents small companies -- says a quarter of its members would have to cut jobs, at a total loss of 217,000 positions, if the federal minimum wage were raised to $6.65.

Despite business opposition, however, 21 states have enacted minimum wages above the $5.15 federal level, and roughly half the population lives in a state that already mandates higher hourly pay.

The last federal increase, signed into law months before the 1996 presidential elections, followed bargaining over tax- and health-insurance-related issues important to Republican conservatives. The same could happen now because the minimum-wage debate is coming to a head even as Republican leaders, already offering concessions to timber interests, are looking for the final Senate votes needed for a compromise on estate-tax relief. While far too early to predict, the party could solve two problems at once by linking the wage and estate-tax issues in an election-year deal.

Discomfort is growing among rank-and-file Republicans, especially as organized labor has mounted ballot issues in various states. Seven Republicans broke ranks with their leadership in the House Appropriations Committee last week, and Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R., Mo.) said her polling on the issue in Missouri -- one of the states with a ballot initiative in the works -- testified to the issue's popularity. "It is a problem," Mr. Hastert said of the pressure now.

In the Senate, the challenge has been to get above the 60 votes needed to limit debate. In the past, Republicans have foiled Mr. Kennedy by offering a parallel amendment with antiunion provisions attached. What is different this year is that some Republicans are looking at an alternative -- that doesn't include the antilabor language and offers a smaller increase. "I would look that over," said Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R., N.H.) and a past chairman of the Senate Health, Education, Labor & Pensions Committee.

Another factor could be Congress's own pay. While the minimum wage has remained frozen, lawmakers' salaries have risen with annual cost-of-living increases keyed to what is given federal employees. And last week's vote in the House Appropriations Committee followed a floor vote days before in which the House cleared the way for members to get another increase valued at thousands of dollars annually.

More Democrats have begun to ask how long the party can go along with such pay adjustments for Congress when Republicans block floor votes on the minimum wage.

"This is a rich man's support club," said Mr. Obey, who voted against this year's increase on the procedural vote. While the details aren't known, Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) is thought to have raised the issue with Mr. Hastert in conversations before the House vote on pay.

Polling for the liberal Democracy Corps has added to the pressure among Democrats. Among test planks for a Democratic platform, one of the most popular -- especially among independents -- is that Democrats would block any pay raise for Congress until the incomes of average workers begin to rise.

"It's a powerful statement, and it shows how out of touch Washington is," said Stan Greenberg of Greenberg Quinlan Rosner Research, who did the Democracy Corps survey. Just as Republicans in 1994 advocated term limits to highlight the arrogance of entrenched power in Congress, he said Democrats should make the link between members' pay and the minimum wage.

Business groups oppose any increase, arguing small businesses will be less willing to hire low-skilled workers if they have to pay more to do so.

Economists generally start from the proposition that increasing the cost of low-skill labor will reduce employer demand, hurting the intended beneficiaries. But they read the evidence on the effect of minimum-wage increases during the booming 1990s differently.

Despite those increases, after years in which inflation had eroded the purchasing power of the minimum wage, hiring was strong across the board and the increases are credited with helping to boost the fortunes of low-paid workers.

That added credibility to an argument made by professors David Card, of the University of California, Berkeley, and Alan B. Krueger, of Princeton University, who have challenged the conventional economic wisdom that higher minimum wages reduce hiring of low-wage workers by comparing the experiences of states that lifted their minimum wages in the early 1990s with those that didn't.

But an economist on the other side of the question, David Neumark of the University of California, Irvine, estimates poverty rates increase between 3% and 4% for every 10% increase in the minimum wage by depressing employment of low-skill workers. "The data are consistent with the idea that the people who are hurt are concentrated in poor families," Mr. Neumark said.

Police Group Wants McKinney Scuffle Probed (AP-Y2)

By Laurie Kellman

AP2, June 19, 2006

Police labor officials, angry over a federal grand jury's refusal to indict Rep. Cynthia McKinney for assaulting a police officer, said Monday said they want the House ethics committee to review her conduct.

And they said the grand jury's decision last week sent the message that "it's okay to hit a police officer."

"We hope that members of Congress will review her actions in light of their rules within their own ethics committee," Andrew Maybo, chairman of the U.S. Capitol Police Labor Committee, told reporters Monday at a news conference in Washington.

Maybo said the Fraternal Order of Police would send a letter later this week to the ethics committee suggesting that McKinney's behavior violated an item in the chamber's ethics manual that calls for members to "conduct (themselves) at all times in a manner which shall reflect creditably on the House of Representatives."

McKinney's spokesman and her lawyer did not immediately return calls for comment.

Such a letter would not trigger an inquiry unless a member of the House authors it, or the chairman and ranking Democrat move to review the matter.

McKinney has not disputed accounts that she hit Officer Paul McKenna May 29 when he tried to stop her from entering a House office building unrecognized. McKenna did not arrest McKinney at the scene.

"Congresswoman McKinney's assault on Officer McKenna was not only unprofessional for her position as a member of Congress, but we believe it puts out the wrong message across America, that it's okay to strike a police officer," said

"It's not okay to strike a police officer, regardless of who you are," he added.

Union Seeks Ethics Probe Of McKinney (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, June 20, 2006

Members of national and local chapters of the Fraternal Order of Police (FOP) expressed anger and disappointment yesterday with the D.C. Office of the Attorney General for refusing to indict Rep. Cynthia McKinney (D-Ga.) for striking a police officer. The union chapters are calling on the House ethics committee to investigate the incident.

“Although she was not indicted by the grand jury, we hope that members of Congress will review her actions in light of their own rules within the ethics committee,” said Andy Maybo, chairman of the U.S. Capitol Police Fraternal Order of Police chapter.

Maybo said he plans to send a letter later this week to the ethics committee, known formally as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, requesting an investigation into the incident.

A spokesman for the ethics committee did not immediately return a call for comment. While it is unclear what House rule the FOP members believe McKinney violated, the first rule in the ethics manual states: “A Member, officer, or employee of the House of Representatives shall conduct himself at all times in a manner which shall reflect creditably on the House of Representatives.”

“Congresswoman McKinney’s assault on Officer [Paul] McKenna was not only unprofessional for her position as a member of Congress, but we believe it puts out the wrong message across America, that it is OK to strike a police officer,” he said.

Lou Cannon, the president of the D.C. Fraternal Order of Police, echoed Maybo’s remarks, adding that regardless of any animosity felt among the officers toward the lawmaker she will still be protected as a member of Congress.

“The United States Capitol Police is a professional law-enforcement organization and will take this in stride, as all police officers have learned to do with unfavorable decisions,” Cannon said. “Rep. McKinney will always be afforded the courtesies of her position by those of us sworn to protect and serve.”

Maybo and Cannon also criticized the timing of the announcement that the grand jury had refused to indict McKinney, which occurred Friday after 5 p.m.

Channing Phillips, a spokesman for U.S. Attorney General Kenneth Wainstein, defended the timing.

“We essentially had no choice,” he said, explaining that a chief judge must review decisions before they are made public.

"The chief judge was not scheduled to accept grand jury returns until 4 [p.m.] on Friday, which is not uncommon because it allows the grand jury to complete its work for the day. … Therefore, Friday's timing was routine," he said.

The Capitol Police commended the professionalism of McKenna and the investigative units of the force that looked into the allegations in a release issued Friday night and said they respect the grand jury's decision.

"The United States Capitol Police respect the decision of the grand jury and appreciate the extensive and thorough investigative work of the United States Attorney's Office," the release said.

Capitol Police spokeswoman Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, who was present at the end of the FOP press conference, declined to comment further on the matter.

On March 30, McKenna stopped McKinney as she entered the Longworth House Office Building. When she failed to respond to a verbal warning, according to reports, McKenna reached out to stop McKinney, who was not wearing congressional identification.

McKinney then struck McKenna with a closed fist holding her cell phone, according to allegations, flashed her congressional identification card and walked away.

A spokesman for McKinney did not return a call for comment by press time.

Milestone For McCrery (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Jim Snyder

The Hill, June 20, 2006

Rep. Jim McCrery's (R-La.) chairmanship of last night's President's Dinner should boost his bid for the Ways and Means Committee gavel, if the past is any indication.

The dinner raised $15 million for the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), exceeding its target by $1 million. The National Republican Senatorial Committee, helmed by Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), raised an additional $12 million.

As chairman of the House efforts for the dinner, one of only two annual fundraising dinners the NRCC puts on, McCrery is following in the steps of Republican congressional stars. Majority Leader John Boehner (Ohio), Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (Calif.), Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton (Texas), Education and the Workforce Committee Chairman Buck McKeon (Calif.) and current Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas (Calif.) all served as fundraising chairmen in the past.

Rainmaking is not the sole factor in determining chairmanships, but senior members are expected to do the heavy lifting moneywise. McCrery, already a fundraising powerhouse this election cycle, raised $1.2 million for last night's dinner.

In the weeks before the dinner, McCrery sought out various groups to help him meet his targets.

Red Cavaney, president and CEO of the American Petroleum Institute, signed on as co-host. In doing so, he committed to raising at least $100,000 from the oil industry. An API spokesman said Cavaney would meet his target, although sources with knowledge of the fundraising efforts said executives from the largest oil companies, despite record profits and being on the hot seat politically, didn't buy as many tickets as projected.

Prices are $2,500 per ticket, or $25,000 for a table. Among the majors, only Chevron put up the full ante.

The National Association of Homebuilders was also a key contributor, as was Billy Tauzin, a former Louisiana Republican lawmaker who now heads the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, or PhRMA. About 25 percent of the fundraising totals came from contributors in McCrery's home state.

In addition, McCrery's political action committee, the Committee for the Preservation of Capitalism, had contributed $525,000 to House and Senate candidates by the most recent filing deadline, at the end of April, according to the Center for Responsive Politics website.

Always a factor, fundraising prowess could be doubly important to McCrery's ambitions because he is not the most senior member in line to run Ways and Means.

His principal opponent, Rep. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.), has been there longer and is raising considerable funds in his own bid. Shaw isn't without obstacles of his own, however, the main one being Democrat Ron Klein, a well-financed state senator who is challenging Shaw's reelection bid.

Klein's campaign has made Shaw's bid for the chairmanship an election issue in the Fort Lauderdale district. That means Klein's campaign circulates copies of almost all the news stories that are reported about the race, which includes anything that mentions McCrery's perceived front-runner status as well as the Louisiana Republican's remarks last week that the House could reconsider an overhaul of Social Security as early as 2007.

McCrery, for his part, remains relatively quiet about his candidacy. He has given the maximum $10,000 to Shaw's reelection campaign, according to the Center for Responsive Politics website.

Shaw had raised almost $2 million through his personal reelection fund as of the last filing deadline, according to the same website, but by contrast, his PAC, the Sunshine PAC, had given only $25,000 in single $1,000 contributions to 25 members of the House. Shaw did make a contribution of $114,000 to the NRCC for last night's dinner, exceeding his expected suggested donation of $100,000.

The Floridian was buoyed by a recent fundraiser headlined by President Bush in Fort Lauderdale. The dinner raised more than $800,000 for Shaw, and the president even mentioned his bid for the Ways and Means chairmanship.

Whatever the outcome of this race, rainmaking has become a necessity for members hoping to rise within the House or committee leadership structure, a trend that former GOP leaders decry.

"I'm sorry it's gotten to that point," said former Minority Leader Bob Michel (R-Ill.). "There was never any consideration for what you were raising for the party" when he was in the House.

"Let the caucus decide if the person is capable," he said.

Neither McCrery nor his supporters nor outside observers say that this or any other race will come down solely to money raised.

"If you raise a lot of money and you have no policy ability, you're not going to win," said John Feehery, a lobbyist with the Motion Picture Association of America and a former spokesman for House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who holds five votes on the 28-member Republican Steering Committee, which chooses chairmen.

"What McCrery has done is shown his ability to step up for the party, and it's going to help him."

Feehery said McCrery's strength as a legislator would be more important in determining the chairmanship than the amount of money he has raised, but his efforts organizing the dinner, which can be a thankless task, are just another bullet point on his résumé.

The dinner "is one of the necessary things you have to do to take the next step. No one wants to chair the President's Dinner," Feehery said.

If McCrery does succeed the outspoken Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), McCrery's understated personality would create a distinctly different dynamic on the committee. Republicans on and off Capitol Hill consider his low-key personality and his work out of the spotlight as a major reason he has been so successful.

"He always has an ability to put his ego to the side," said Dan Mattoon, an influential Republican lobbyist and founder of PodestaMattoon.

But while potential candidates try to position themselves to take over coveted committee slots, they do so quietly or else run the risk of counting chickens before they hatch.

"All three of the top candidates have been mindful that these races should wait until after the election," Mattoon said, including Rep. Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.) as the third candidate vying for the top job.

"Let's take care of business."

Agriculture Official Has Little Time For Flexible Scheduling (WP)

By Stephen Barr

An Agriculture Department undersecretary has canceled certain alternative work schedules for management officials in St. Louis and Washington and told the affected employees to plan on working a traditional eight-hour, five-day-per-week schedule.

"With just over two years remaining to accomplish the agenda that I laid out for Rural Development, I feel that it is necessary and critical to our success that all key management officials are available and accessible on-site each day in order to help us accomplish such a large agenda remaining for Rural Development," Thomas C. Dorr , Agriculture's undersecretary for rural development, told his management team in an e-mail last week.

Dorr's decision underscores the tension inside numerous agencies over flexible work schedules. Many agencies provide such arrangements to help employees balance their work and home lives, but political appointees and senior managers often prefer to have workers in the office and available.

Typically, employees on an alternative work schedule, known as AWS, work longer office hours during certain days of a pay period in exchange for a day off every other week, often a Friday or a Monday.

Dorr gave his management officials 10 days' notice of the schedule change, effective Sunday. That drew a protest from one of his subordinates, who provided the e-mail anonymously, saying he feared retribution.

Dorr "gave no reasonable time for people to adjust their schedules," the employee said in a letter accompanying the e-mail. The employee said Dorr's decision will disrupt carpool schedules, child- and elder-care arrangements, and activities that employees reserve for their days off.

The employee also said Dorr's decision to cancel AWS for Rural Development managers goes against long-standing federal personnel policies, authorized in law, that encourage such schedules.

Ed Loy , press secretary for the Agriculture Department, said: "We need to have the ability to have senior management on a similar and consistent schedule to have the collaboration we need to move forward."

The e-mail by Dorr was prompted by the recent heightened focus on renewable energy sources and biomass research, Loy said. The department's Rural Development offices -- which are helping to promote the president's energy policy -- provide money for loans, grants and technical assistance to rural communities and businesses.

Dorr's action applies to General Schedule 14 and 15 employees and to the Senior Executive Service. Loy said he did not have a count of how many management employees will shift off AWS. Rural Development has about 170 employees who could be affected, out of 1,800 workers in Washington and St. Louis offices.

The Senate confirmed Dorr, an Iowa farmer, in July 2005, ending a four-year battle over his nomination. The Senate vote, 62 to 38, came after he wrote a letter of apology for making what critics called racially insensitive remarks in 1999 and for a controversy that led him to reimburse the government for some federal farm subsidies.Vacation Paperwork Timely paperwork is a key to not losing those precious vacation days, it appears.

Seventeen employees at the Federal Trade Commission recently petitioned to have leave restored, but nine requests were initially denied because their forms for recouping leave took too long to get to the personnel office.

The forms are supposed to be filed at the time staffers are asked to put off their vacations, but that did not happen and many of the employees had more than 100 leave hours at risk of being lost.

The nine affected employees work in the FTC's Bureau of Competition, where vacations go out the window when companies submit merger applications that start a 30-day countdown for a recommendation. Litigation can also eat up staff time and ruin vacation plans, since the agency must respond to court deadlines.

"It is difficult for people to look at their year and plan their leave," said Nancy Ness Judy , the agency's director of public affairs.

FTC managers are holding meetings to resolve the cases of lost leave and get paperwork in order, she said. "These people gave up their vacations to work on litigation, and we want to make sure they are treated fairly," Judy said.

Agents End Up As Drive-By Rescuers To Ex-Federal Official (WP)

By Sue Anne Pressley Montes

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

In a story that perhaps could only happen here, a former assistant treasury secretary in town for a Rhodes Scholar reunion collapsed in Dupont Circle on Saturday morning and was given life-saving treatment by two Secret Service agents, who happened to be driving by.

Curtis Hessler, 62, of Pasadena, Calif., had just crossed Massachusetts Avenue NW with his wife, Christine, when he said, "I'm not feeling well," and slumped to the ground, Christine Hessler said yesterday. He was having trouble breathing. A passerby called 911 on her cellphone.

"We bent down and tried to make him a little more comfortable. Things kept getting worse," Christine Hessler said. "Out of nowhere, this police car pulls up . . . and two officers jumped out and said, 'Can we be of help?' "

The uniformed agents, who are assigned to the Foreign Missions Branch of the agency, were on routine patrol. Trained to assist presidents and embassy officials, they performed CPR and then followed the ambulance to George Washington University Hospital. A D.C. police officer took Christine Hessler and a friend there.

At the hospital, doctors determined that Curtis Hessler had not suffered a full heart attack but rather ventricular tachycardia -- a potentially dangerous rapid heartbeat -- along with a partly blocked artery, and two stents were inserted. The doctors initially were concerned that Hessler had been without oxygen for a period of time.

The two Secret Service agents, who are not identified because of agency policy, stayed with Christine Hessler for a while. The next morning, she arrived at the hospital to find them in the reception area. They jumped up and asked how her husband was, she said, and followed her into his room.

He "smiled and held out his hand," she said. "He realized something had gone on and he was helped. It was one of those very, very special things you don't expect to happen."

Yesterday afternoon, Hessler, chairman and chief executive of 101 Communications, was feeling well enough to sit in a chair and read a book on economics. An assistant treasury secretary during the Carter administration, he said he always admired the Secret Service, which at the time was under the Treasury Department. Now, his feelings are more personal.

"I had a lot of help from a lot of people," Hessler said. "But I do want to thank the two guys from the Secret Service. They went beyond the call of duty."

Justices Fight Back (USAT)

By Tony Mauro

U.S. Supreme Court justices often say they speak only through their decisions. If so, we will be hearing a lot from them in coming days, as the court issues dozens of decisions in its traditional race toward adjournment by the end of June. The court has already made headlines on police searches and environmental law in recent days, and more news will come by month's end on military tribunals for enemy combatants and campaign-finance reform.

But this term, to an unusual degree, justices have also been making headlines off the bench, offering comments that, taken together, have made a powerful case for the independence of the court and the judiciary. After years of being passive punching bags for critics, mainly on the right, justices of all stripes are pushing back, making welcome additions to the public debate.

Consider these recent statements:

· Justice Antonin Scalia last month said he agreed with critics that high court opinions should not rely on foreign laws or court decisions. Even so, he told an audience that included members of Congress, "I don't think it's any of your business." He also opposed pending bills that would ban judicial citation of foreign law.

· Also last month, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg voiced opposition to proposals to create an inspector general to monitor the ethical behavior of federal judges. "That's a really scary idea," Ginsburg said, comparing it to the dark days of the Soviet Union. "The judiciary is under assault in a way that I haven't seen before."

Death threats

· Speaking in the same vein three months earlier, Ginsburg revealed that she and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor had been the targets of death threats from the "irrational fringe" stirred up by critics of the use of foreign law in court rulings.

· In speeches she gave before and after she retired in January, O'Connor responded to critics who were upset with the federal courts for not preventing the death of Terri Schiavo in 2005. "We must be ever vigilant against those who would strong-arm the judiciary into adopting their preferred policies," O'Connor said. Her candid remarks to USA TODAY published earlier this month struck the same theme.

· Justice Anthony Kennedy told Congress to butt out on the question of whether cameras should be allowed in the Supreme Court. "We feel very strongly that this matter should be left to the courts," Kennedy said during a budget hearing in April. Bills have been introduced requiring broadcast access.

Not all the justices' comments are on target. As a red-blooded journalist, I've argued for decades that the court should open its doors to cameras and microphones to give the public a much-needed education about a misunderstood branch of government.

The Supreme Court should take this step on its own, but if it is unwilling, it seems entirely within the power of Congress to require it.

Nonetheless, at least the justices' comments have a consistent theme: This Supreme Court takes a back seat to no other branch, and it is willing to fight for its independence and that of the judiciary as a whole.

Some commentators and editorial writers have harrumphed that the justices should stick to their opinion-writing and limit their public commentary to commencement-speech platitudes. These critics forget what is or should be a cardinal rule of journalism: Never criticize a public official for speaking to the public or the news media. More thoughtfully, some judges have privately expressed concern that by speaking out, the justices might squander the credibility and reputation for impartiality that should be preserved and reserved for their decisions.

Going too far

Certainly there are occasions when a justice can cross the line. For example, in March, in response to a question about the rights of enemy combatants, Scalia alluded to enemy soldiers "shooting at my son," a reference to his son Matthew's service in Iraq as an Army captain. That remark was understandable coming from a father whose son was in harm's way. But it does not instill confidence in the justice's ability to rule impartially in a pending case on that very subject. The impetuous Scalia might also have been wise to refrain from using a dismissive hand gesture — in front of a photographer, no less — when a Boston reporter asked him a question he did not like.

Apart from these indiscretions, there seems to be no reason why justices should not speak out, especially on issues that relate to the role and operation of the judiciary. Judicial canons of ethics allow it.

Borrowing a boxing term, Scalia used to say that judges must use a "rope-a-dope" strategy when criticized — taking the hits without fighting back, until their adversaries wear themselves out. Scalia and several other justices seem to have changed their minds, coming off the ropes and jabbing back.

Whether their adversaries in Congress swing back remains to be seen. But the judiciary and the nation are better off for having a debate in which both sides participate. We see a lot of the justices when they are up for confirmation — most recently, John Roberts and Samuel Alito — and it makes little sense that once they are confirmed and start doing the public's business, they drop out of sight.

In the same way that journalists must shed their vaunted neutrality when freedom of the press is under fire, so too should judges get involved when their authority is threatened. To stay independent, judges should act, and speak, independently.

The Chief Justice Sets A Standard (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

Is there a fight brewing among conservatives on the Supreme Court?

In a speech at Georgetown University law school last month that didn't get as much attention as it deserved, Chief Justice John Roberts laid out an approach to deciding cases that could disappoint those who like their court decisions bold and ideological.

Roberts's view could bring him into conflict with Justice Antonin Scalia, a fellow conservative who is absolutely certain what the Constitution means and is never afraid to say so.

The chief justice's speech defended the virtues of judicial humility: Justices should try to make the narrowest possible rulings and strive for unanimity, or something close to it.

"If it is not necessary to decide more to dispose of a case, in my view it is necessary not to decide more," Roberts said. Thus the Roberts Rule of Orderly Judging: The less the court decides the better.

And there was this corollary: "The broader the agreement among the justices, the more likely it is that the decision is on the narrowest possible ground."

"The rule of law is strengthened," Roberts insisted, "when there is greater coherence and agreement about what the law is."

But common sense can be controversial. Many on both the right and the left think that the purpose of the Supreme Court is to lay out very broad principles and to decide as much as those principles demand -- or permit.

Scalia's theory of "originalism" holds that the one thing that matters is what the writers of the Constitution "originally" meant. That often seems to correlate with what conservatives want to do, although Scalia will occasionally ditch his devotion to originalism if he needs another way to get to a conservative outcome. That's what happened last week in a 5 to 4 decision expanding police search powers. A more libertarian approach, Scalia said, applied "in different contexts and long ago." So much for originalism.

In his 1996 book "Legal Reasoning and Political Conflict," Cass Sunstein, a law professor at the University of Chicago, described Scalia's approach (and that of the late liberal Justice Hugo Black) as placing "a high premium on the creation and application of general rules." Judges, in this view, should "give guidance to lower courts, future legislators, and ordinary citizens through clear, abstract rules laid down in advance of actual applications."

The problem with this, Sunstein argues, is that "rules may misfire, precisely because they are too rigid and . . . can go badly wrong when applied to concrete cases not anticipated when the rule was set down." Broad rulings, Sunstein writes, "tend to overreach."

In the past, judicial overreach was associated with liberals. But with conservatives now enjoying a majority on the Supreme Court -- it's likely to get more conservative if President Bush gets another appointment -- the danger of overreach comes from the right.

It's therefore important that Roberts seems to be setting his face against judicial activism. To propose that court decisions should achieve broad majorities is, in the current circumstance, to tell the court's conservatives that they have an obligation to temper their own passions and reach out to the liberal minority. To get 7 to 2, or 8 to 1, or 9 to 0 decisions, the court would have to avoid far-reaching declarations congenial to conservative doctrine.

Consider how Roberts's approach contrasts with what the court did in Bush v. Gore , the 2000 decision that made George W. Bush president. Justices David Souter and Stephen Breyer were desperately seeking consensus. They agreed with the pro-Bush judges that the recount in Florida should be conducted under uniform standards. But they insisted that Florida be given a chance to have the recount.

The court's narrow and -- let's call it what it was -- partisan majority told Souter and Breyer to get lost. Five justices wanted to end the thing and make Bush president. Imagine how much bitterness would have been avoided (and how respect for the rule of law would have been enhanced) if the court had instead sought, in Roberts's words, "greater coherence and agreement about what the law is."

No one can know how consistently Roberts will apply the principles he laid out in his Georgetown speech. The straight 5-to-4 ideological split last week on police searches was not encouraging. But if Roberts lives up to his Georgetown principles, he will justify all the votes cast for his confirmation by moderates and liberals. More important, he will win a place in history as the chief justice who ended the judicial wars.

The SWAT Syndrome (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

Of all the excuses for weakening the Fourth Amendment, the weirdest was the one offered by Justice Antonin Scalia last week in a Michigan drug case.

He wrote the majority opinion allowing police officers to use evidence found in a home even if they entered without following the venerable rule to knock first and announce themselves. To reassure traditionalists, Scalia declared that unreasonable searches are less of a problem today because of "the increasing professionalism of police forces."

Well, it's true that when police show up at your home in the middle of the night, they're better armed and trained than ever. They now routinely arrive with assault rifles, flash grenades and battering rams.

So if your definition of a professional is a soldier in a war zone, then Scalia is right. The number of paramilitary raids has soared in the past two decades as cities, suburbs and small towns have rushed to assemble their very own SWAT teams.

Some police veterans complain about "militarizing Mayberry," and can't figure out why towns averaging one homicide a decade need paramilitary units. But younger cops like the glamour — our very own SWAT team, just like on TV! Who wants to patrol a beat when you could be playing commando?

And who can resist free gear from Washington? Congress encouraged the SWAT syndrome by directing the Pentagon to give local police departments old machine guns, armed personnel carriers and helicopters. The federal government has also helped subsidize drug raids and encouraged locals to be aggressive by letting them keep a cut of the drug dealers' assets.

The SWAT teams were originally supposed to deal with extraordinary threats, like hostage situations, snipers and heavily armed drug gangs. Since 9/11, of course, they've been justified for combating terrorists. But such situations are so rare that the teams have had to invent new missions to keep busy — and to pay for their operations by finding assets to seize.

Most of the time they're used simply to carry out searches for drugs, often on the basis of dubious tips from informants, often against small-time dealers and other people with no history of violence. The commandos have a proclivity for going to the wrong address, and they tend to be impatient with anything that gets in their way. In articles about SWAT raids, a motif is the shooting of family pets in front of children.

It's hard to know how many botched and unnecessary raids there have been, because police don't systematically track their errors, and the victims often have little recourse. But in a forthcoming report for the Cato Institute, Radley Balko concludes that mistakes have been made in more than 200 raids over the past decade.

He finds that overzealous raiders caused the deaths of a dozen nonviolent offenders, like recreational marijuana smokers and gamblers. In a Virginia suburb of Washington earlier this year, an optometrist being investigated for betting on sports was standing unarmed outside his town house, offering no resistance, when a SWAT officer's rifle discharged and killed him.

Balko also finds that two dozen people died in raids who were not guilty of any crime, like a Mexican immigrant killed by Denver police raiding the wrong home. Some died because they understandably assumed the masked invaders were criminals and picked up weapons to defend themselves. Some were innocent bystanders, like an 11-year-old boy shot in Modesto, Calif., and a 57-year-old woman in Harlem who had a heart attack when police set off a flash grenade during a raid based on a faulty tip.

"Prosecutors typically let police officers off the hook when they mistakenly shoot a civilian," Balko says, "on the theory that mistakes are understandable during the confusion of a raid. Fair enough. But civilians don't get the same deference. My research shows that when someone on the other end of a botched raid mistakes a police officer for an intruder and shoots in self-defense, his odds of facing jail time are about one in two."

The best way to avoid these mistakes would be to save SWAT teams for real crises and let police execute search warrants the old-fashioned way. They could find out, for instance, if they're at the wrong address before anyone pulls the trigger.

But thanks to the Supreme Court, they now have less reason to knock first and shoot later. They can be more professional than ever.

Inflation Fears Hit Wall Street Again As S&P 500 Veers Back Into The Red (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

Stagflation fears reared their heads again, knocking stocks down and sending the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index back into negative territory for 2006.

Worries that persistent inflation could make the Federal Reserve push interest rates too high, stifling economic growth, sent the Dow Jones Industrial Average down 72.44 points, or 0.66%, to 10942.11, its ninth decline in 12 sessions. It is up 2.1% this year, but down 6% since hitting a six-year high May 10. Stagflation is the combination of inflation and a slumping economy.

The S&P 500, however, fell back into the red for the year. It declined 0.91%, or 11.40 points, to 1240.14, off 0.7% since the year began.

Stocks began the day with gains, following advances in several European and developing-country markets. But then Jack Guynn, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, repeated that inflation is too high, which reinforced fears that the Fed could raise interest rates more than once this summer. Higher rates are usually bad for stocks and bonds, because they crimp corporate profits and make existing bonds, with their lower rates, less attractive.

Stocks fell further after the National Association of Home Builders reported that its index of business conditions fell to its lowest level in 11 years. That reinforced fears that Fed rate increases could overshoot the mark, slowing the economy too much and squeezing profits.

"The market has the perspective of a slowing economy, including a slowdown in housing, which certainly has been the engine of growth in the last several years," said Jay Suskind, director of trading at brokerage firm Ryan Beck & Co. in Florham Park, N.J. "It is tough to buy the market right now."

Investors were nervously awaiting today's report on May housing starts.

Oil futures continued to decline, falling 90 cents to $68.98 a barrel, but instead of reassuring investors, that news reinforced concerns about economic weakness. Gold fell $9.20 to $568.80 a troy ounce.

The Nasdaq Composite Index decreased 0.92%, or 19.53 points, finishing at 2110.42, down 4.3% this year. Small stocks led the declines.

Outside the U.S., stocks declined in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, fell 0.53%, or 1.08 points, to 202.37.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.18 billion shares, as 867 stocks rose and 2,461 fell.

Bond prices declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 3/32, or 94 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 5.143%. The 30-year bond was down 4/32 to yield 5.181%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 115.42 yen, up from 115.13, while the euro fell against the dollar to $1.2577 from $1.2639.

Bush Raises $27 Million For GOP (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

President Bush suggested last night that Republicans must remain in control of Congress for the country to effectively combat terrorism and keep the economy healthy, speaking at a $27 million fundraiser meant to provide a needed boost to the campaign war chest of congressional Republicans.

"The most important responsibility we have in Washington is to defend the people of the United States," he said. "When this country sees a threat, we must deal with it before it fully materializes."

Bush addressed about 5,000 of the GOP's strongest supporters at the "President's Dinner," the largest fundraiser of the year for the Republicans' two congressional campaign committees.

Bush said that the "Democrats are good talkers, we're good doers," but generally avoided the harsh language he used to describe the Democrats at last year's dinner, when he urged support for his Social Security plan.

At the Washington Convention Center last night, he defended the decision to invade Iraq and invoked the events of Sept. 11, 2001, to say that the United States must "stay on the offensive" before its enemies "hurt America." He added: "It's important to have members of the United States Congress who will not wave the white flag of surrender in the war on terror."

The amount raised yesterday eclipses the $23 million the committees took at the event last year. The NRCC will receive $15 million of the $27 million, and the National Republican Senatorial Committee will get $12 million.

The infusion of cash could not come at a better time for Republicans, who are defending 35 competitive seats in the November elections, compared with 10 such seats for the Democrats, according to the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. In addition, Democrats this year have been erasing the fundraising advantage the GOP has traditionally held.

As of April 30, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee was trailing its Republican counterpart by $15,000 in cash on hand, a small figure given the GOP's usual advantage. The Democrats' Senate committee had nearly double the available cash on hand as its Republican counterpart.

But Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.), the House chair of the dinner, said in an interview: "I think this dinner is going to reestablish the cash advantage . . . that we've historically had."

McCrery said that "the atmosphere that hung over the political scene was a contributor to members having to make more phone calls to raise money for the dinner." But he added that good news for the president in recent weeks -- successes in Iraq and the clearing of his top adviser, Karl Rove -- encouraged Republicans and led to a spike in ticket-buying.

It cost $2,500 for a ticket to the dinner. Campaign finance regulations allow someone to contribute up to $25,000 per party committee. Last night, for that sum, attendees could be photographed with the president.

Sarah Feinberg, press secretary for the DCCC, said "the reality is" that Republicans are struggling to keep pace with what they have raised in years past while the DCCC "continues to break fundraising records. . . . The American people desperately want change and a new direction in Washington, and they are making that preference abundantly clear by contributing to Democratic campaigns."

But McCrery said the dinner marks a change in that pattern: "Republicans have certainly wrested the momentum from the Democrats."

Bush Helps Republicans Raise Cash (WP/AP)

By Tom Raum, Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush on Monday helped Republicans raise $27 million toward the fall congressional elections, acknowledging that the unfinished war in Iraq remains a top concern in a difficult political season.

"It is important to have members of the United States Congress who will not raise the white flag of surrender in the war on terror," Bush told donors at a fundraiser sponsored by House and Senate GOP campaign committees.

He criticized proposals, such as are being advocated by some leading Democrats in Congress, for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops. "An early withdrawal would be a defeat for the United States," Bush told an audience of about 5,000 attendees at the Washington Convention Center.

Organizers said the event raised $27 million _ $15 million for Senate candidates and $12 million for House candidates.

"We're prepared for an aggressive, effective campaign this year," House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, who spoke before Bush, told the gathering.

Bush told his cheering, well-heeled audience, "We're going to keep the House and we're going to keep the Senate thanks to all of you here."

"We're going to win the war on terror _ if we don't lose our nerve," Bush said.

Polls show declining public support for the war in Iraq, which is weighing down Republicans on the ballot.

But while Republican candidates have been eagerly accepting the fundraising help that Bush can offer, his presence on the campaign trail has not been enthusiastically welcomed by all Republicans, particularly those in tough races.

Democrats have sought to tie Republican candidates to Bush administration policy on the war and on other contentious issues.

"At a time when our troops are fighting bravely in Iraq with no clear plan for victory, and the Republican-led Congress has abandoned much needed comprehensive immigration reform, the president has made raising millions from special interests his number one priority," said Karen Finney, communications director of the Democratic National Committee.

Still, Bush's hand has been strengthened by several weeks of good news from Iraq and domestically.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, speaking of Iraq, told the president, "We will stay with you until our job is done."

"We've got five months to remind Americans why they elected us," Frist added.

Santorum Seeks Jewish Vote In His Tough Nov. Match-up (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 20, 2006

Sen. Rick Santorum is aggressively pursuing support from the Jewish community as his tough November match-up with Democratic state Treasurer Robert Casey Jr. draws closer.

The Republican junior senator from Pennsylvania was scheduled to meet last night at Haverford College with Natan Sharansky, a former Soviet political prisoner who later became deputy prime minister of Israel.

Santorum's forum with the icon of Soviet Jewry was billed as a "conversation" on religious freedom, an issue Santorum has championed as co-chairman of a congressional working group on the subject. It also sent a signal to Israel's most ardent supporters that Santorum is with them.

Sharansky is a powerful symbol of right-wing Israeli politics, and his 2004 book The Case for Democracy: The Power of Freedom to Overcome Tyranny and Terror has been influential among neoconservatives in the Bush administration.

The Haverford event, moderated by leading neoconservative Daniel Pipes, was just the latest example of Santorum playing up his long-standing support for Israel during the campaign season. It will not be the last.

The senator surprised colleagues last week when he unsuccessfully tried to amend a defense authorization bill with a measure designed to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons. The amendment was rejected after the White House and many senators opposed it on the grounds that it could disrupt U.S.-Iranian negotiations.

"The amendment runs counter to our efforts and those of the international community to present Iran with a clear choice regarding their nuclear ambitions," Jeffrey Bergner, assistant secretary of state for legislative affairs, wrote to Armed Services Committee Chairman John Warner (R-Va.). "This amendment, if enacted, would shift unified international attention away from Iran's nuclear activities and create a rift between the U.S. and our closest international partners."

Some in the pro-Israel camp disagreed with Santorum's strategy or timing, but the substance of his amendment has support among hawks. And the episode allowed him to reiterate his tough stance toward Iran, a nation of great concern to Israel and its friends because of its potential nuclear capability.

Hawkish support for Israel figures to help Santorum not only with donors and any remaining undecided voters in Pennsylvania's Jewish community but with his base among evangelical Christian voters, who have increasingly become fierce advocates for Israel in recent years.

Activists in Pennsylvania's Jewish community say that even if Santorum is placing more emphasis on Israel lately his support is nothing new.

"It's not as if he's a Johnny-come-lately to this issue," said Robin Schatz, director of government affairs for the Jewish Federation of Greater Philadelphia. "Senator Santorum has really been a leader in terms of pro-Israel work in the Senate."

Santorum has a Religious Freedom Day celebration planned for today with several lawmakers and a variety of religious leaders. His working group on the topic meets about once a month when the Senate is in session, according to a Senate Republican leadership aide.

"Religious liberty is a huge passion of his because he thinks it's the first right, the first freedom. Without this freedom all the other ones are in trouble," the aide said.

Santorum's worldview embraces Israel as a model for other democracies in the Middle East, according to Ken Davis chairman of the Montgomery County Republican Party in southeastern Pennsylvania.

Davis, a Jewish activist, said Santorum's positions should make him attractive to voters for whom Israel's security is the top issue.

"Those in our community who think for themselves and recognize the importance of the issue will support the senator, and he deserves the support because he's been there all along," Davis said.

But Jewish voters have traditionally sided with Democrats because of their domestic policies, meaning Santorum gets mixed reviews in the Jewish community.

"He's very good on some of the issues that are important to us and not so good on others," Schatz said.

Even if he cannot win over Jews who side with Democrats on domestic issues, Santorum's support for Israel is helping him raise money. He ranks 10th among lawmakers in donations from pro-Israel groups, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, though it is impossible to track money from individual pro-Israel donors accurately.

"His beliefs here are the driving force, not the money — though they are certainly not mutually inconsistent," said G. Terry Madonna, a political scientist at Franklin & Marshall College. "Only about 2 percent of the voters are Jewish — not huge, but they are important disproportionately as funders and fundraisers."

In late April, Santorum sponsored a Senate resolution recognizing Holocaust Remembrance Day, even though it is Pennsylvania's other Republican senator, Arlen Specter, who is Jewish.

Next month he plans to host a "Jewish Leadership Summit" on Capitol Hill to discuss "foreign policy and religious-freedom issues." Invitees include White House Chief of Staff Joshua Bolten, Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard Lugar (R-Ind.), Specter, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Virginia Rep. Eric Cantor, the lone Jewish Republican in the House.

Dean's Brother Raps DSCC Over Stance On Lieberman (RC)

By Nicole Duran

Roll Call, June 20, 2006

Sen. Joe Lieberman's (D-Conn.) refusal to rule out seeking re-election as an Independent should he lose the Aug. 8 Democratic primary has led to a verbal assault by the brother of Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean on Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.).

Democracy for America, the group that grew out of Dean's unsuccessful presidential bid and is now led by his brother, Jim Dean, is circulating a petition to Schumer calling on him to stand by the winner of the Democratic primary.

Democracy for America is backing Lieberman's challenger, millionaire cable-executive Ned Lamont.

Schumer "has said that the DSCC will not rule out supporting Lieberman if he runs as an Independent," a Democracy for America e-mail sent to supporters last week reads. "The DSCC's mission is to elect Democrats to the Senate. Yet in this case, they would prefer to back an incumbent who leaves the party instead of a principled progressive who's proud to be a Democrat."

Schumer has not said what the DSCC would do should Lamont best Lieberman and Lieberman decided to press on as an Independent.

"We'll cross that bridge when we come to it," Schumer told reporters last week.

And that is what has Democracy for America — and Howard Dean's brother — pressing Lieberman and Schumer.

"My reaction to all of this is that there's a lot of mumbling going on here," Jim Dean said in an interview. "We would really like Sen. Lieberman just to get clear about this."

Lieberman told The Hartford Courant Monday that he would not drop out of the Democratic primary but he stopped short of promising anything beyond that.

"I will be in the Democratic primary. I've been a Democrat all my life," Lieberman said. "If the unexpected happened, do I want to keep open the option of taking my case as an Independent Democrat to all the voters of Connecticut so that they can have the last word in November?"

Dean said national Democrats should call upon Lieberman to rule out an Independent bid.

"I wish the Democratic leadership of this party would take this seriously," Dean said. "This is the kind of thing that got us in trouble 15 years ago. The question for the DSCC is: 'do you support Democratic candidates or not?"

DSCC spokesman Phil Singer would not answer the question directly.

"This is much ado about nothing: Joe Lieberman is and will remain a candidate in the Democratic primary," Singer said.

Should Lieberman lose — the latest polls show him comfortably leading Lamont — and should he continue on as an Independent with the DSCC's backing, the DSCC would lose credibility with many Democratic activists, Dean said.

"The battle in this party is not an ideological debate right now it's between the activist community and the culture of supporting incumbents" at all costs, Dean said.

He said that a number of big Democratic donors are unhappy with the DSCC's role, whether overt or behind-the-scenes — in some Senate primaries.

For instance, women's groups openly chided the DSCC for pursuing Pennsylvania state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. and Rep. James Langevin (D-R.I.) as Senate candidates, despite their opposition to abortion rights.

Casey, with the DSCC's help, ultimately became the challenger to Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) while Langevin opted not to take on Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.).

That rift healed but other Democratic activists were furious when national Democrats first courted, then pushed aside, Iraq war veteran Paul Hackett as the chosen Democrat to take on Sen. Mike DeWine (R-Ohio).

"Getting Hackett out was not their best day," Dean said. "It's not a great time for Sen. Schumer to be arbitrarily deciding that it's up to him alone" to decide whom to endorse.

Schumer and other Democratic leaders are undoubtedly in a tough position as they figure out to handle a potential Lieberman Independent candidacy.

It is not unprecedented for the DSCC to support a like-minded Independent. The committee has made no secret that it is backing Rep. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) as he attempts to win the open Senate seat in the Green Mountain State.

In that case, however, Democrats were able to clear the field for Sanders so that no strong Democrat sought the seat.

Sanders caucuses with Democrats in the House and said he would continue to do so if elected to the Senate.

In light of that, Dean said the DSCC should clarify its position on supporting Independents. Dean said he understands that his actions "will ruffle a few feathers" but that it is necessary to ensure that the party has clear policies in such matters.

If Dean's petition drive puts Schumer in a bind, it probably puts the DNC chairman in an even more awkward position.

"I don't really think of that very often because he's kind of on a different mission," Jim Dean said of his brother. "He's not as involved in federal races. He is building the 50-state strategy."

Dean was also careful to reiterate that he and his brother do not discuss business.

DNC spokeswoman Stacie Paxton would only say: "the DNC doesn't get involved in Democratic primaries."

McCain Weighs The Chance To Run Again (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, June 20, 2006

With the US presidential election more than two years away, most contemplating a tilt at the White House are cloaking their ambitions in euphemism and obfuscation.

But in this, as so much else, Senator John McCain is an unusual kind of politician. The Arizona Republican seems positively to relish talking about the prospect he may run in 2008 – even discussing how his family feels about the looming decision.

Mr McCain, who lost his party's nomination to George W. Bush in 2000 after staging a strong challenge, says his children, two still in their teens, would support him but grins that it might "cramp their style". His wife Cindy, on the other hand, "probably needs some more convincing". One of the downsides of the campaign trail, he reflects, is having to take "a lot of shots".

In a wide-ranging interview with the Financial Times, he gives the impression of a man weighing whether his chances of victory are worth the gargantuan effort, especially as, at 69, he would be the oldest ever to enter the White House. He muses: "The major question is, 'Do my talents, experience, and capabilities match up with the priorities of the American people, which mean that I would have a fairly good chance to gain the nomination of my party and win a general election?'"

In a political landscape marked by intense partisan battles, Mr McCain is an anomaly, a man so widely trusted that a recent poll found most Democrats would vote for a candidate he endorsed in the November congressional elections. Tortured by the Vietnamese during five and a half years as a prisoner of war, he has further bolstered his moral authority by taking up the cudgels over issues – notably campaign finance reform and anti-torture legislation – that have won him support far beyond his own party.

Asked to explain his popularity, he says: "I think it is my reputation for independence, for straight talk." Nor is he shy about acknowledging his own charisma. "It sounds very self-serving, but [I have] a little star power. They've seen me on Jon Stewart, Jay Leno, David Letterman, hosting Saturday Night Live . . . "

But of late, the man many Democrats view as the acceptable face of the Republican party appears to have been courting its base, speaking warmly of Mr Bush and making overtures to the religious right, whose support he will need if he is capture the nomination in what promises to be a bitterly fought primary season.

He caught flak for speaking at Liberty University, the conservative institution run by the Reverend Jerry Falwell whom, during the 2000 campaign, he had branded an "agent of intolerance". But he rebuts claims that he is pandering to the religious right, pointing out that he also spoke at New School University, a liberal college.

He says his positions on issues such as torture, climate change and opposition to a proposed constitutional amendment that would abrogate states' rights over permitting gay marriage have not changed. "But I also understand that when you are the 'perceived frontrunner' every phrase is analysed, and every nuance is criticised in some quarters . . . " With a flash of vintage McCain charm he adds: "Still it is nicer to be the 'perceived frontrunner' than the 'perceived loser'."

His ease in discussing his candidacy is equalled by Hillary Clinton's reluctance even to acknowledge her status as the 'perceived' Democrat contender-in-chief. The man who turned down an invitation to be John Kerry's running-mate two years ago is seen as the prospective Republican candidate with the strongest "crossover" appeal to Democrat voters. It is perhaps no coincidence that he seems anxious to go head-to-head with Mrs Clinton, a polarising figure whom some Democrats would be reluctant to support. She "would be very interesting to run against", says Mr McCain. "First woman nominee, very smart, very tough, very principled."

Will the Democrats pick her as their standard-bearer? "Oh yeah. I don't know how she [will not be] the nominee of her party."

In the eyes of many, Mr McCain was a neo-conservative long before the creed became the dominant philosophy of Washington's governing elite. He was one of the small number of Republicans who supported military involvement in Bosnia in 1995 and was urging action to remove Saddam Hussein while Bill Clinton was still in the White House.

But in detailed exchanges about the thorniest foreign policy issues of the day – Iraq, Iran, North Korea – he is prepared to acknowledge that interventionism has its limits, even as he waxes impatient with Mr Bush's willingness to tolerate unpalatable regimes to achieve his foreign policy ends.

On Iraq Mr McCain's views are little different to those of Mrs Clinton. Both supported the war but have been highly critical of the way the Bush administration has managed the peace. On the day the FT spoke to him in his office in the Senate Russell building, Mr McCain had attended a briefing on Iraq by Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, and Donald Rumsfeld, the defence secretary with whom he has an antagonistic relationship.

Asked whether he is any happier with Mr Rumsfeld these days, his reply is crisp: "No." But he stops short of echoing the views of a group of retired generals who recently called for the defence secretary's resignation. "There is no point in me trying to get into an open confrontation with the secretary of defence," says Mr McCain. "It would harm our effort rather than help it."

The conclave with Mr Rumsfeld and Ms Rice followed a rare spate of good news from Iraq: the death of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq who was killed in a US air strike, and the completion of the Iraqi cabinet.

"I think that some of their optimism is understandable, but I hope that it doesn't turn into irrational exuberance because . . . it is still very long, very hard, very tough," cautions Mr McCain. But in contrast to the mass of the war's congressional critics, who are anxious to accelerate the timetable for pulling out some of America's 130,000 troops, Mr McCain argues that the US has too few boots on the ground and is "like the little Dutch boy with his thumb in the dyke". He points to a recent decision to divert troops from Falluja, a former insurgent stronghold, to deal with growing violence in Ramadi. He expresses concern about the mounting pressure on the administration to withdraw troops. But he has faith in Mr Bush, confident that he will not "make that announcement unless conditions on the ground justify it" – which he does not expect to be soon.

"When I hear of a major operation in Baghdad, or in the Sunni triangle, where the only support [the Iraqis] need is US air support, and it is successful, then I will believe that we have made progress," says Mr McCain. "When I can land at the airport at Baghdad and get into a vehicle and drive to the Green Zone, I will believe that we have made progress."

Mr McCain says the mistakes the US has made in Iraq have done significant damage, including emboldening Iran, a country for which he reserves his harshest condemnation.

Mr McCain supports the Bush administration's recent decision to back a package of incentives aimed at persuading Iran to abandon its nuclear programme and chides those who accuse the president of warmongering. "When [Mr Bush] says 'I am not taking the military option off the table', it is because you can't," says Mr McCain. "It doesn't mean you are considering the military option. But suppose we knew that Iran was going to attack Israel, are we saying that we would do nothing? Clearly, we can't do nothing."

Asked whether he believes negotiations with Iran could produce a better outcome than the US has achieved in years of on-again, off-again talks with North Korea, Mr McCain replies that he is an "eternal optimist". But in a clue to his priorities were he to become president, he says that preventing countries from developing nuclear weapons will be one of the century's biggest challenges.

His sense of urgency is underscored by reports that North Korea is preparing to launch a long-range missile with the potential to hit the US. He fears such moves by Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader, will eventually prompt Japan to develop offensive weapons, which he warns could re-ignite hostility between Japan and China.

"The key to all this . . . is China," says Mr McCain. "It is not in China's interest to see this kind of destabilisation. So why they don't put more pressure on the Dear Leader is something I simply do not understand."

He also expresses disappointment in the South Korean government, accusing it of bribing North Korea with its "sunshine policy" of increased economic engagement.

But while Mr McCain would like China to do more, he recognises that the US has little leverage. "Obviously, their exports to our markets are a vital part of their economic engine but, at the same time, [if] you start down this path of retaliation it sometimes lurches out of control," the senator warns.

Another country that receives his opprobrium for its crackdown on democracy is Russia. Relations between Washington and President Vladimir Putin took another turn for the worse last month after US vice-president Dick Cheney rebuked the Kremlin for using energy supplies as "tools of intimidation and blackmail".

Asked whether he was concerned that the US was alienating Russia, whose support is needed in US efforts to press Iran to give up its nuclear programme, he acknowledges that there needs to be a "careful balance". "I would have appreciated the vice-president's speech a lot more if he hadn't gone to Kazakhstan and praised a dictator in that country. His speech lost a little of its impact when he did that," he notes with a touch of irony.

Mr McCain appears to agree with critics of US foreign policy who scent a gap between rhetoric and reality in the Bush administration's approach to undemocratic regimes such as Kazakhstan, Azerbaijan and Saudi Arabia. Nursultan Nazarbayev, the Kazakh president, is expected soon to visit the White House – just months after Ilham Aliyev, the president of Azerbaijan, was hosted by Mr Bush.

In what sounds like his personal foreign policy doctrine, Mr McCain says he understands that there is always a tension between real-politik and a Wilsonian commitment to spreading democracy. But he warns that, "nine times out of 10 when we prop up dictatorial regimes, over time we pay a price for it".

He goes on: "Maybe the message is that we are more selective in our advocacy than perhaps we would like to be. I do think we run a risk. I met with Aliyev before the first election and I said, 'you have to have a free and fair election'. They didn't. In the case of Nazarbayev, these are true cults of personality that we are seeing and those things never last. They end up at some time in the dustbin of history."

Perhaps wary of being seen as embodying the neo-con commitment to removing undemocratic regimes by force, Mr McCain stresses that he does not contemplate military action to overthrow governments.

But he adds: "I believe our advocacy of freedom and democracy should not be defined by either geography or ethnicity." Will he be in a position to implement his philosophy? That may rest on whether an electorate, alarmed by the rising death toll in Iraq, is ready to embrace a man whose belief in spreading the American brand of democracy may exceed even that of George W. Bush.

Poll: Clinton Gets High 'no' Vote For 2008 (CNN)

CNN.com, June 20, 2006

(CNN) -- With the presidential election more than two years away, a CNN poll released Monday suggests that nearly half of Americans would "definitely vote against" Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Respondents were asked whether they would "definitely vote for," "consider voting for," or "definitely vote against" three Democrats and three Republicans who might run for president in 2008.

Regarding potential Democratic candidates, 47 percent of respondents said they would "definitely vote against" both Clinton, the junior senator from New York who is running for re-election this year, and Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the party's candidate in 2004. (Poll)

Forty-eight percent said the same of former Vice President Al Gore, who has repeatedly denied he intends to run again for president.

Among the Republicans, Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani fared better than the Democrats, and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush fared worse.

Only 30 percent said they would "definitely vote against" Giuliani; 34 percent said that of McCain.

As for Bush, brother of the current president, 63 percent said there was no way he would get their vote. The younger Bush has denied interest in running for president in 2008.

Among all choices, Clinton had the highest positive number; of those polled, 22 percent said they would "definitely vote for" her.

Giuliani was next with 19 percent, followed by Gore with 17 percent, Kerry with 14 percent, McCain with 12 percent and Bush at 9 percent.

This telephone poll of 1,001 adult Americans was conducted June 1-6 by Harris Interactive for CNN. The poll had a sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Weekly Wal-Mart Shoppers Are Midterms' NASCAR Dads (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

In 2004, it was NASCAR dads. Before that, soccer moms.

In the upcoming elections, pollster John Zogby says, the parties need look no further than the biggest retail phenomenon in the world — Wal-Mart — for this year's elusive group of swing voters.

Zogby said he has found a direct correlation between how often Wal-Mart customers shop there and how reliably conservative they are. While this group voted overwhelmingly Republican in 2004, it is less entrenched than other conservative groups, and Zogby's numbers indicate it is wavering.

"Wal-Mart is so much more than retail," Zogby said. "It's a religion out there."

According to a study by Scarborough Research, Wal-Mart shoppers are, on the whole, evenly divided between Republican and Democrat. Of those who had shopped at Wal-Mart in the past three months — three-fourths of the sample — 32 percent identified themselves as Republicans and 29 percent as Democrats.

But as the shopping trips to Wal-Mart become more frequent, Zogby said, it's a different story. The more they shop there, the more conservative they've tended to be.

Today those weekly Wal-Mart shoppers are giving Bush a 35 percent approval rating and rate Republicans in Congress 27 percent positive, and 20 percentage points more of them prefer a Democratic-led Congress than prefer a Republican one.

They also rate Democrats better on jobs and the economy, healthcare and taxes. But they still give Republicans higher marks for family values and fighting terrorism, two supposed linchpins of Bush's reelection.

Zogby, who is researching the topic for a book he's writing, said that weekly Wal-Mart shoppers represent about one-fifth of the population and that people who never shop there represent about a quarter, making both groups significant parts of the electorate.

He said that he's still surmising what issues sway weekly Wal-Mart shoppers the most but that he believes the war in Iraq and the economy are likely candidates.

The household income of a "regular" Wal-Mart shopper averages about $35,000 and 57 percent of Southerners shop there regularly, according to a Pew Research Center study. Comparatively, only 24 percent of Northeasterners shop regularly at Wal-Mart, though nearly half stop in "once in a while."

In 2004, NASCAR dads were thought to be a crucial swing vote, although many experts came to express doubt about the theory. In previous elections, it was soccer moms. NASCAR dads were blue-collar white men from rural areas of the South; soccer moms were moderate mothers concerned about healthcare, education and taxes.

There is significant overlap between weekly Wal-Mart shoppers and a group Pew has defined as "pro-government conservatives." According to a study issued after the 2004 election, 1 out of 10 voters falls into this group, which gave Bush 15 percent of his base in 2004. Slightly more than half are Republicans, while another 35 percent identify themselves as Republican-leaning independents.

These Wal-Mart shoppers, for the most part, are conservative on social issues such as gay marriage and abortion and tend to be rural and religious. But they also believe in social programs for the poor, are often poor themselves, don't like Bush's tax cuts and are less supportive of preemptive force and the war in Iraq than other conservatives.

While they voted with Republicans on social issues and national security in the past, they are more susceptible to drifting toward the Democratic column than other conservatives, said Pew Director of Survey Research Scott Keeter.

"We do think that this is a group that potentially is having anxieties economically right now, about healthcare and the like, and while they may be cross-pressured on social issues … right now the economic issues may be more important to them," Keeter said. "And it could be that the war in Iraq is also a source of anxiety because there is at least some evidence that more of the direct impact of people fighting in the war is being felt by people in more rural areas."

According to the Pew study, despite voting 5-1 for Bush in 2004, 38 percent of pro-government conservatives had a positive view of the Democratic Party and more than half like both Bill and Hillary Clinton.

Zogby said the weekly Wal-Mart shoppers and the Pew group are indeed similar.

"'Pro-government conservatives' is very true," Zogby said. "There are all sorts of clusters. But we know where many of them are on a weeknight in America."

Wal-Mart founder Sam Walton was not considered a political man, but the backlash against Wal-Mart's wage levels and benefits, mostly from the left, has made the world's biggest retailer an increasingly hot-button political topic.

Another Zogby poll from late 2005, commissioned by an anti-Wal-Mart website, said more than half of the country thinks Wal-Mart is "bad for America." A Pew poll, released two weeks later, put that number at 24 percent.

Many of Wal-Mart's battles are being fought on the local level, with communities deciding whether to allow the retail giant to build stores in their neighborhoods. But labor, healthcare and other issues have led the company to increase its national political presence considerably over the past decade.

Wal-Mart's contributions to national political candidates have increased steadily in recent years, and Republicans are on the receiving end of most of the giving. In the 2004 election cycle, Wal-Mart's PAC gave more than $1.3 million to Republicans and $370,000 to Democrats. Rep. Phil Gingrey (R-Ga.) received the most, with $17,500, and dozens got $10,000 or more.

Its PAC and employees gave more than $2 million overall to federal candidates and parties, making it the second-biggest miscellaneous business benefactor, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. This cycle it ranks fifth, with more than a half-million dollars in contributions.

Lee Culpepper, Wal-Mart's lead lobbyist in Washington, said Republicans' more favorable attitude toward business and the fact that there are simply more of them in Congress have made them more attractive for PAC contributions.

"When you put those two factors together, it's understandable why you'd have more support for Republicans than Democrats," Culpepper said.

But he said that's changing as the PAC grows. The split is now 71-29 percent in favor of Republicans, down from 93-7 during the 1998 cycle, when it gave just $135,000.

"Our PAC … has been increasing support to Democratic candidates who support business," he said.

Governor's Troubles Threaten G.O.P. In Kentucky (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

FRANKFORT, Ky. — The real risk in noodling, which involves sticking your arm into a catfish nesting hole and yanking out whatever swallows your fist, is not in getting caught doing it out of season, but in reaching too far into the hole and getting snagged by spiny fins.

Just consider the case of Gov. Ernie Fletcher of Kentucky.

A year ago, after being accused of illegally forcing Democrats out of state Civil Service jobs and giving the jobs to political loyalists, Mr. Fletcher, a Republican, dismissed the charges as little worse than noodling in March. (Noodling is legal only from June 1 to Aug. 31.)

But 15 indictments later, Mr. Fletcher's administration — including his self-titled Disciples, accused of being the ringleaders of the patronage scheme — is still feeling the sting as his approval ratings drop below 30 percent.

Most of his former backers, including his mentor, Senator Mitch McConnell, have distanced themselves from him, and Democrats point to the case as another example of Republican corruption and overreach. Mr. Fletcher was indicted on three misdemeanor charges; while on vacation in Florida in early June, he had his lawyer enter a plea of not guilty.

The accusations have threatened to reverse a tide that Republicans in the state have worked for more than a decade to turn in their favor. With the party controlling the State Senate and just shy of a majority in the House, many Republicans viewed Mr. Fletcher's easy victory in 2003 as the dawning of a new political era for the Bluegrass State.

"The state is still potentially a swing state, and this will certainly slow its drift toward Republicanism," said Al Cross, a political writer and professor of journalism at the University of Kentucky. "This is definitely being amplified by what is going on in Washington. We can expect a lot more wind to be in the face of Republicans at a time when the state was trending their way."

To add to his troubles, Mr. Fletcher, the first Republican governor here in more than 30 years, lost a highly public effort to force the chairman of the state Republican Party to step down. In June he fired his fifth press secretary, and in the same week he began warring with his lieutenant governor, Steve Pence, who announced he would not share the ticket with Mr. Fletcher in 2007. Mr. Pence has refused to step down from office despite a request from the governor that he do so.

Mr. Fletcher insists, however, that he is not worried about the fallout.

"I trust that if we keep doing the right thing, our accomplishments will speak for themselves," he said in an interview, citing job growth, tax reform and balancing the budget as his top achievements. "The bottom line is that we're not going to let these folks run us out of town."

Mr. Fletcher contends that the investigation into his office is a partisan witch hunt and that the state's attorney general, Gregory D. Stumbo, a Democrat, has aspirations to run for governor.

The charges against Mr. Fletcher — conspiracy, official misconduct and political discrimination — were brought on May 11. The 14 other members of his administration who have been indicted are charged with a total of 23 felonies and 60 misdemeanors for, among other things, criminal conspiracy and evidence tampering. In August 2005, Mr. Fletcher issued a blanket pardon protecting everyone in his administration but himself from prosecution.

A spokeswoman for Mr. Stumbo, Vicki Glass, dismissed Mr. Fletcher's accusation that there was a political motive for the charges.

"In light of the judge's request that we not talk about the case, we're letting the court proceedings speak for themselves," Ms. Glass said, standing in Mr. Stumbo's office, its walls lined with large bass that the attorney general had caught on fishing trips. While not ruling out a run for governor once his investigation ends, Mr. Stumbo has said he intends to see the case through to conclusion.

Whatever the motivation behind them, the charges have succeeded in tripping up a man with grand political ambitions and the résumé to help him fulfill them.

An ordained minister, a family physician and a former fighter pilot, Mr. Fletcher, who was elected in 2003 by a 10-percentage-point margin, has spent much of his tenure trying to keep his administration in one piece. Of the nine cabinet members who started with him two years ago, only three remain in office. In early June, Mr. Fletcher fired Brett Hall, his fifth press secretary, after Mr. Hall accused leaders of the state Republican Party of scheming to undermine the governor.

Asked what adjectives he would use to describe morale in the administration, Stan Cave, Mr. Fletcher's chief of staff, paused before laughing. "I'm not sure you can print the ones I'd like to choose," Mr. Cave said. "So let's go with angry, frustrated, but still resolved to proceed."

He said that with a grand jury consisting entirely of Democrats and with perceptions of conflict of interest swirling around the case, he did not see how anyone could argue that the investigation was apolitical. The two judges who handled the case early later recused themselves.

But Mark Nickolas, a blogger who runs BluegrassReport.org and is the former campaign manager for Representative Ben Chandler, Mr. Fletcher's opponent in 2003, made just that argument.

"The administration keeps peddling these ludicrous conspiracy theories," Mr. Nickolas said. "Really, what we have here is a microcosm of the Republicans' national problem, which is they play by their own rules even if it's against the law."

The governor is permitted to fill 4,000 political jobs. But the attorney general says Mr. Fletcher sought to fill many of the state's 32,000 merit-based jobs with political allies.

Others say that Mr. Fletcher did what governors have always done, but that his staff made the mistake of leaving an e-mail trail.

"The patronage system was tuned up and well oiled over the last generation and a half," Mr. Hall, the former press secretary, told The Atlanta Journal-Constitution in December.

The Democrats "knew exactly what they were doing," he said. "They were smart enough not to use e-mail. We weren't."

But others say Mr. Fletcher's actions were distinct for their scope and context.

"It's true that the Democrats in the state have greased the machine, but in this case what the Republicans built was a finely tuned hydraulic mechanism," said Professor Cross of the University of Kentucky. "What we are really talking about here is a rare and up-close look at the grease that makes the machinery of politics work."

As a Republican running the executive branch after such a long period of Democratic rule, Mr. Fletcher faced an unusual level of pressure, especially from rural Republicans. Many accusations center on the state's transportation cabinet, partly because in poorer regions of Kentucky, there is no political capital more precious than state positions as road crew supervisors or backhoe operators. The jobs pay well, are relatively secure and require limited qualifications.

Mr. Cross added that Mr. Fletcher had also had trouble taking the political high ground in the case since his main campaign promise was to end the "good ol' boys network" and "clean up the mess in Frankfort" created by the former governor, who left at the end of his term amid a sex scandal.

The problems for Mr. Fletcher started the morning of May 11, 2005, when a former supporter and transportation cabinet official delivered to the attorney general a box with hundreds of pages of printouts of e-mail messages and other documents from Fletcher administration officials.

Featuring a list of Civil Service workers to be fired or exiled because of party affiliation, the documents revealed the existence of 12 officials who called themselves the Disciples and who pursued with religious zeal a systematic plan to clean house of Democrats.

"No one on earth faced more adversity than the Apostles — we should not think we are any different," said one e-mail message between two coordinators of the plan, known as the Governor's Personnel Initiative. "As 'change agents' and 'missionaries' of the governor, our task will not always be embraced by those around us."

Throughout, the two sides fought every step of the way. In a 48-hour standoff on May 13, 2005, armed guards for the transportation cabinet blocked another set of armed guards from the attorney general's office from entering a transportation building to seize records.

On Aug. 29, after the first nine of his administration officials were indicted, Mr. Fletcher issued a blanket pardon covering these officials and anyone else other than himself who might be indicted. A trial date is tentatively set for Nov. 8, the day after the state's general election.

The drama is not without precedent. The last governor, Paul E. Patton, a Democrat, spent most of his last year in office fending off accusations of campaign irregularities, bad press about a lengthy extramarital affair and revelations that several of his employees had used their work computers to view pornography. Before leaving office, Mr. Patton further outraged Kentuckians when he pardoned his chief of staff and three others charged with breaking election laws.

Despite a recent poll that found that 54 percent of the state's voters wanted Mr. Fletcher to resign, he remains upbeat. "Our folks have made some mistakes, and we have made some corrections," he said. "I think we will come through this."

And as for noodling?

"I like fly-fishing, myself," Mr. Fletcher said with a chuckle. "Noodling is risky if you don't want to get stung by catfish whiskers."

The Airbus Debacle (WSJ)

By Richard Aboulafia

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Production delays. Political infighting. Cost and time overruns. Sounds like a typical day at any large aircraft corporation, and last week's news of another big setback for delivering Airbus's A380 550-seat mega-jetliner fits this pattern. Yet the market isn't taking all these problems at the European plane maker in stride, wiping away much of Airbus parent company European Aeronautic Defense and Space Co.'s gains since it was created six years ago. Investors were far more understanding a few years back when Boeing went through similar crises. A double standard? If only it were so.

The biggest problem for Airbus today, to put it gently, is that its superjumbo should never have been born. The A380 program was launched in 2000 in the face of considerable skepticism. Aircraft were getting smaller, not larger. New technologies allowed long-range travel with great economies. Passengers wanted direct flights offering more choices, more often. Airlines wanted smaller planes to get rid of discount travelers. The A380 was a $13 billion bet on a shrinking niche.

Not surprisingly, the giant plane has proven unpopular. In the six years since its birth, it has won 159 orders, including 45 from Emirates, a carrier pursuing the unusual strategy of ordering scores of each type of plane to meet high growth expectations.

In the same period, the mid-sized long-range widebodies, led by Boeing's new high-tech 787, have racked up more than 700 orders. One notch larger, 300/400-seat planes have garnered another 500 orders led by Boeing's 777. The A380/747 niche is 5%-10% of the market by value of total annual deliveries; the smaller widebodies comprise half.

Worse, after securing the small list of customers that actually need a few planes this big, the A380 order book has grown at only a very modest pace for the last four years. Other than Emirates, no airline has ordered more than a token number. The mid-size 250/300-seat market, meanwhile, is gathering steam, with blue-chip carriers such as British Airways, Lufthansa and even Emirates now shopping for new long-range jets in this class.

Airbus is desperately seeking resources to compete with the 787 and 777 with its own new plane. Customers criticized its initial offering, the A350, so it now needs $10 billion to create an all-new family, the A370 series. But money and engineers are tied up in the A380 program. When the superjumbo delay news broke, Singapore Airlines ordered 20 787 "Dreamliners," casting a no-confidence vote in Airbus's ability to fund the A370. Meanwhile, Boeing might follow the 787 with a new narrowbody, necessitating an Airbus response to compete in that 40%-45% of the market.

This means that, with the A380, Airbus is racing to deliver something that's a mere sideshow. The delays are simply bitter icing on an unpalatable cake. * * *

How did this disaster happen? When Airbus was born in 1970, it was a defensive creation, a way for Europe to save its legacy jet industries from U.S. dominance. They pooled their resources with government support and created a European widebody, the A300. The first 20 years weren't easy, but Airbus did much better than other European jetliner projects like the notoriously money-losing Concorde.

Starting in the late 1980s, Airbus moved from defense to offense. It launched the A320 narrowbody and A330/340 widebody families. It helped drive Lockheed and McDonnell Douglas out of the market. By 1997, Airbus and Boeing formed a duopoly. That carried political implications for American-European relations.

Airbus still enjoyed government nurturing. It was the only notable success for publicly funded European industrial policy. European politicians were eager to underwrite and take credit for an impressive achievement. When Airbus created plans for the world's biggest jetliner in the mid-1990s, they knew they could count on government support.

Airbus didn't need to be overly careful with the A380's bottom line. Government launch aid was good for one-third of development costs. These loans were legal under the terms of the U.S.-EU 1992 jetliner aid agreement. Private cash was easier and cheaper to get since investors knew Europe's hapless taxpayers would be the last to be repaid.

If the market for large aircraft looked dubious, well, Airbus proposed duty-free shopping courts and restaurants aboard its new jumbo, unrealistic and borderline-absurd ideas designed to stimulate airline demand. From a business standpoint, this "whole new way to fly" was nonsense. Yet bureaucrats saw national pride at stake, hence a slam-dunk reason to invest public cash. They've basked in reflected glory, with European prime ministers and officials attending every major A380 milestone. Jacques Chirac, the French president, responded to last week's news by expressing "total confidence" in the program. That looks to be wishful thinking from a government that enjoys messing around in its nation's industries.

A board of diverse, apolitical and independent shareholders would never have tolerated the risk associated with such a shallow business case. Here the distinction from Boeing's difficulties becomes apparent.

A few years ago, Boeing looked like it was in Airbus-like dire straits, yet the situation was in fact very different. Before launching the 787 in 2004, Boeing spent eight years shortchanging its product line but returning billions to shareholders. Airbus spent a fortune on its product line, but misinvested horribly, jeopardizing return on investment. Thus, it was easy for Boeing to start raising cash for the 787. Meantime, investor patience with Airbus is running thin, just as its parent company seeks buyers for some of the shares that its major French and German industrial shareholders, Lagardère and DaimlerChrysler respectively, are looking to dispose of. EADS also needs money to buy BAE System's 20% Airbus stake. Adding to EADS's woes, market regulators are investigating large share sales in March, before the A380 news went public, by senior company executives, including the French co-CEO, Noël Forgeard.

Boeing has also suffered technical snags with its jets, most recently its ambitious and risky all-composite body for the 787. But Boeing pursued the right market segment. Even if the 787 stumbles, Boeing would recover, since that plane satisfies strong demand and brings in cash. Airbus, by contrast, is merely racing to build a handful of A380s so it can transfer resources to a more important aircraft.

Airbus faces a difficult path. Even if it can fund a new jet family, it doesn't have much credibility with customers right now. Airbus needs to do a brutally honest assessment of the A380 and determine whether it will ever turn cash positive, and whether it is worth the risk of losing ground in the other 90%-95% of the market for civilian aircraft. Canceling the A380 program altogether should be an option on the table.

Resources and customers need to be found for the A370. Unless it happens fast the program won't get going until after Boeing runs off with the up-front demand. And a chastened Airbus will have learned an important lesson from the A380: Easy public money comes with a high price.

Mr. Aboulafia is vice president of analysis for Teal Group Corp., a Washington-based aerospace and defense consultancy.

Save Our SIPP (NYT)

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

The House Appropriations Committee today will take up a recommendation by President Bush to eliminate a government survey that is arguably the best source of information on the real-world effect of public programs that help the poor.

Established by the Census Bureau in 1984, the Survey of Income and Program Participation, or SIPP, is used extensively by analysts inside and outside the government. Over the decades, its rich detail has been indispensable in determining how well, or poorly, government has performed in critical areas. These include insuring and educating children, moving people from welfare to work and providing food stamps. Killing the survey would create a devastating void in public information starting in 2007. It would take until 2010, at the earliest, to complete an alternative survey. Losing years of reliable data would make it all too easy to base policy decisions on ideology rather than on evidence. The lack of objective data would also make it very difficult to hold politicians accountable for their decisions.

The survey costs all of about $32 million a year. Unless appropriators come up with more, the financing for next year will fall to $3.6 million, a sum mainly intended to finish data gathering that has already been started. Another $5.6 million would be allocated to begin developing the alternative survey.

Representative José Serrano, Democrat of New York, plans to offer an amendment raising the appropriation by an additional $10 million — not enough to keep the survey going strong, but enough to keep it alive for now. Congress should then make it a priority to come up with the full amount needed to save this font of invaluable public information.

Failure In Richmond (WP)

WHAT WAS supposed to happen by March 11 in Virginia finally occurred just this past weekend: Exhausted lawmakers in Richmond reached a budget deal, averting the risk of a shutdown in state government operations at the end of this month. The conferees heaved a sigh of relief at having achieved this basic function of legislative governance after three months in stealth special session. Good for them. We hope they'll excuse the rest of us for issuing a loud Bronx cheer, for in fact they have failed.

Principally, they have failed to address the single most momentous challenge facing the state at the outset of the 21st century, which is the parlous, sclerotic condition of its highways and transit systems. By failing to agree on any long-term, reliable funding to improve the transportation network, they also have failed to ensure the sustainability of Virginia's economic boom. It's not just asphalt they failed to provide; it's jobs, growth and a future.

Blame the Republicans, for this was a fight within and about the state GOP -- between moderate Republicans in the state Senate and fundamentalist anti-tax ideologues in the House of Delegates. So dysfunctional is the Republican Party of Virginia that GOP senators and delegates couldn't even agree on what they were fighting about. Senators, easily the more sensible of the two, were convinced they were haggling over transportation. For delegates, the fight was about proving their dogmatic purity -- and giving an energetic new Democratic governor a black eye in the bargain.

The result is a travesty. State transportation planners have spoken about a minimum need of $1 billion a year in new transportation funding to make improvements, especially for the heavy traffic in Northern Virginia and Tidewater. In the event, the budget, shorn by the House of new taxes and fees, contains barely half that, and only for the next two years -- and even some of that may also be cut if there is no longer-term strategy agreed on by the two houses by this fall. Sadly, the prospects of fashioning any kind of long-term strategy are not good. That is largely because lawmakers from outside Northern Virginia and Tidewater do not feel the pain of the economically dynamic areas of the state.

Of course, the transportation problem is not going away; Virginia has done nothing to increase long-term funding for roads in 20 years, while population and traffic have multiplied. Even the extremists in the House acknowledge that the budget does too little for transportation (though, perversely, they blame the Senate). And all are acutely aware that without long-range resolution, maintenance will take up all available funds for roads within a few years, leaving nothing for new construction and other improvements.

Faced with such a failure -- and the prospect of punishment at the polls in 2007, when all 140 seats in the General Assembly are up for election -- the Republicans are already planning another special session for the summer or early fall. Given the party split, there's modest reason at best to think another session will come out better. If it does not, Virginians should use the next election to find more responsible leadership.

Iran Urged To Accept Limits (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, June 20, 2006

KINGS POINT, N.Y., June 19 -- President Bush said Monday that the package of incentives being offered to Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions is a "historic opportunity," and he warned starkly that the alternative for the Islamic nation is increased isolation and crippling economic sanctions.

Speaking at the 70th commencement ceremony of the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy, Bush said Iran's stated desire for a peaceful nuclear power program is "legitimate," and one supported by the incentive package from the United States and its allies.

"We believe the Iranian people should enjoy the benefits of a truly peaceful program to use nuclear reactors to generate electric power," said Bush, who in the past has expressed skepticism about the need for oil-rich Iran to pursue nuclear power.

Still, Bush said, the rest of the world has to be sure that Iran's program does not include any covert military goals, as the United States suspects, because a nuclear-armed Iran would be a "grave threat to people everywhere."

The president's remarks came a day before he was to depart for Vienna for meetings with the European Union, which has been involved in long-running negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program. Bush angered many leaders in Europe with the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, but his administration has worked closely with them in trying to present a united front toward Iran.

"I have a message for the Iranian regime: America and our partners are united," Bush said. "We have presented a reasonable offer. Iran's leaders should see our proposal for what it is -- an historic opportunity to set their country on a better course. If Iran's leaders want peace and prosperity and a more hopeful future for their people, they should accept our offer, abandon any ambitions to obtain nuclear weapons, and come into compliance with their international obligations."

The Bush administration has agreed to join negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program. It also has joined with Britain, France, Russia, Germany and China in making an offer to allow Iran to develop a strictly supervised civilian nuclear power program if it abandons its uranium-enrichment efforts. The U.S. offer of joining negotiations marked the first time since the 1979 hostage crisis that the United States has offered to enter substantial negotiations with Iran.

Iran has denied seeking to develop nuclear weapons and argued that it has a right to develop a civilian nuclear program. But its leaders also have made some conciliatory remarks about the offer.

In his remarks, Bush also said that he hoped to use his impending trip to enlist members of the European Union to help build stronger international support for Iraq's fledgling democracy. "The European Union has been the world's most -- among the world's most generous financial donors for reconstruction in Iraq. And Europe and America will encourage greater international support to help," he said.

The 202 Merchant Marine Academy graduates sat on the school's football field in brilliant sunshine as Bush -- the first sitting president to address the academy -- delivered his speech. Former White House chief of staff Andrew H. Card Jr., who attended the academy, accompanied Bush to the commencement ceremony and sat on the speaker's platform while Bush spoke. Graduates of the academy go to work as mates and engineers in the nation's maritime fleet, while 39 of this year's graduates are entering various branches of the armed forces.

Bush's Visit, Speech Thrill Midshipmen (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

DOJ_NMG_0035560

KINGS POINT, N.Y. — To most Americans coming off the final weekend of spring, President Bush's commencement address here Monday was just another graduation speech, one of more than 4,000 this year on campuses across the country.

But to the staff, faculty, midshipmen and friends of the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy, it was a huge deal, a dream come true — the first time in the service academy's 63-year history that a president accepted an invitation to address the graduates.

Bush underscored the point in his address: "I hope it's worth the wait," he quipped when he took the podium Monday, buoyed by cheers that rang out from the 202 graduates and about 5,000 guests who jammed the football bleachers under sunny skies. The scenic campus on Long Island Sound, about 10 miles east of Manhattan, was once the summer estate of auto baron Walter Chrysler.

West Point and the Naval, Air Force and Coast Guard Academies have all hosted presidents at their graduations, many times — but never the Merchant Marine, even though it is a full-fledged federal service academy whose graduates have fought in every major conflict since World War II. Most serve as deck officers or engineers on commercial ships or on land as port security officers or engineers with shipbuilding and trading companies. Many immediately go on active duty in the military; 39 plan to do so this year.

Bush used his speech, which came on the eve of his trip to Vienna for a U.S.-European Union summit, to send a message that the United States and Europe are united against Iran's development of nuclear weapons. "If Iran's leaders want peace and prosperity and a more hopeful future for their people, they should … abandon any ambitions to obtain nuclear weapons," Bush said.

Newsday said on its website Monday that about 300 protesters — forced to assemble off campus — sang and waved signs during Bush's speech, encouraging passing cars to honk for peace. Later, about 60 protesters marched about a mile to an intersection near the gates of the academy. Guarded by more than a dozen police officers, they chanted: "No justice, no peace. U.S. out of the Middle East."

Hosting the president was expensive and hectic, as arrangements had to be shifted at the last minute, but academy officials, midshipmen and parents of the graduates said it was worthwhile.

"We're really proud. It's not very often the Merchant Marine Academy is recognized," said graduate Timothy Sallee, 22, of Charleston, S.C.

Indeed, the feeling that the Merchant Marine Academy is a "stepchild" among the better-known service academies is pervasive here. Bush's coming offered a sense of legitimacy.

"We're the fourth-oldest service academy, but clearly the least known," said Capt. Eric Willischeck, who headed the graduation planning committee.

In his speech, Bush played off the academy's motto — "Deeds, not words" — to praise its value and service to the nation. "In times of war, the Merchant Marine is the lifeline of our troops overseas, carrying critical supplies, equipment, and personnel," he said.

The White House wouldn't say what made Bush accept the invitation this year, but former White House chief of staff Andrew Card had a lot to do with it. Card was a student here in 1966-67 before he left to get married, and he has maintained strong ties with the school. Card said he and homeland security adviser Fran Townsend both lobbied Bush to come here to highlight the role the academy plays in critical areas such as port and container security.

"I really admire the work they do," Card said.

Bush, who brought Card to the commencement with him on Air Force One, joked that as a plebe at the academy, Card was stuffed into a duffel bag and run up the flagpole.

"I know he appreciates the much warmer welcome he received here today," Bush said to laughter.

Bush's visit illustrates the price of all the beneficial attention the president brings when he comes to visit.

When word came in March that Bush was coming, the planning began for the logistical and security arrangements necessary to accommodate him. Academy officials drew up budgets, coordinated with the White House and hired a professional production company to oversee the arrangements.

While a normal graduation draws a crowd of 1,500, word of Bush's visit provoked a flood of requests for tickets that more than tripled the usual attendance. The bigger crowd and the demands of media coverage led to the construction of temporary bleachers for 1,000 on the football field, a 35-foot stage with TV-quality lighting and a stadium-quality sound system; the cobbling together of 2,000 feet of bike racks as security fencing; plus tents to accommodate the media and a holding area for the president.

Off-campus satellite parking lots had to be found and 15 buses hired to bring ticket holders onto campus.

The academy estimated the cost at $405,000. Part will be offset by federal appropriations, alumni contributions and reimbursement from the White House media for their accommodations.

"The rest we'll have to eat within our existing budget," Willischeck said, adding that it's worth it. "Now we can say we've had our president."

Day Of Pride, Unprecedented Glory (NSDY)

By Olivia Winslow

Long Island Newsday, June 20, 2006

It was just before 7 a.m., and Cheryl Coffman of Macon, Ga., was early. But so was everyone else.

Coffman was in a cab that found itself merely inching along Steamboat Road yesterday, part of a long line of cars headed toward the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy in Kings Point, where three hours later President George W. Bush would deliver the commencement address.

When it was clear it would be quicker to proceed on foot, Coffman got out of the cab and joined scores of others walking along the tree-lined street to witness not only a joyous graduation ceremony, but also history.

But Coffman wasn't complaining. Not about the heavy security or the need to be at the academy's Tomb Field an hour before the president's arrival.

"I'm not too surprised at all," Coffman said. "We expected a lot of people." Coffman had come to witness the graduation of a cousin, Amy Tribble of Rome, Ga. "I'm just so proud of her I don't know what to do."

About 4,400 people -- nearly three times the number of people who normally attend the academy's graduations -- attended the ceremony, where Bush's appearance marked the first time a sitting president had visited the academy since it was dedicated in 1943.

Many people thought that Bush's visit would give greater recognition to the academy, perhaps the least known of the five federal service academies, along with those training future members of the Army, Navy, Air Force and Coast Guard.

Bush noted in his address the Merchant Marine Academy's service to the nation over the years, saying it is the only one of the five service academies where even before graduation students are sent into the theater of war -- during their year at sea. That fact means the Kings Point campus is alone among the academies authorized to fly the country's battle standard.

Bush's presence, valedictorian Peter James Radzicki of Mint Hill, N.C., said in his speech, "brings hope and legitimacy to an academy that at times has felt forgotten."

John Arntzen of Staten Island, a 1979 alumnus of the academy and now vice chairman of the academy's Alumni Foundation, said the president's appearance brings much-needed attention to the role the academy and merchant marines play in the nation's commerce generally, and in a time of war. He and others said merchant mariners transport most of the supplies to the nation's armed forces.

"We're very happy with the president's arrival," Arntzen said. It means, he added, "there's more focus on the mission of the school to the country's national defense."

Under a bright sky and intense heat, thousands waited patiently for the president in Tomb Field, under the watchful eyes of the Secret Service and Nassau County police. When shortly before 10 a.m. a dark green helicopter flew overhead with the words United States of America clearly visible, people applauded. "It's him!" someone cried.

The crowd greeted Bush with hearty applause and cheers. During his half-hour speech, he praised the academy midshipmen for their service and sacrifices over the years, and also previewed his trip to Europe beginning today. His words were often interrupted with applause.

Bush shook the hand of all 202 graduates, often waving in the direction of each graduate's family. Others went even further, hugging the president.

Kelsey Newell, 21, of Honolulu, said it was all "unbelievable. I never could have imagined this would come," as her parents, Pamela and Capt. Steve Newell of the Coast Guard gathered near. "I couldn't be any more pleased," her father said beaming.

"It's a really great day," Anthony McDonald, 23, of Weymouth, Mass., said after the ceremony.

"It's surreal to have the president here. Every year they say, we're trying to get the president," McDonald said.

But it wasn't until this year that it finally happened.

Bush, At Merchant Academy, Warns Iran On Nuclear Program (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

KINGS POINT, N.Y., June 19 — On the day before he was to depart for a meeting with European allies in Vienna, President Bush issued a stiff warning to Iran on Monday, saying it should suspend its uranium enrichment program now or face "progressively stronger" economic sanctions and further political isolation.

Mr. Bush reiterated the United States' offer to join multinational talks with Iran, but only if it immediately ceased uranium production. If Iran rejects that offer, he said, "It will result in action before the Security Council, further isolation from the world and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions."

Still, he mixed his stern oratory with words of inducement. Speaking at a commencement ceremony at the United States Merchant Marine Academy here, he promised Iran that compliance would result in huge benefits for its economy and its people. He indicated that the United States was open to allowing Iran to develop civilian nuclear capacity, though under the proper "safeguards," keeping the administration's recent agreement on the possibility of future enrichment by Iran if it can provide sufficient proof that its program is peaceful.

White House aides said the address was in part meant to serve as a table-setter for discussions about the nuclear standoff with Iran that are expected as part of a broader agenda this week at the United States-European Union summit meeting.

"It's in some way teeing up what is going to be a topic of conversation, one of many, at the European Union consultations this week," Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, told reporters on the way here aboard Air Force One.

The talks about talks with Iran remain in a delicate place. The prospect of a deal hinges on Iran's willingness to drop what it says is its sovereign right to develop nuclear power sources and on how the West will ultimately be willing to define the word "suspend." Some of the negotiating partners have indicated a readiness to allow Iran to keep its centrifuges — which enrich uranium into a form that can fuel reactors or atom bombs — idle but online during talks. The United States has not shown any softening of its stand that the centrifuges must be completely shut down for talks to begin.

Officials signaled that their strategy this week would concentrate more on building a unified front with Europe in pressing Iran to suspend its program than it would on making any breakthrough with Iran.

While stressing unity with Europe, Mr. Bush reprised some of his tougher language about the Iranian political leadership, telling the graduates, "The leaders of Iran sponsor terror, deny liberty and human rights to their people, and threaten the existence of our ally, Israel."

But, tapping into the internal politics of Iran with a message that seemed aimed at its more liberal intellectual classes, Mr. Bush praised its culture and civilization. "Through the centuries, Iranians have achieved distinction in medicine and science and poetry and philosophy, and countless other fields," he said.

Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said that unless Iran responded to Mr. Bush's offer while he was in Europe, the negotiations were unlikely to produce any developments. "At this point, the next step is really waiting for the response from the Iranian regime," he said.

Mr. Bush would not be able to make great strides on Iran anyway, because he is meeting only with the core of the European Union leadership this week, not heads of state.

Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, said Monday that Iran would stand for nothing less than "unconditional" talks, though he continued to keep the door open to talks.

"The Islamic Republic has always wanted to negotiate and have dialogue on equal terms and with no preconditions," state television quoted him as saying during a meeting that included Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. But he had also said "the new proposal is a step forward."

North Korea's nuclear ambitions will also certainly be on the president's mind this week, but the United States' main negotiating partners in those talks are not Europeans.

Mr. Bush also intends to use the meeting to press European countries to come to terms on a trade-expanding agreement under the so-called Doha round, named for the city in Qatar where the talks began. He also will call for European leaders to help collect billions of dollars in pledges to rebuild Afghanistan and Iraq, as he said after his surprise trip to Baghdad last week that he would do.

"All nations that have pledged money have a responsibility to keep their pledges — and America and Europe will work together to ensure they do so," Mr. Bush said here.

Europeans are pursuing their own agenda, with officials there hinting in the last week that they will probably push Mr. Bush to close the prison in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. He tacitly acknowledged the divisions during his address here, saying, "Others in Europe have had disagreements with our decisions on Iraq." He added, "We agree that the success of a democratic government in Baghdad is vital for the Iraqis and for the security of the world."

Iranian Nuclear Program Focus Of U.S.-EU Meeting (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, June 20, 2006

VIENNA — U.S. and European Union officials will meet Wednesday to determine how to maintain their united stance against Iran and its budding nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0035563

Three years after the United States and most European nations differed on the U.S. decision to invade Iraq, they remain close on what to do about Iran, officials and analysts say.

Any specific decisions about Iran are in a holding pattern until Iran decides what to do about a U.S. offer that could lead to U.S.-Iranian talks, White House national security adviser Stephen Hadley says.

Last month, President Bush offered to join negotiations about the future of Iran's nuclear energy program, provided the Iranians suspend a uranium-enrichment program that could produce fuel for a potential nuclear weapon.

The allies face major challenges, says Michael O'Hanlon, senior fellow in foreign policy studies at the Brookings Institution. The Bush administration must prove it can handle delicate global negotiations without resorting to force, while the Europeans must demonstrate that their vision of diplomacy can work.

So far, it's working, he says. Europe and the United States are approaching Iran the way many European Union officials wanted to handle Iraq: unified global cooperation to use carrots and sticks, not military force, to change another nation's behavior.

Bush touted global cooperation Monday during a commencement speech at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy, saying the United States and Europe are united on Iran. “Nuclear weapons in the hands of this regime would be a grave threat to people everywhere,” he said.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad says Iran's nuclear program is for electricity, not bombs, and he has accused the United States of fomenting a crisis.

Bush has said Iran has weeks, not months, to respond to the offer, which was developed in consultation with European allies. Current negotiations with Iran have been led by Great Britain, France and Germany.

Hadley says the annual EU summit covers many topics and is a chance to discuss “the way forward” with Iran.

If Iran refuses to suspend its enrichment program, the United States plans to seek sanctions through the United Nations Security Council. Russia and China, two council members with veto power, have been less willing to approve sanctions. Ahmadinejad met recently with Russian and Chinese leaders, urging them to oppose sanctions.

It's important for the United States and the EU to work together, says Andrew Moravcsik, director of the European Union Program at Princeton University. He says, however, that “most Europeans believe it would be better to have a nuclear Iran than to strike.”

Iran Tops Agenda For Bush, European Leaders (KRT)

By Ron Hutcheson

Knight Ridder, June 19, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush heads to Europe on Tuesday to shore up a frayed alliance that's nonetheless trying to pull itself together to confront the potential threat of a nuclear-armed Iran.

Iran tops the agenda for Bush's meeting with European Union leaders in Vienna, Austria. While Bush remains unpopular overseas, diplomats from both sides of the Atlantic agree that relations between the United States and Europe have improved dramatically since their bitter divisions over the U.S. decision to invade Iraq in 2003.

Government officials and outside experts agree that Bush and his European counterparts now recognize that, despite their differences, they need each other. Sort of like the Rolling Stones, according to John Hulsman, a foreign-policy specialist at the Heritage Foundation, a conservative Washington research center.

"Think of Keith Richards when he says to (Mick) Jagger, `This thing is bigger than both of us.' That's where we are," Hulsman said. "The kids want to save the marriage even though the love is gone."

The president devoted most of his commencement address Monday at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy in Kings Point, N.Y., to extolling the partnership with Europe as essential to securing global peace and prosperity. He noted pointedly that "America and Europe are united on one of the most difficult challenges facing the world today: the behavior of the regime in Iran."

While emphasizing that America and Europe are united in hoping "to solve this problem diplomatically," Bush warned Iran that failure to resolve the budding conflict over its nuclear-research program "will result in action before the (U.N.) Security Council, further isolation from the world and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions."

For all the president's emphasis on U.S.-European unity however, divisive issues remain.

While there's widespread agreement that Iran shouldn't be allowed to acquire nuclear weapons, some nations remain reluctant to impose tough sanctions on the Islamic republic, and it isn't clear how many of them would support pre-emptive military action against Iran or its nuclear facilities.

Bush will prod Europeans to do more to help in Iraq, because while nations around the world have pledged $13.5 billion in aid, they've delivered less than $4 billion.

"Pledging is great, and makes some headlines in the newspapers, but what we need is those pledges to be turned into real dollars," national security adviser Stephen Hadley said.

The Europeans also will challenge Bush on the treatment of terrorism suspects at the U.S. naval base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and alleged military atrocities in Iraq. But Hadley said Bush had no intention of complying with European demands to close the Guantanamo detention facility.

"The president has spoken to those issues . ... There's not a whole lot new to be said," Hadley said.

Chilly as that may sound, European officials say Bush has dropped some of the swagger of his first term, when he showed little regard for their views. Over European objections, Bush abandoned the Kyoto treaty on global warming, abrogated the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, declared the right to launch pre-emptive war and invaded Iraq without approval from the United Nations.

Austrian Ambassador Eva Nowotny said in an interview that the "vastly improved" relationship turned a corner at the last U.S.-EU summit, in February 2005, when Bush reached out to Europeans and called for "a new era of transatlantic unity."

Hungarian Ambassador Andras Simonyi agreed.

"Obviously, there's been a change in attitude from the Bush administration," Simonyi said. "Europe and America have to hold hands."

Both sides wanted a fresh start.

"It was a shift born of pragmatism. The United States was up to its eyeballs with trouble in Iraq," said Charles Kupchan, professor of international relations at Georgetown University. "On the other side of the Atlantic, you had the realization that the rift with the United States was very harmful, deeply divisive."

The leaders also will discuss how to deal with Hamas, the militant Palestinian organization that has vowed to eliminate Israel and that now runs the Palestinian government, and Russia, which has shown a worrisome will to use energy as a foreign-policy weapon.

Russia, which supplies about a fourth of the natural gas that Europe consumes, briefly cut off supplies to Ukraine last winter in a move that Ukrainians viewed as retaliation for their efforts to forge closer ties with Europe and the United States.

Bush initially had planned to stop in Ukraine on his way back from Austria, but opted instead to visit Budapest, Hungary, where he'll mark the 50th anniversary of an unsuccessful revolt against communist rule that Soviet troops brutally crushed.

The Vienna stop will include a roundtable discussion of freedom and democracy with Austrian students and a performance by the Vienna Boys Choir.

U.S. officials had hoped to house the president in one of the city's best hotel rooms - a luxury suite at the five-star Imperial Hotel - but Bush lost it to a rock star. The Sun, a British newspaper, reported that Jagger claimed the $4,500-a-night room days before U.S. officials sought to reserve it for Bush.

Bush Gives Iran An Ultimatum On Uranium (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

President Bush told Iran on Monday that nations worldwide won't back down from their demand that Tehran suspend uranium enrichment.

"Iran's leaders have a clear choice. We hope they will accept our offer and voluntarily suspend these activities so we can work out an agreement that will bring Iran real benefits," Bush said a day before leaving for Vienna, Austria, where he will talk with European Union officials who are leading efforts to resolve the nuclear dispute.

If Iran's leaders reject the offer, they will face action before the U.N. Security Council and progressively stronger political and economic sanctions, Bush said during a commencement speech at the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy.

Bush discussed Iran with Russian President Vladimir Putin on Monday during an 18-minute phone call Putin placed to Bush. "The presidents agreed on the importance of remaining united in their efforts to press Iran to suspend all enrichment activities and begin negotiations on the incentives package," said Kate Starr, a spokeswoman for the National Security Council.

On Sunday, Iran accused the United States of trying to sway European nations from a possible compromise. The Iranian foreign ministry said U.S. insistence that negotiations be conditioned on Tehran's suspension of uranium enrichment has narrowed the scope of possible solutions, and made it more difficult for all parties to reach an accord.

Bush made it clear he would not budge. He said allowing Iran to enrich uranium, a process that can make nuclear fuel for a power plant or fissile material for an atomic bomb, would present a grave threat to the world.

"The United States has offered to come to the table with our partners and meet with Iran's representatives as soon as the Iranian regime fully and verifiably suspends its uranium enrichment and reprocessing activities," Bush said. "I have a message for the Iranian regime: America and our partners are united. We have presented a reasonable offer. Iran's leaders should see our proposal for what it is — a historic opportunity to set their country on a better course."

On June 6, European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana presented a package of rewards and possible penalties to Iran. The package was drawn up by the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council — the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia — and Germany.

The package calls on Iran to suspend, not permanently halt, uranium enrichment as a condition for the start of talks, although the negotiations are aimed at getting Iran to agree to a long-term moratorium on such activity.

Iran says enriching uranium is its country's right. Iranian officials say they are reviewing the package and will propose amendments.

Bush is the first American president to address a graduating class at the academy. He spoke there at the request of former White House chief of staff, Andrew Card, who briefly studied there in the 1960s and hitched a ride on Air Force One to share the stage with the president.

"When he was a plebe, he was stuffed in a duffel bag and run up the flagpole," Bush said about his former chief of staff who left the school when he married.

The U.S. Merchant Marine Academy was created following a 1934 fire in which 134 people died aboard the passenger ship Morro Castle. Congress acknowledged the need for maritime-training standards and passed the Merchant Marine Act that created the academy in 1936. President Franklin D. Roosevelt dedicated the school in 1943 in Kings Point.

Kings Point graduates work as deck officers aboard container ships, oil tankers, passenger cruise ships and other vessels. Others remain on land and have become engineers in shipbuilding companies and work in a variety of port operations, including security, while some opt for military careers. Since the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, the academy has played a leading role in developing international training standards for maritime security.

"From this campus, every man and woman could see the black smoke rising from the Twin Towers," Bush said. "Within hours, your midshipmen were working side-by-side with the Coast Guard and Marine division of the New York City Fire Department," Bush told the midshipmen seated on a sunny football field at the academy outside New York City.

"Over the next nine days, you moved firefighters and police and emergency response teams into ground zero. You moved tons of food and water supplies. The heroic response to that terrible day showed the spirit of America, and the spirit of this fine academy."

The Race For Iran (NYT)

By Flynt Leverett

Washington

AS the world watches the political maneuvering over restarting nuclear talks with Iran — this time with American participation — few are paying attention to a broader strategic competition that has started between the United States, Russia and China. Ultimately, this competition will decide not only the direction of Iran's nuclear activities but also its economic, political and military role in the Middle East and beyond. The outcome hinges on which countries will assume dominance in developing Iran's enormous oil and natural gas reserves.

Unfortunately, by refusing to consider a "grand bargain" with Iran — that is, resolution of Washington's concerns about Tehran's weapons of mass destruction and support for terrorism in return for American security guarantees, an end to sanctions and normalization of diplomatic relations — the Bush administration is courting failure in its nuclear diplomacy and paving the way for Russia and China to win the larger strategic contest.

Iran has the world's second-largest proven reserves of conventional crude oil, after Saudi Arabia, and the second-largest reserves of natural gas, after Russia. Its relatively low production levels make it one of the few states with the potential to greatly increase its exports of both oil and gas over the next two decades.

As the world economy during this period will rely increasingly on the Middle East and the former Soviet Union for its energy needs, Iran's putative status as a hydrocarbon superpower will take on ever greater strategic importance. Add in its location, its population of nearly 70 million (the largest in the Middle East) and its ambitions to regional leadership, and the significance of Iran's future international role is undeniable.

However, to expand its energy exports, Iran needs a great deal of capital and advanced technology from outside — at least $160 billion over the next quarter century according to the International Energy Agency. Washington of course does all it can to block exactly such investment — barring American energy companies from seeking business in Iran and threatening European and Japanese companies with fines and cutoffs of American components.

These measures — along with repressive Iranian policies that scare off foreign investors — have had an impact: since the Islamic Republic opened its oil and gas sectors to foreign energy companies in the early 1990's, it has attracted only $15 billion to $20 billion in European and Japanese investment. And as the nuclear issue has heated up, prospects for substantial increases in Western investment have virtually evaporated.

A senior Iranian diplomat told me this month that Iran can no longer "wait for the West," and Tehran is now looking for alternative investors. In recent years, China has emerged as a potential large-scale partner. But while China can provide capital, its state-owned energy companies are not much more technically capable right now than Iran's. It will be a decade at least before China can fill all Iran's technical gaps.

This is where Russia comes in. Although Russian energy companies could not offer quite the same level of expertise as Western firms in the complexities of managing Iran's older oil reservoirs, they could in the next several years help the Islamic Republic develop its newer oil finds and, more significantly, realize its huge potential as a gas exporter.

In fact, the two countries have already held talks on possible "coordination" of Iranian gas exports with Gazprom, Russia's state-owned gas and oil behemoth. Iranian officials have told me that their government does not think Gazprom would be the ideal partner, compared with Western companies, but it deems such a deal preferable to continued stagnation.

From a Russian perspective, such a deal would have many benefits. Many industry experts feel that within just a few years, the amounts of gas that Gazprom is contracted to provide may exceed what the company on its own can bring to market. It has been trying to close the gap by purchasing additional gas from Central Asian states that rely on Russian pipelines to export their oil and gas. But at the same time, the United States is trying to help those ex-Soviet states build oil and gas pipelines that are outside of Moscow's control — an effort the Kremlin interprets as a deliberate attempt to isolate and weaken Russia.

Russian officials and commentators have complained to me in recent weeks about a new "double standard" in American policy — one that criticizes the centralization of power in Russia but overlooks authoritarian abuses in Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan and Turkmenistan. The involvement of Russian energy companies in Iran would not only support Moscow's external energy strategy but would push back against perceived American efforts to undermine Russia's influence in Central Asia.

Together, Russia and Iran control almost half of the world's proven reserves of natural gas. If they coordinated their production and marketing decisions, these two countries could be twice as dominant in international gas markets as Saudi Arabia is in the global oil market.

And as China looks to deepen its own involvement in Iran, there would be opportunities for Chinese-Russian cooperation in developing Iranian resources, and collaborating against what both Beijing and Moscow see as excessive United States unilateralism in world affairs. By working together, Russia and China would further establish themselves as rising players in the Persian Gulf, where America has grown used to something like hegemonic status.

Against this backdrop, the Bush administration's approach to nuclear diplomacy with Iran is strategically shallow. The decision to encourage direct talks with Tehran generated many headlines but was really only a limited tactical adjustment to forestall an embarrassing collapse in coordination with America's key international partners.

By continuing to reject a grand bargain with Tehran, the Bush administration has done nothing to increase the chances that Iran will accept meaningful long-term restraints on its nuclear activities. It has also done nothing to ensure that the United States wins the longer-term struggle for Iran. Such a grand bargain is precisely what is required, not only to forestall Iran's effective nuclearization in the next three to five years, but also to position the United States for continued leadership in the Middle East for the next decade and beyond.

Elie Wiesel Sounds The Alarm Regarding Iran Nobel Laureate Embarks On A Mission To Combat 'Religious Fanaticism' (WSJ)

By Frederick Kempe

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

Nobel peace laureate Elie Wiesel has a simple motive behind the stepped-up pace of his already furious work: foreboding. The world's best-known Holocaust survivor senses, at age 77, a pivotal historic moment, one that poses some of the greatest dangers since Nazi Germany.

The shift began "with the ultimate new weapon," he says, suicide terrorists deployed globally on behalf of religious fanaticism and without qualms about mass casualties. In his view, it has taken state form with an Iranian president who supports terrorism and is bent on developing nuclear weapons and exterminating Israel.

One result: Mr. Wiesel has set in motion a series of Mideast initiatives that will be announced this week in Petra, Jordan, at a gathering of fellow Nobel laureates brought together by him and King Abdullah II. The initiatives involving Palestinians, Israelis and Jordanians include projects ranging from health and education to women's issues to water development in the Jordan River Valley.

Though the official program doesn't mention Iran (in deference to its Jordanian hosts), the laureates also will consider a mission to Iran in conjunction with the United Nations and the International Atomic Energy Agency to explore ways to pull Tehran from the nuclear brink. Though Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad may not heed the Nobel winners' advice, Mr. Wiesel says, he is unlikely to refuse a meeting.

The Petra meeting also will provide the stage for "very high-level exchanges" of Israeli and Palestinian leaders. The hope is to bypass the newly elected Hamas government, whose charter calls for destroying Israel, through tapping grassroots interest in peace. "We are encouraging pragmatic moderation by going after domestic constituents," says David L. Phillips, executive director of the Elie Wiesel Foundation for Humanity, which is co-hosting the conference with the King Abdullah II Fund for Development. While Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Ohlmert will attend, it remains to be seen whether the two will hold face-to-face discussions.

Mideast history is littered with well-meaning peacemakers. Yet Mr. Wiesel says with a laugh that although he expects to do no more than "move matters forward by inches," he abandoned defeatism in Auschwitz and cast cynicism aside when he quit his postwar journalism career in France and began life as a novelist, philosopher, teacher and political activist.

Whatever the laureates achieve over time, the Petra meeting is another landmark in Mr. Wiesel's extraordinarily life of drawing purpose from the tragedy of losing his father, mother and sisters in the Holocaust. "Suffering confers no privileges," he says. "It's what you do with it."

Mr. Wiesel, for example, was perhaps the most important voice in converting former Israel Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to pursue peace with Palestinians. He and the lifelong hawk talked, Mr. Wiesel says, of how history has proven that men of the political right are often best at implementing policies of the left: former U.S. President Richard Nixon reaching out to China; Menachem Begin making peace with Anwar Sadat.

What drives Mr. Wiesel now is less a conviction he can change the world than the survivor's certainty that he must try. In that, he follows the lesson of the character Moishe the Beadle in his best-selling memoir "Night." His family in the Transylvanian town of Sighet might have escaped death had they listened to Moishe, who in 1942 warned of what was coming because he had witnessed and then escaped the Gestapo execution of Jewish prisoners after they had dug their own graves. Mr. Wiesel is sounding a similar alarm about Tehran.

"The regime in Iran is the epitome of what we consider to be evil," he says. "Military intervention must remain the last option, but it cannot be excluded. If all else fails, the president of Iran must be prevented from attaining nuclear weapons. He is sick, mentally ill. He is the No. 1 Holocaust denier."

Beyond considering the mission to Iran, the laureates will discuss how else they can support the International Atomic Energy Agency's package of Multilateral Nuclear Approaches, aimed at enhancing nonproliferation by developing international supply guarantees, with the IAEA acting as supply guarantor. Beyond that, the U.N.'s secretary-general and Mr. Wiesel's foundation are in discussions about creating an Advisory Group of Nobel Laureates to support a new Peacebuilding Commission to assist war-ravaged countries during postconflict phases.

None of this may alter history, but Mr. Wiesel's point is to ensure that leaders don't overlook the pivotal moment. "The 20th century was marked by two totalitarian ideologies: political fanaticism in Moscow and racist fanaticism in Berlin," he says. "Now we face a third fanaticism, religious fanaticism, which dominated the Middle Ages but is back and growing."

Mr. Wiesel, like Moishe the Beadle, only hopes more people listen.

Rice Warns North Korea On Missile Test (AP)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, June 20, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea on Monday it will face consequences if it test-fires a missile thought to be powerful enough to reach the West Coast of the United States.

"It would be a very serious matter and, indeed, a provocative act should North Korea decide to launch that missile," Rice said amid indications that the North Koreans could launch an intercontinental ballistic missile at any moment.

The senior U.S. diplomat said the United States would talk to other nations about action should the North go ahead, and "I can assure everyone that it would be taken with utmost seriousness."

President Bush briefly discussed the missile test with Russian President Vladimir Putin during an 18-minute phone call the Russian official placed to the American president on Monday. The leaders plan to remain in touch on the missile issue, said Kate Starr, a spokeswoman for the National Security Council.

The United States, Japan, Australia, South Korea and other countries have urged North Korea to abandon any missile firing, but there was no sign of backing down. U.S. officials said Monday the missile was apparently fully assembled and fueled, giving the North a launch window of about a month.

Unlike other preparatory steps the United States has tracked, the fueling process is very difficult to reverse, and most likely means the test will go ahead, one senior administration official said.

The precise timing is unclear, the official said.

At U.N. headquarters in New York, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said he was holding preliminary consultations with Security Council members on possible action if North Korea fires the missile, thought to be a three-stage Taepodong-2 with a non-nuclear payload.

"But we don't really know what the North Korean intentions are at this point, so I think we need to wait for the event," Bolton said.

The U.S. ambassador to Japan, Thomas Schieffer, said economic sanctions were an option.

"I think sanctions would have to be considered, but I wouldn't want to describe what actions we might take," Schieffer said through a U.S. Embassy official.

U.S. officials have said the 116-foot-long missile has a firing range of 9,300 miles and could reach as far as the U.S. West Coast. Most analysts, however, say North Korea is still a long way from perfecting technology that would make the missile accurate and capable of carrying a nuclear payload.

The North's missile program has been a major security concern in the region, adding to worries about a pursuit of nuclear bombs. North Korea shocked its neighbors when it test-fired an earlier missile version over northern Japan in 1998.

In Seoul on Tuesday, Woo Sang-ho, a spokesman for South Korea's ruling party, said, "The government explained to North Korea the serious repercussions a missile launch would bring and strongly demanded that test fire plans be scrapped."

Japan says a new launch would threaten Japanese security and violate an agreement North Korea signed in 2002 and reaffirmed in 2004. Rice said it would also end a self-imposed moratorium on test firings that North Korea has observed since 1999 and a disarmament bargain it struck with the United States and other powers last year.

Rice said a launch now "would once again show North Korea is determined to deepen its isolation, determined not to take a path that is a path of compromise and a path of peace, but rather instead to once again saber-rattle."

The reports of a potential launch came during a prolonged hiatus in nuclear disarmament talks among North and South Korea, China, Japan, the United States and Russia. The earlier disarmament deal gives the North economic rewards for giving up weapons.

The agreement faltered almost as soon as it was announced in September 2005, and the North later walked away from talks in a dispute over a U.S. crackdown on alleged North Korean counterfeiting and fraud.

There have been no talks since last November.

North Korea says it needs nuclear weapons and a delivery system to counter what it contends are U.S. intentions to invade or topple the government. The United States has repeatedly denied any plans to invade.

U.S. intelligence indicates that the missile was fueled in recent days, said two officials, who requested anonymity because the information comes from sensitive intelligence methods.

The United States assumes North Korea would perform a test, not fire the weapon as an act of war, and could claim afterward that it was launching a space mission, one official said. That would still be considered a violation of the moratorium North Korea has observed since 1999, the official said.

The test would probably take place over water and occur during daylight hours, the official said. The United States would probably know almost instantly.

North Korea is 14 hours ahead of the U.S. East Coast.

Possible reasons for a test now include North Korean anger over a U.S. financial crackdown, which the North calls a form of sanctions, or an attempt to demonstrate that it has more technical prowess than Iran and should get at least as good a deal from the world as Iran has been offered to give up disputed nuclear activities.

North Korea referred to its missile program for the first time Monday, but has not said it intends to perform the test.

A North Korean state television broadcast, monitored in Seoul, South Korea, cited a Russian editorial on the missile and said the North "has the due right to have a missile that can immediately halt the United States' reckless aerial espionage activity."

The North has repeatedly complained in recent weeks about alleged U.S. spy planes watching its activities.

N. Korea Warned On Testing Missile (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

DOJ_NMG_0035569

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea yesterday that the launch of a long-range ballistic missile would be "a very serious matter and indeed a provocative act" that would "deepen its isolation."

Rice's remarks, made at a news conference with the Spanish foreign minister, are the latest in a series of warnings to Pyongyang not to end a 1999 self-imposed moratorium on long-range missile testing. U.S. diplomats have also worked closely with foreign counterparts to send a consistent message to the North Korean government ever since U.S. spy satellites detected signs of launch preparation.

Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, a close U.S. ally, said in Tokyo yesterday that Japan "would have to respond harshly" if there was a missile test.

An actual missile launch, however, may test that unity. Chinese and South Korean officials have privately indicated they are not as inflexible about the meaning of the missile moratorium and may be more willing to accept North Korea's explanations, U.S. officials said. South Korean officials, skeptical about U.S. intelligence, have suggested that because North Korea has been so public about the preparations, it is more likely trying to launch a satellite, not conduct a military test.

Six-nation talks seeking to end North Korea's nuclear programs in exchange for economic and political incentives have been stalled since last fall, with North Korea refusing to return to negotiations because it is angry at a Treasury Department crackdown on its counterfeiting of U.S. dollars.

U.S. officials have searched for ways to lure North Korea back to the talks, but Rice suggested that a test would result in a push to bring new sanctions against Pyongyang. U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton said yesterday that he has begun preliminary consultations with other Security Council members about a possible resolution.

A test "would once again show North Korea determined to deepen its isolation, determined not to take a path that is a path of compromise and a path of peace, but rather instead to once again saber-rattle," Rice said. "It would be a very serious matter indeed."

Rice said a launch would be an "abrogation of obligations" in the missile moratorium, adding that the freeze was also part of the agreement last September that set out the negotiating principles for the disarmament talks.

U.S. allies in the region have pressed the Bush administration to try harder to return North Korea to the talks, including by ending the financial crackdown. During Chinese President Hu Jintao's visit to Washington in April, President Bush privately reaffirmed that the United States was committed to the six-nation talks but would not end the Treasury Department actions, a senior U.S. official said.

U.S officials have examined intelligence that suggests North Korea may be preparing to test a Taepodong-2 missile from a remote village on North Korea's northeast coast. But three senior U.S. officials said Sunday and Monday that reports that North Korea appeared to have completed fueling the missile are based on incomplete intelligence.

U.S. satellites have observed liquid fuel canisters being placed near the missile, but officials said there was no confirmation that fueling took place. "We can't say anything for sure," said one top official with access to the intelligence.

Loading fuel into the rocket boosters for the Taepodong-2 missile would almost certainly suggest a launch will take place, because it is difficult to siphon out the fuel. But North Korea has a long history of doing things simply for the benefit of American satellites -- and to bring the world's attention back to the Stalinist state.

A year ago, the world was on edge after reports that North Korea might test a nuclear weapon -- and one report even suggested the evidence showed that viewing stands had been built. No test took place.

Three years ago, Pyongyang laid out missiles near a parade route so they could be seen by satellites, resulting in news stories about the potentially provocative act. But North Korea never displayed the missiles publicly during the parade.

Because of cloud cover and high-altitude wind patterns, officials think that, if the missile has been fueled, the earliest a missile launch could occur would be Tuesday evening, Washington time. North Korea is 14 hours ahead of Washington, and officials expect that the North Koreans would launch a missile during daylight hours.

Experts disagree on the likely range of the Taepodong 2, with estimates running as high as 9,000 miles -- far enough to hit the West Coast of the U.S. mainland and U.S. Pacific bases.

Rep. Mark S. Kirk (R-Ill.), who has specialized in North Korean issues and made two trips to that country, said the range is unknown because the current version of the rocket has a large new lower booster. Regardless of whether the rocket has two or three stages, he said, its current state "represents a dramatic increase in range."

If North Korea does launch the rocket on a trajectory that carries it over Japan, Kirk added, "it is expected to have a large impact on the Japanese public," and probably would push Japan to be even more closely aligned with the United States on defense issues.

N Korea Missile Threat A ‘provocative Act’ (FT)

By Caroline Daniel And Demetri Sevastopulo

DOJ_NMG_0035570

Financial Times, June 20, 2006

Condoleezza Rice, the US secretary of state, warned North Korea on Monday that a long-range missile test would be "provocative and serious".

Washington stepped up diplomatic efforts to persuade the Stalinist nation not to launch a Taepodong-2, which could reach the US. John Bolton, the US ambassador to the United Nations, said his government was consulting members of the UN Security Council on how to respond to any test.

"The first preference is that the North Koreans not light the missile off. We have made that clear to them," Mr Bolton said.

The US warnings came as officials said North Korea appeared to have fuelled the Taepodong-2, a move that significantly increases the likelihood of an imminent test because it is difficult and dangerous to reverse.

One official said that while the US had not witnessed North Korea actually fuelling the missile – which could have occurred in darkness to avoid detection by US spy satellites – all the indications suggested it was loaded with fuel.

"Everything is there to lead you to the reasonable assumption that they have [fuelled the missile]," said the official. It is clearly a North Korean decision at this point. Whenever they make the decision, off it goes."

While siphoning out the fuel would be dangerous, North Korea can also not allow the fuel to sit in the Taepodong-2 for too long because it would corrode the missile's casing.

A launch would be North Korea's first test of a longer-range missile since 1998, when Pyongyang generated an international crisis by unexpectedly firing an intermediate-range Taepodong-1 over Japan into the Pacific Ocean.

The yen fell to an all-time low against the euro and an eight-year low against sterling in European morning trade on Monday as fears grew about escalating regional tensions.

In a sign of heightened concern in Washington, Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said that administration officials, including President George W. Bush, "have contacted more than a dozen heads of state".

"This is something that the President has been working vigorously through diplomatic channels, to encourage the North Koreans to abide by their self-imposed moratorium on missile testing and also return to the talks," Mr Snow said.

Mr Snow would not identify which leaders Mr Bush had contacted. But one official said he was due to speak with Vladimir Putin, the president of Russia, on Monday.

Ms Rice and Steven Hadley, the national security adviser, had also been "working the phones", and that there had been contacts with North Korean representatives in New York, according to Mr Snow.

A senior administration official said: "It's our strong desire to see North Korea abide by the 1998 moratorium."

At the weekend Shinzo Abe, Japan's chief cabinet secretary and a leading candidate to succeed Junichiro Koizumi as prime minister in September, warned that any launch of a missile that directly affected Japan's security would be a violation of the 2002 Pyongyang Declaration which included a pledge to freeze indefinitely tests of missiles capable of reaching Japan.

Rice Says North Korean Missile Test Would Be 'Provocative Act' (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 19 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea again on Monday to refrain from testing a long-range ballistic missile, even as reports indicated that the North had taken the penultimate step of fueling the missile.

Continuing diplomatic efforts that have gathered force around the world, Ms. Rice, who had been on the telephone over the weekend with her counterparts in Asia and Europe on the issue, said it would be a "provocative act should North Korea decide to launch that missile."

"We will obviously consult on next steps, but I can assure everyone that it would be taken with utmost seriousness," Ms. Rice said. "It would once again show North Korea determined to deepen its isolation, determined not to take a path that is a path of compromise and a path of peace, but rather instead to once again saber rattle."

Her comments came after Japan warned earlier in the day that it would take "stern actions" against North Korea if it proceeded with what would be its first important test launching since 1998, when North Korea fired a missile over northern Japan.

"I'm still hoping that North Korea won't do it," said Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi at a news conference. "But if they launch a missile, Japan will consult with the United States and others and will have to take stern actions in response."

Mr. Koizumi did not specify what the actions would be, but other Japanese and American officials mentioned the possibility of economic sanctions.

Australia, which has diplomatic relations with North Korea, called on the North Korean ambassador to cancel any test and to return immediately to the six-nation talks over the North's nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0035571

"North Korea would be gravely mistaken if it thinks that a missile test would improve its bargaining position in the six-party talks," the Australian foreign minister, Alexander Downer, said in a statement.

He said, "Such action would be highly provocative," adding that it would further isolate North Korea.

Agence France-Presse reported Monday that France, too, spoke out against North Korea's planned test.

"France expresses its deep worry at the preparations for a possible ballistic missile test by North Korea," a Foreign Ministry spokesman, Jean-Baptiste Mattéi, told journalists.

North Korea has refused to return to the six-party talks unless the United States lifts a crackdown on North Korean businesses, and on financial institutions that do business with them.

The Korean Central News Agency, operated by the North Korean government, said the North's military had vowed to bolster the country's "military deterrent" against the United States. The agency accused the United States of being "hellbent on provocations for war of aggression" against North Korea.

North Korea is believed to be preparing the launching of the Taepodong 2, which, American intelligence officials have said, could reach all of the United States in a three-stage version. The missile at the launching pad was reported to be a two-stage version.

In the 1998 test, it fired a Taepodong 1, which flew over Japan before landing in the Pacific. North Korea agreed to a moratorium on long-range missile testing in 1999.

Don't Fire Missile, N. Korea Told (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned North Korea on Monday that launching a long-range missile would be a “provocative act,” as the Bush administration moved to prevent the test of a missile capable of reaching the continental USA.

The administration action came amid signs that North Korea is preparing to test-launch a long-range missile, called the Taepodong-2. The multistage missile has a range of 9,320 miles, North Korea says.

Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick said it became known only recently that North Korea was fueling a missile, a final step before launch. “I don't know if they will proceed,” he said.

In a state television broadcast, North Korea mentioned its missile program for the first time Monday but did not say whether a test would be conducted.

Experts said a launch, if successful, would represent a dramatic increase in North Korea's technological sophistication and could present a new security threat to the United States.

“If they launch it and it works, they could demonstrate the ability to land a payload on the United States,” said Jon Wolfsthal, a nuclear weapons expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank. “That is a strategic turning point. … Draw the comparison you want. The Cuban missile crisis is a good one.”

Throughout the government, U.S. officials warned North Korea against taking such a step:

·At the State Department, Rice said a test would violate international commitments made by North Korea. “It would be taken with utmost seriousness,” she said.

·At the United Nations, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said the Bush administration is talking with other Security Council members about possible steps if North Korea tests a missile. “It obviously would be very serious,” Bolton said.

·Aboard Air Force One, White House spokesman Tony Snow said President Bush had made calls to more than a dozen heads of state about the issue in recent days. Snow said U.S. officials have talked directly with North Korean representatives in New York.

North Korea analysts said the administration has little leverage with which to persuade the communist country not to test. Experts said the regime probably wants to use a test — its first since 1998 — to try to force direct talks with the United States about its nuclear program and to warn the Bush administration against using military force.

North Korea may have as many as 13 nuclear weapons, according to the Institute for Science and Security, a Washington think tank. Six-nation talks aimed at persuading North Korea to give up its arsenal have stalled. The United States has refused one-on-one negotiations.

“The North Koreans would like to establish the fact that they have weapons and that they also have the delivery system to pose a threat to the United States,” said Han Shik Park, a North Korea expert at the University of Georgia. Park said North Korean officials may feel neglected, given the lack of movement in nuclear talks and the recent overture that the United States and its allies made to Iran about freezing its nuclear program.

North Korea thinks “that by doing this, the Bush administration will begin paying more attention to them,” Park said.

Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association, a non-proliferation group in Washington, said North Korea's bid for attention and respect would be a grave mistake. It “just invites negative reactions and isolation” and could serve to mortally wound diplomatic efforts, he said.

“If the North Koreans conduct this long-range missile test, it could sink the six-party talks entirely. And they're already on life support,” Kimball said.

U.S. Warns North Korea On Missile Launch (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Barbara Demick

The Los Angeles Times, June 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration moved to ratchet up diplomatic pressure on North Korea on Monday, with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warning that a launch of a ballistic missile would be a "provocative act" that would signal Pyongyang's rejection of international efforts to reach a compromise on its weapons program.

The prospect of a long-range missile in the hands of one of the world's most stridently anti-American regimes spread alarm in Washington. A missile test at this time would also be an embarrassing setback to the Bush administration's efforts to prevent nuclear proliferation in Iran and elsewhere.

President Bush participated in overseas phone calls made by administration officials, and U.S. military officials pointed to their missile defense capabilities without indicating whether there were plans to use them. In Tokyo, officials said Japan would respond "severely," and South Korean officials early Tuesday also delivered a stern warning.

The missile is thought to have a range that could reach U.S. territories in the Pacific such as Guam and possibly parts of Alaska or Hawaii. Analysts believe it is considerably more sophisticated than the Taepodong I that North Korea shot into the Pacific Ocean in 1998 before signing a missile-testing moratorium.

As of Monday, satellite intelligence from the launch site in Musudan-ri on North Korea's east coast suggested that the fueling was on the verge of completion. Once fueling is completed, any launch would likely take place within 48 hours, since such missiles can be damaged if left fueled for extended periods. Siphoning off liquid fuel is considered difficult and dangerous.

A South Korean official told reporters in Seoul all that remains is "the click of a button."

With international talks at a standstill and military options considered imprudent, U.S. officials were left to wonder about North Korea's next step.

"We're still waiting. We don't know what their intentions are," said a senior State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity given the uncertainty involved. "We don't know for sure that they're going to push the button. But the trend lines have all been in one direction."

President Bush personally took part in calls to more than a dozen heads of state to discuss the consequences of a launch, said Tony Snow, the White House spokesman. He refused to name world leaders contacted by Bush. Snow also confirmed U.S. diplomats have been in contact with North Korean counterparts in New York, where the two countries have on occasions communicated through their United Nations delegations.

After days of curious silence, South Korea joined Japan and the United States early Tuesday in issuing a pointed warning to the North Koreans.

"The government explained to North Korea the serious repercussions a missile launch would bring and strongly demanded that test fire plans be scrapped," Woo Sang-ho, a spokesman for South Korea's ruling Uri Party, said Tuesday morning in Seoul. The U.S. made similar diplomatic warnings in 1998 when it learned that North Korea had begun fuelling a Taepo-dong 1 missile, a multi-stage launcher that can fly about 1,250 miles, but Pyongyang ignored the admonishments and launched the missile over Japan. The missile, which if developed sufficiently could be a delivery system for a nuclear weapon, dropped harmlessly into the Pacific after its third stage blew up.

The situation today is more dangerous than in 1998 because North Korea has considerably advanced its nuclear program in the ensuing years. North Korea pulled out of a nuclear-freeze agreement in 2002 and restarted it reactor and reprocessing plant in Yongbyon.

North Korean leader Kim Jong-il, with whom Bush has great personal animosity although the two have never met, has made a point of snubbing the administration's nonproliferation efforts.

Since September, Pyongyang has boycotted six-nation talks in Beijing over negotiating a dismantlement of its nuclear program. Measures to punish the North Koreans by shutting down an overseas bank it used for laundering proceeds of drug trafficking and counterfeiting have so far failed to bring Pyongyang into compliance.

The CIA believes that North Korea has enough nuclear material for 10 weapons, although it is not clear that its scientists currently have the ability to make a nuclear warhead that could be mounted on a missile.

Missile experts in South Korea and the United States believe that the current missile is not carrying a warhead, but a satellite. The technology of launching a satellite or a warhead is virtually the same, but the fact could be used by the North Koreans to claim that their launch would be purely a civilian undertaking.

Preparations for a new launch, which analysts said appears to be of a larger Taepo-dong 2 rocket, have been taking place for weeks at the remote Musudan-ri missile base under the scrutiny of U.S., Japanese and South Korean spy satellites.

"I think it is already taken with utmost seriousness by regional states and by the world because it would once again show North Korea determined to deepen its isolation, determined not to take a path that is a path of compromise and a path of peace, but rather instead to once again saber-rattle," Rice said. "From our point of view, it would be a very serious matter indeed."

Pentagon officials would not specify contingency plans or describe the alert status of U.S. forces in response to the North Korean situation. Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, noted that the U.S. "does have a limited missile defense system" in the Pacific, but he would not say whether the U.S. would use the system if a launch occurred.

Although the U.S. military has not been able to shoot down decoy missiles with any regularity, it maintains monitoring and tracking capabilities. Ships with sophisticated Aegis radar systems have been used to track missile launches in the Pacific.

Whitman added that the Pentagon considered any North Korean missile firing a "launch," rather than a "test."

"'Test' would imply we know their intentions," Whitman said.

North Korean missile technology remains shrouded in secrecy. The 1998 launch of the Taepo-dong 1 caught analysts by surprise, since it was not known that Pyongyang had the capability of developing a multi-stage missile.

There has been speculation since the 1999 moratorium, reached after the U.S. agreed to lift a number of economic sanctions, that North Korea was attempting to develop a larger Taepo-dong 2 , which would be able to fly more than twice the distance of Taepo-dong 1 and reach important U.S. military facilities in Guam. Depending if the missile had two or three stages, it theoretically could reach parts of Alaska as well. Missile experts believe the new missile also has advanced decoying capabilities which would make it difficult to track.

U.S. officials stressed Monday that they could not be certain which type of rocket was being readied.

"It's unclear exactly which model this thing is," said the senior State Department official.

N. Korean Threat Activates Shield (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

The Pentagon activated its new U.S. ground-based interceptor missile defense system, and officials announced yesterday that any long-range missile launch by North Korea would be considered a "provocative act."

Poor weather conditions above where the missile site was located by U.S. intelligence satellites indicates that an immediate launch is unlikely, said officials who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

However, intelligence officials said preparations have advanced to the point where a launch could take place within several days to a month.

Two Navy Aegis warships are patrolling near North Korea as part of the global missile defense and would be among the first sensors that would trigger the use of interceptors, the officials said yesterday.

The U.S. missile defense system includes 11 long-range interceptor missiles, including nine deployed at Fort Greeley, Alaska, and two at Vandenberg Air Force Base, Calif. The system was switched from test to operational mode within the past two weeks, the officials said.

One senior Bush administration official told The Washington Times that an option being considered would be to shoot down the Taepodong missile with responding interceptors.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice added that any launch would be a serious matter and "would be taken with utmost seriousness and indeed a provocative act."

White House spokesman Tony Snow declined to comment when asked if shooting down a launched missile was being considered as an option.

President Bush had telephoned more than a dozen heads of state regarding North Korea's launch preparations, Mr. Snow said. He did not identify the leaders who were called by Mr. Bush.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said the U.S. has made it clear to North Korea that the communist regime should abide by the missile-test ban it imposed in 1999 and reaffirmed in a pact with Japan in 2002.

"The United States has a limited missile defense system," Mr. Whitman said. He declined to say if the system is operational or whether it would be used.

"U.S. Northern Command continues to monitor the situation, and we are prepared to defend the country in any way necessary," said spokesman Michael Kucharek.

DOJ_NMG_0035574

Any decision to shoot down a missile would be made at the highest command levels, which includes the president, secretary of defense and chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

In Tokyo, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi said Japan and South Korea are trying to avert a launch.

"Even now, we hope that they will not do this," Mr. Koizumi said. "But if they ignore our views and launch a missile, then the Japanese government, consulting with the United States, would have to respond harshly."

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said the Bush administration is consulting with other Security Council members on how to respond to a Taepodong launch.

In Australia, Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said North Korea's ambassador had been summoned and told any missile launch would result in "serious consequences."

U.S. intelligence officials said there are signs that the North Koreans recently began fueling the Taepodong with highly corrosive rocket fuel. Normally, when liquid fuel is loaded into missiles the missile must be fired within five to 10 days, or it must be de-fueled and the motors cleaned, a difficult and hazardous process.

The Taepodong was first tested in August 1998, and North Korea claimed that it was a space launch vehicle that orbited a satellite. U.S. intelligence officials said the last stage of the missile was powered but did not reach orbit. A new test would likely be a more advanced version.

"Our concerns about missile activity in North Korea are long-standing and well-documented," said Mr. Whitman, the Pentagon spokesman.

The test preparations began several weeks after the Bush administration imposed new rules on U.S. companies that prohibit American or foreign firms incorporated in the United States from flying North Korea's flag on merchant ships.

According to the Treasury Department, Korean War-era sanctions were loosened in 2000 in order to entice North Korea into abiding by the missile flight test ban.

One reason for the concerns about a launch is that North Korea has issued threatening statements through its official press and broadcast organs that it is ready to go to war with states such as Japan and the United States that impose economic sanctions.

North Korea's Incredibly Bad Idea (NYT)

No one can claim a very good track record for figuring out what North Korea is up to and why, and that plainly applies to the North's reported preparations for testing a long-range missile that one day may be capable of reaching the United States. Maybe North Korea is just jealous of all the attention Iran has been getting as a result of Tehran's recent nuclear bad behavior, and craves a spotlight of its own. Maybe Pyongyang, which hasn't tested such a long-range missile in eight years, wants to see if its new, more advanced model actually works.

Or maybe North Korea is perversely eager to see the United States speed up its missile-defense plans, Japan to become more hawkish on military issues and South Korean politicians who favor talking and trading with the North lose next year's elections.

But if we cannot be sure of North Korea's motives, we can be reasonably sure of the consequences if Pyongyang does go ahead and launch the missile — which Washington says, citing satellite photos, is now fully fueled and ready to go. And those consequences will be thoroughly bad for North Korea, for its region and for just about everyone else. They will immensely complicate negotiating the kind of nuclear deal North Korea is thought to want — a grand bargain that would give it desperately needed economic help and long-sought security guarantees in exchange for abandoning its nuclear weapons program.

The consequences could be exceedingly grim for the rest of Northeast Asia as well. North Korea's previous long-range missile test in 1998 flew over Japanese airspace, shocking Japan out of its long postwar complacency about national defense. The main result has been a rise in military nationalism among Japanese politicians and the public. Another direct consequence has been increased Japanese reluctance to deal with North Korea.

Why North Korea would want to increase its isolation and antagonize its few friends like China and South Korea is hard to comprehend. But North Korea-watching is full of such mysteries.

Washington, for its part, has reacted sensibly, not wasting a lot of time on diplomatic rigmarole and delivering instead a clear and direct message to North Korea not to proceed with a missile test. We hope that North Korea's next surprise is to respond equally sensibly and cancel whatever plans it has for such a self-destructive move.

US Congress Cautious On Indian Nuclear Energy (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

DOJ_NMG_0035575

Congress is unlikely to give final approval this year to the Bush administration's civilian nuclear energy deal with India, according to Senator John McCain, the influential Arizona Republican.

In an interview with the FT, Mr McCain said Congress needed to scrutinise the deal rigorously because of the precedent it would set.

Critics say the deal would encourage nuclear proliferation by rewarding India, a country that has developed nuclear weapons while refusing to join the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

President George W. Bush sealed the landmark deal during a visit to Delhi this year. Under the agreement, the US would supply India with civilian nuclear technology in return for Delhi agreeing to open most of its nuclear facilities to international inspections.

"I am not saying I will oppose it, but I still would like to hear more argument in its favour," said Mr McCain. "I understand our unique relationship with India ... but when you carve out an exemption, then of course you run the risk of others wanting the same exemption."

Although Mr McCain said his tendency was to support the deal, it was "unlikely" that Congress could give final approval this year because of the time needed to examine the agreement properly.

The White House has been pushing Congress to make the required changes in US law as soon as possible.

However, Republicans and Democrats are increasingly reluctant to approve the deal before details such as what safeguards India would negotiate with the International Atomic Energy Agency are hammered out.

Some critics argue that the deal will bolster India's nuclear weapons programme because it will allow India to import uranium fuel, freeing up its domestic supply for use in its military programme.

"For what it's worth, we have received assurances that India will not do that, but . . . this is taking a risk," says Mr McCain.

If the Republicans retain control of the Senate in the November congressional elections, Mr McCain will become chairman of the Senate armed services committee in January.

One of his priorities, he says, will be to reform military procurement.

Mr McCain says: "[Military procurement] has become a national scandal. Nine of the 11 major weapons systems last year were over cost and behind schedule and received incentive bonuses. I don't get it."

U.S., Russia Break Impasse On Plan To Keep Arms From Rogue Users (WP)

By Peter Baker

The United States and Russia reached a last-minute agreement saving a program to secure or destroy Soviet nuclear warheads, chemical weapons and killer germs, U.S. officials said yesterday, breaking a long logjam and averting a rupture weeks before President Bush travels to St. Petersburg.

The program, a multibillion-dollar effort designed to keep weapons of mass destruction out of the hands of terrorists or rogue states, was set to expire Friday amid a stubborn disagreement over legal provisions. But U.S. and Russian officials cut a deadline deal in Moscow on Friday that will extend the program for seven years and effectively take the issue off the table for Bush's trip.

Although overshadowed by disputes with Iran and North Korea, the Cooperative Threat Reduction program with Russia represents the most expansive disarmament effort in the world and the prospect that it could be halted deeply worried arms-control specialists. The program, which began 14 years ago after the Cold War ended, has deactivated thousands of warheads, missiles and bombers and made progress toward securing biological and chemical weapons.

But the work has gone slower than hoped and Russia still maintains thousands of additional aging nuclear warheads as well as vast stockpiles of other weapons that specialists fear are vulnerable to theft or sale on the international black market. U.S. contractors in Russia would have had to shut down activities if Friday's agreement had not been signed by U.S. Ambassador William J. Burns and Russian Deputy Foreign Minister Sergei Kislyak.

"The extension of the umbrella agreement is critical," said Raphael Della Ratta, a weapons specialist at the Russian American Nuclear Security Advisory Council. Without it, "nuclear weapons delivery systems would not be dismantled, chemical weapons would remain unsecured and undestroyed and biological pathogens would remain unsecured as well."

At the same time, he and other experts have complained that the Bush administration has not shown sufficient urgency about eliminating Russian arms. "We are in a race against time to secure these materials before they're lost, stolen or get into the wrong hands," said Daryl G. Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association. "This is a necessary but insufficient step. The administration needs to push down the accelerator in terms of the pace of work."

A senior administration official said the extension should help propel efforts to eliminate old Soviet weapons. "This reinvigorates and strengthens the ongoing cooperation we've been doing with Russia," said the official, who was not authorized to speak on the record.

The extension had been held up for years mainly by a dispute over liability. Under the original agreement, Russia was responsible for any mishaps, even accidents or negligence by U.S. contractors. Russia has balked at that provision. The renewal keeps the original language for current projects but will address Russian concerns for future projects. It does not affect a separate plutonium-disposal program announced in 1998 but never started because of a similar dispute.

A collapse of the Cooperative Threat Reduction program would have marred Bush's visit to St. Petersburg next month for the Group of Eight summit. The meeting will be the group's first held by Russia, which is eager to use the occasion to showcase its reemergence on the world stage as a major power.

Critics say Russia has no business hosting an organization of industrial democracies at a time when President Vladimir Putin has constricted political freedoms at home and used energy resources to flex muscles abroad. Bush has maneuvered to avoid the image that he is endorsing Putin's course by attending the summit.

Vice President Cheney recently criticized Russian actions, and the administration will send two assistant secretaries of state, Daniel Fried and Barry Lowenkron, to a pre-summit meeting to discuss human rights in Russia. Bush also announced yesterday that he will host Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili at the White House shortly before the summit as a statement of solidarity with Russian neighbors under pressure from Moscow.

The Cooperative Threat Reduction agreement was reached in 1992 at the instigation of Sens. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) and Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) and was renewed in 1999. Since then, it has deactivated or destroyed 6,828 nuclear warheads, 612 intercontinental ballistic missiles, 885 nuclear air-to-surface missiles, 577 submarine-launched missiles, 155 bombers and 29 nuclear-powered ballistic missile submarines, among others, according to the Defense Threat Reduction Agency.

But it still has much to do. About half of the nuclear warheads, ICBMs, ICBM silos, submarine-launched missiles and nuclear submarines targeted by the program have yet to be eliminated, according to the agency. A chemical-weapons destruction facility is more than 60 percent unfinished and the Government Accountability Office reported that it may not open by 2009.

Lugar hailed the extension but called on Congress to remove other conditions that threaten the program: "If the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction is the number one national security threat facing our country, we cannot permit any delays in our response."

Palestinian Workers Receive Partial Pay (USAT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, The Associated Press

USA Today, June 20, 2006

GAZA CITY — Thousands of Palestinian workers left postal banks carrying three crisp $100 bills Monday, their first pay since March.

The payment was made by the Hamas-led government, which dipped into cash officials carried into Gaza last week to circumvent a freeze on Western aid.

Finance Minister Omar Abdel Razek said there was no way to transport the money to the West Bank, or even convert it to a local currency. He said officials were forced to make cash payments to avoid commercial banks that fear anti-terrorism sanctions. “We are paying through the post office because we have some problems with banks because of the direct or indirect threats by the U.S. and Israel,” Razek said.

The United States, Israel and the European Union list Hamas as a terrorist group because it has sent suicide bombers into Israel, killing hundreds.

Hamas has long rejected Israel's right to exist. Now that the militant group leads the Palestinian government — it won legislative elections in January — it must recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous peace accords, the United States, the EU and Israel say.

Hamas has refused. As a result, aid to the Palestinian government has been cut off.

Early today, government spokesman Ghazi Hamad said Hamas is close to agreement with the rival Fatah Party on a document that implies recognition of Israel. After talks in Gaza, Hamad said, “I think in a couple of days we will reach a compromise, because we think that the differences are not significant.”

Last week, Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar hauled $20 million in cash across the Egyptian border into Gaza in suitcases. Another Hamas official followed with $2 million. Hamas said the money came from private donations and Islamic charities.

The Palestinian Authority is the largest employer in the West Bank and Gaza. The salaries of the 165,000 government workers add up to about $130 million a month. The last three paydays have been missed. Another comes in less than two weeks.

Thousands of civil servants lined up at Gaza post offices Monday for payouts. The Finance Ministry said 91,000 workers earning $333 to $555 a month received $300. The government earlier paid 40,000 workers who earn less than $333 a month.

"I'm worried because I don't know where to begin. The grocery wants money. The bakery wants money, and I also need to pay my rent," said Samir Hassanya, 42, a health worker.

Concerned about the deteriorating situation, Mideast peacemakers — including the United States and EU — approved a plan over the weekend to transfer $125 million in humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people, bypassing the government.

The EU's top foreign policy official, Benita Ferrero-Waldner, was in the region Monday to discuss the aid plan and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's proposal for a unilateral West Bank withdrawal.

Olmert says he prefers a negotiated settlement with the Palestinians but considers talks impossible as long as Hamas remains committed to Israel's destruction. If peace efforts founder, Olmert plans a unilateral withdrawal, using the separation barrier that Israel is building as the basis for a future border.

East Timor: U.S. Opposes U.N. Force (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

John R. Bolton, the United States ambassador to the United Nations, questioned the need cited by Secretary General Kofi Annan last week to return peacekeepers to East Timor, where an Australian-led multinational force has ended violence that killed more than 30 people. Mr. Bolton said the current conflict was internal and unrelated to the tiny nation's struggle for independence from Indonesia that had been the basis of an earlier United Nations presence. "This has the look of disagreements among politicians with rival security forces," he said.

Arrests Spark Fears Of Armed Islamist Takeover (WT)

By James Brandon

The Washington Times, June 20, 2006

RABAT, Morocco -- Police have arrested more than 500 Islamist activists since late May on accusations that they were planning a coup to replace Morocco's pro-U.S. monarchy with an Islamic state.

Most were released swiftly, but the arrests revived fears that the country's largest Islamic movement, Al Adl wa al Ihsane, or Justice and Charity, is preparing to take up arms to fulfill predictions from the group's own Sufi mystics that Morocco's monarchy will fall this year.

The group, which already has Islamized higher education in Morocco, wants to replace the monarchy with an Islamic state and cut all political, cultural and economic relations with the West -- moves that it argues will end poverty and corruption in Morocco.

So far, its hundreds of thousands of followers have been content to patiently wait for an Islamic state to emerge. However, as the group's mystics churn out religiously inspired visions at an ever-faster rate, analysts fear the group will have to take action or risk losing credibility.

"There are hundreds of visions that foresee a great change in Morocco in 2006," said Nadia Yassine, the group's public face and daughter of its founder, Sheik Abdessalem Yassine. "These are true visions, and we believe in them completely."

Sheik Yassine added that, for 14 centuries, "politics and spirituality have been kept apart by the Arab elites. And we have been able to reconnect these two aspects of Islam -- and that is why people fear us."

George Joffe, a North Africa specialist at the Center of International Studies at Cambridge University, said Al Adl wa al Ihsane "may not be directly threatening violence, but their subtext is that the government is creating conditions which might cause violence to erupt."

"Through these visions, they are plugging directly into Moroccan traditions and history to directly challenge the monarchy," he said. "The government is already facing increasing tensions over high unemployment, and these arrests are an attempt to deflate the Islamists."

Al Adl wa al Ihsane is illegal and boycotts elections. However, it has taken control of the country's universities and the national student union and uses these institutions to radicalize young Moroccans.

"They have changed the universities into places of intolerance -- against girls, against gays, Jews, alcohol -- against almost everything," said Jamal Berraoui, editor of Voice of the People, a Casablanca newspaper. "They hold the universities hostage. They have created a climate of intellectual terrorism."

The Al Adl wa al Ihsane-run student union has forced the government to remove secular subjects such as philosophy from university curriculums. The group also has campaigned successfully for new university mosques, which it then staffs with radical Islamic preachers.

"When we talk with the Ministry of Education, we insist that our education conform to Islamic standards," said Mohamed Belkasmi, an economics student and head of the student union at Casablanca University. "We insist that our country's laws and teachings consist only of the Koran."

In addition to banning all "un-Islamic" events from campuses, they organize pro-Hamas exhibitions and force students and teachers to strike in support of jailed members of the movement.

Within the universities, the group operates as a secret police, crushing dissent. When a reporter interviewed students about Al Adl wa al Ihsane, the discussion repeatedly was interrupted by the group's bearded activists who patrol the campus.

"The Islamists are not the majority in Morocco, but they are the strongest and best-organized," Mr. Berraoui said. "If they want to take over, they will not hesitate to use violence and to terrorize everyone else."

The government appears powerless to control the group. In 2000, pressure from international human rights groups forced the government to release Sheik Yassine from house arrest.

"In Morocco, image has become more important than reality," Mr. Berraoui said. "Stopping the Islamists taking over would look like repression and that would make the government look bad.

"Morocco is no longer a dictatorship but not yet a democracy. This moment of transition is the most dangerous part."

Bush, Brazil's Lula, Discuss Trade (AFP)

AFP, June 20, 2006

US President George W. Bush and his Brazilian counterpart Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva spoke by telephone about this week's World Trade Organization talks in Geneva and mutual trade concerns.

"President Lula of Brazil called the president to discuss the status of the WTO negotiations currently under way in Geneva," White House National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said in a statement.

"The two presidents expressed the importance of a successful Doha Round, and noted that their respective trade negotiators had instructions to seek a comprehensive deal beneficial to all," the NSC spokesman said, adding that the 20-minute call had been requested by Lula.

"President Lula acknowledged and thanked the president for the leadership he has shown at the WTO. The two presidents also briefly discussed efforts to reduce dependence on oil and promote alternative energy," said Jones.

WTO members are struggling to meet their year-end 2006 deadline to complete the current, so-called Doha Development Agenda of trade talks, which is supposed to help poor countries.

The Doha round, launched in 2001, was meant to have been completed in 2004. Negotiators also missed their last deadline, April 30, for deciding details of the final accord.

Bush is to take part Wednesday in a EU-US summit in Vienna, a gathering which offers the last opportunity for top level talks ahead of a key WTO ministerial meeting at the end of the month.

Bush, Brazil Leader Talk Trade Expansion (AP)

AP, June 19, 2006

President Bush and Brazilian President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva spoke by phone Monday for about 20 minutes, discussing efforts to expand international trade and steps toward energy self-sufficiency, the White House said.

The Brazilian president placed the call Monday morning, said White House spokesman Frederick Jones.

The two leaders talked about world trade talks under way in Geneva, both agreeing that "their respective trade negotiators had instructions to seek a comprehensive deal beneficial to all," Jones said.

"The two presidents briefly discussed efforts to reduce dependance on oil and promote alternative energy," Jones said.

Venezuela Fights US Bid To Keep It Off UN Panel (FT)

By Andy Webb-Vidal And Mark Turner

Financial Times, June 20, 2006

President Hugo Chávez of Venezuela is fighting to win a seat on the United Nations Security Council, in the face of US efforts to derail Venezuela's campaign by lobbying on behalf of Guatemala.

Mr Chávez has long viewed a seat on the council as a vital part of winning representation for Venezuela – and by extension, he argues, for poorer nations – in international organisations.

A two-year open seat will become available this year, and Venezuela has already begun soliciting support from other governments in Latin America and the Caribbean.

Regional diplomatic heavy-weights such as Argentina – whose seat Venezuela is seeking to fill – and Brazil have indicated that they would back Caracas, as have countries farther afield, such as Syria.

The US has raised concerns about ties between Venezuela and Iran, including fears that Venezuela's presence on the council could undermine efforts by Washington to put pressure on Tehran over its nuclear programme. On Monday a senior US State Department official described Venezuela's international app-roach as "confrontational" rather than "problem-solving".

In an interview with the FT on Monday, Mr Chávez's recently appointed ambassador to the UN, Francisco Arias, said Venezuela's presence on the council would allow it to represent the interests of developing countries in the "south".

Mr Arias, who took part as an army officer in Mr Chávez's coup attempt in 1992, said US efforts to scupper Venezuela's bid would work against Washington.

"The position stated by officials in the US government – that countries should not vote for us because we represent a danger – shows lack of respect," he said.

"The US already has excessive power: a permanent seat plus the power of veto," he added. "But the campaign by the US will end up being counterproductive."

To reinforce Mr Arias's mission, Mr Chávez has appointed Roy Chaderton-Matos, seen as Venezuela's most experienced career diplomat, as a parallel special envoy to the UN.

"Venezuela is going to do everything possible to win a seat in the Security Council," said Jocelyn Henríquez, the director of the Centre for Diplomatic and Strategic Analysis, a think-tank in Caracas.

Washington's lobbying efforts may be on shaky ground. César Mayoral, Argentina's ambassador to the UN, said on Monday it looked "very bad for Guatemala", adding that US support for Guatemala was undermining the Central American country's chances.

He said Argentina, like most of South America, was backing Venezuela, but one of Venezuela's greatest challenges would be to win Chile's vote.

Alejandro Foxley, Chile's foreign minister, said at the weekend that Santiago would probably back a consensus candidate from a third country.

Annan Cautions Rights Council To Avoid Rifts (NYT)

By Tom Wright

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

GENEVA, June 19 — The United Nations secretary general, Kofi Annan, spoke Monday at the first meeting of the organization's new Human Rights Council, urging member nations not to engage in the political bickering that paralyzed its predecessor, the Human Rights Commission.

The council, whose 47 members are meeting through June 30 in Geneva, largely to establish operational procedures, was created by the United Nations in an effort to strengthen its mechanism for defending human rights and punishing nations that transgress.

The commission, which had 53 members, drew criticism for allowing countries with poor human rights records like Zimbabwe, Sudan and Libya the right to sit in judgment over other nations and for allowing political considerations to block effective action against abuses.

"This council represents a great new chance for the United Nations, and for humanity, to renew the struggle for human rights," Mr. Annan said in his speech. "I implore you, do not let the opportunity be squandered."

He added, "It is hardly an exaggeration to say that the eyes of the world — especially the eyes of those whose human rights are denied, threatened or infringed — are turned toward this chamber and this council."

But from the start the council has been weakened by the opposition of the United States, among only four countries that voted against the creation of the body at a General Assembly session in March. The United States, which wanted a smaller body with fewer members, also declined to seek a seat on the council. While many countries have sent foreign ministers to Geneva for the opening sessions of the new body, the American delegation will be led by Warren W. Tichenor, the new United States representative to the United Nations in Geneva.

"This sends the wrong signal," said Mariette Grange, the advocacy director in Geneva for Human Rights Watch. "One of our regrets is the United States has not registered any high-level representatives."

The council is widely regarded as an improvement over the commission. Nations seeking election to the council in May had to meet more demanding standards than in the past, and several candidate countries accused of rights abuses, including Iran and Venezuela, were excluded.

The council will meet three times a year for a total of 10 weeks, almost double the time for the commission, and members can convene special sessions to respond quickly to crisis situations. Countries that do not abide by rights standards can be ejected from the council with a two-thirds vote in the General Assembly.

Countering Counterfeits (WSJ)

By Carlos Gutierrez, Gunter Verheugen, Peter Mandelson And Susan Schwab

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

The global economy for illicit goods is massive, but by definition impossible to measure. What we do know is that it is getting bigger. The number of counterfeit items seized at European Union borders has increased by more than 1,000%, rising to over 103 million in 2004 from 10 million in 1998. At U.S. borders, seizures of counterfeit goods have more than doubled since 2001. Even allowing for improved detection rates, there is little doubt that the situation is getting worse.

Today the EU and the U.S. will launch a joint action strategy on the global enforcement of intellectual-property rights. The groundbreaking agreement between the EU and the U.S. envisages closer customs cooperation, including more data sharing. There are plans for joint border enforcement actions, including in third countries, and the creation of joint networks of EU and U.S. diplomats in third countries working on intellectual-property protection.

Twenty years ago, counterfeiting might have been regarded as a problem chiefly for the makers of expensive handbags. In the 1980s, 70% of firms affected by counterfeiting were in the luxury sector. But in 2004, more than 4.4 million items of fake foodstuffs and drinks were seized at EU borders, an increase of 196% over the previous year. In the U.S., seizures of counterfeit computers and hardware tripled from 2004 to 2005. There are also fake electrical appliances, car parts and toys. Even airplane parts are being pirated: The Concorde crash of 2000 appears to have been caused by a counterfeit part that had fallen off another aircraft.

Perhaps most worrying is the booming trade in counterfeit medicines, which were reckoned to account for almost 10% of world trade in medicines in 2004. A recent study in the Lancet concluded that up to 40% of products labeled as containing the antimalarial drug artusenate contain no active ingredients. Most of these fake drugs are headed for the world's poorest countries. The World Health Organization estimates that 60% of counterfeit medicine cases occur in developing countries.

The popular view is that buying a fake is a win-win game, so long as you know what you are paying for. Everyone enjoys a bargain. But it's far too easy -- and wrong -- to write off this kind of crime as not really harmful to anyone. Counterfeiting is big business for criminal organizations that can affect entire sectors of the international economy. And when pirates move into fake medicines and fake car-parts, we move from rip-offs to potential tragedy.

The scale of counterfeiting matters enormously for the EU and the U.S., who compete on their reserves of innovation, invention and high-quality design and production. Piracy strips that comparative advantage away. Our economies are adapting to low-cost competition from the developing world. We have a right to expect that our own comparative advantages be respected.

But it is not just the developed world that has a stake in this fight. Tolerating counterfeiting almost inevitably backfires. Developing countries that tolerate the existence of a parallel illicit economy in their market will quickly lose the confidence of foreign investors and services traders, and the technology transfer that these bring with them. They also undermine the development of innovative and creative businesses in their own economy. Although China is now taking steps to better enforce its intellectual-property laws, it has for too long turned a blind eye to these problems. Ironically, customs authorities are now intercepting increasing numbers of Beijing 2008 Olympic knockoffs.

It is time for a new global strategy and a much tougher global approach. All members of the World Trade Organization have signed agreements to fight counterfeiting. The new focus has to be on enforcing the rules we already have against counterfeiting and piracy in particular. Countries that have signed up to these rules should no longer expect an easy ride if they don't implement them.

Our initial efforts will focus on working more closely together to address challenges in China and Russia. But we also have major concerns in Asia, Latin America and the Middle East. We recognize that it is not always easy for developing countries to tackle intellectual-property theft effectively, and we will help these countries reinforce their own efforts.

American and European industries are right alongside us. They have long demanded better international intellectual-property protection. An integral part of the EU-U.S. strategy is the development of public-private partnerships in third countries, working with industry to pool information and intelligence and to jointly address the enforcement problem.

The competitiveness of European and American industry depends on respect for intellectual property, and so do the health, safety and security of our citizens. But everyone in the global economy benefits when intellectual-property rights are secured. The EU-U.S. joint action is a clear signal that we will work with our trading partners to ensure that their legal commitments on intellectual property are accompanied by a genuine willingness to tackle the problem at their borders, in their courts and on their streets.

Mr. Gutierrez is U.S. secretary of commerce, Mr. Verheugen vice president of the European Commission for enterprise and industry, Mr. Mandelson EU trade commissioner, and Ms. Schwab the U.S. trade representative.

Two Views Of Justice Fuel Bolivian Land Battle (WP)

By Monte Reel

OKINAWA, Bolivia -- Choei Yara sleeps in a boxy room in the back of his roadside dry goods store, and the lump under his thin pillow is a loaded .45-caliber pistol. It is intended for a specific emergency: an attack so sudden that he'd be unable to reach the pump-action shotgun that leans against a bare concrete wall, just five feet away.

He's not afraid of the store being robbed, but he believes that the piece of paper stating that he owns about 1,400 acres of fertile soil is the kind of thing that can drive men to violent extremes. Property in Latin America is more unevenly distributed than anywhere on the planet, and Bolivia is no exception. But this month the country began a project to shuffle ownership rights affecting 20 percent of its land area, giving most of it to the poor. And tensions are starting to boil.

Those with land are starting to dig in to protect their turf. Those without it, emboldened by the recent government announcements, are taking over more properties on their own, without government approval.

"I've worked this land for 30 years, and I have never had a problem until this past year," said Yara, 63, whose family was among the Japanese immigrants who founded this community in eastern Bolivia after World War II. "But now I get death threats from the landless peasants, and they are threatening to kidnap my family. No one respects private property anymore, not even the government."

On June 9, one man was shot dead and more than a dozen were wounded in clashes as local authorities tried to evict peasants from land they had taken over in western Bolivia. Two days before that incident, two men were shot in similar circumstances in the central region. In this eastern province of Santa Cruz, agricultural organizations have threatened to form self-defense groups to protect farm property if the state tries to take it away. And across the border in Brazil, where property-related violence has been a problem for decades, a federation of landless peasants stormed the parliament building in the capital on June 7, breaking open the glass doors and demanding agrarian reforms.

The conflict in Bolivia is firmly rooted in the stark inequities that President Evo Morales says his "agrarian revolution" is designed to correct. About 90 percent of Bolivian land is owned by the wealthiest 7 percent of the population. Imbalances like that have helped make Bolivia South America's poorest nation: About 63 percent of its citizens -- and nearly 80 percent of its rural population -- live in poverty.

Morales has said much of his nation's land is not being used productively, and he complains that large swaths were given to wealthy elites during the dictatorships of the 1970s. Under his plan, if the government deems land unproductive or obtained illegally, it is subject to confiscation and redistribution.

The tension now, however, is concentrated not so much in the places where land is clearly unproductive as in the places where the definitions of productivity are more subjective and open to argument. Like Yara's place.Armed Guards

Standing behind a rusty pan scale, Yara tilts his head slightly and eyes customers warily when they enter his store, where sacks of potatoes and rice sit on worn planks in the middle of the floor. The way he figures it, he's one unjust decision away from losing everything, and these days he sees injustice in a lot of familiar faces he used to trust.

" 'Bolivian land should be for Bolivians' -- that's what they're telling me now," said Yara, watching one of his daughters weigh rice he'd grown on his land. "It's not right. I've always been supportive of Bolivia. I pay all my taxes. My children are Bolivians, and they're married to Bolivians. I sacrificed a lot to get that land."

Yara took out bank loans three decades ago, paying about $80,000 over the years for his deed. But in the past year, landless peasants have moved onto the fringes of his property, bringing in tractors and planting their own crops on it. He said they told him it was their right to take it because it was unproductive; he said it was just between growing cycles. He sued the peasants twice in local courts, he said, and won both times.

But Yara said that two months ago, Bolivia's minister of rural development -- who oversees the land reform plan -- called him and told him he must remove the 10 armed guards who were protecting his property from a takeover by Bolivia's federation of landless peasants. Yara reluctantly sent the guards away, and now about 50 members of the group, the Landless Movement, are occupying about one-fourth of his property. They keep telling him they'll take more soon, he said, and they promise bodily harm if he doesn't let them have it.

"Now I only have four bodyguards, who I pay to look after me and my family," he said, "but not the land."

Farm guards are a touchy subject around here. After a Santa Cruz agricultural group suggested this month that self-defense squadrons might be the best way to resist what they consider unjust reforms, the government responded by saying it would not tolerate private armies roaming the countryside. Masanori Toguchi, a farmer who helps operate a grain mill across the road from Yara's store, said he recently hired a team of armed guards, effectively clearing out a group of landless peasants who had taken over a portion of his property. The guards are "more or less trained," he said. He wasn't sure where his lawyer found them.

"They don't have phones, and they're kind of hidden," Toguchi said. "We don't really know who they are."Promises of Land

From Yara's store, a dirt road winds for about 10 miles between freshly planted wheat fields before surrendering to weedy overgrowth. After cutting through the middle of a field of nine-foot-high sugarcane, a clearing comes into view: a dirt expanse dotted with dozens of shacks made of sticks and palm fronds. Of the few hundred people living here, about 80 count themselves as members of the landless federation.

Carmelo Ortiz is one. With eight children, his one-room hut is too crowded, so one afternoon last week he searched for fronds for a half-completed addition he hopes to finish in the next couple of months. His daughter wrung a shirt dry over a plastic bucket of cloudy water. One of his sons, stepping out of the dim hut and blinking in the sun, picked a square of mud from his cutoff jeans.

When he can, Ortiz helps local landowners in their fields, earning about $4 for a day's work. But he has dreams of being his own boss, growing his own crops, on his own piece of land. He was part of the group that took over part of Toguchi's land for three months earlier this year, and he was with them when they decided to retreat after hearing about the armed guards. Just last month, he said, he saw guards on another farmer's property shoot at a group of peasants.

Why a farmer who already has a lot of land would get so worked up over sharing part of it, he and others said, is unfathomable to the campesinos in the village.

"God created the resource of land," said Luciano Winchaca, a local campesino advocate who has helped the Landless Movement with its quest for land. "It should be divided equally for everyone, not be given to somebody because they speak better Spanish or come from a certain family. We all have the same rights. These people don't understand the will of God."

That said, most of the landless here say things have never been better. When Morales was elected in December, Ortiz and his neighbors threw a party that lasted all night. With his promises to redistribute the wealth of Bolivia among the poor, Morales is nothing short of a folk hero in the village of Okinawa.

"Everything is changing for the campesino," said Ortiz, 40, who is confident he will get a plot of land in the coming months. "We have hope now -- we haven't had that with any government in the history of this country."

Large-scale land reform has been tried in the past in Bolivia, and it failed miserably because of a lack of resources and political will. The country's first agrarian reform plan was passed in 1953, and another was tried in 1996. After nearly $100 million was spent in an attempt to redistribute 250 million acres during the past 10 years, only 17 percent of the target areas changed hands.

Venezuelan President Hugo Ch?vez -- an ideological ally of Morales who has promoted smaller-scale land reform in his country -- has pledged financial support. But Bolivia will have to find a lot more money to keep the current effort from joining the long list of failed agrarian reforms in Latin America.

If Ortiz gets a piece of land, for example, he will still need equipment to work it and money for additional supplies and seeds. Ortiz calculates that for each acre of land, he would need about $200. He's not sure where that money would come from, and the government has not yet offered specific details on credit and support programs for the new landowners.

"I have lived like this all my life," Ortiz said, nodding to his hut, where his 8-year-old son was helping his 12-year-old daughter carry water. "But we can't live like this forever."

Europe's Green Image Clashes With Coal Reliance (NYT)

By Mark Landler

New York Times, June 20, 2006

SCHWARZE PUMPE, Germany — In the shadow of two hulking boilers, which spew 10 million tons of carbon dioxide a year into the air, the Swedish owners of this coal-fired power station recently broke ground on what is to be the world's first carbon-free plant fueled by coal. The German chancellor, Angela Merkel, presided over the ceremony.

"We accept the problem of climate change," said Reinhardt Hassa, a senior executive at Vattenfall, which operates the plant. "If we want a future for coal, we have to adopt new technologies. It is not enough just to make incremental improvements."

But the new plant, which will be just a demonstration model, pales next to the eight coal-fired power stations Germany plans to build for commercial use between from now to 2011 — none of them carbon-free.

"That is really a disappointing track record," said Stephan Singer, the director of climate and energy policy at the World Wide Fund for Nature in Brussels. "Just replacing old coal plants with new coal plants won't enable Germany to meet stricter carbon emission targets."

Europe likes to think of itself as a place that has moved beyond its sooty industrial past, with energy that comes from the windmills that dot the Dutch countryside and the Danish coastline or the carbon-free nuclear plants that dominate France's power industry.

But with oil prices soaring and worries rising about the reliability of gas piped from Russia, Europe must depend heavily on that great industrial-age relic, coal: a cheap, plentiful fuel, but one that emits twice the carbon dioxide of natural gas. Coal-fired plants generated half the power in Germany and Britain during the chilly winter just past.

While Europeans stand out for their commitment to controlling global warming gases, some of their largest energy companies are reluctant to invest in technologies that could further protect the environment, like equipment in the demonstration plant here that will trap carbon dioxide and pump it into underground storage areas. Only a handful of carbon-free plants are planned in the European Union.

There is another downside to coal, evident barely a mile from the plant here. Bulldozers have begun demolishing a 450-year-old mill town, which blocks the path of the open-pit mine that supplies coal to the plant. The last residents are being forced to pack their belongings and abandon their homes for a new settlement nearby.

Such uprooting is an unavoidable cost of Europe's hunger for coal, executives here say. They also say the technology to capture carbon dioxide is too costly, at a time when they are already spending billions of euros to replace Europe's aging power plants. Finding places to store the carbon dioxide is a headache in countries like Germany, which are densely populated and have a history of protesting against the storage of more troublesome pollutants like nuclear waste.

In Europe, where power companies say they have cleaned up the visible pollutants — like sulfur dioxide -- from their coal plants more diligently than their American counterparts, some executives are suspicious of current proposals to convert to "clean coal" technology.

They describe them as mainly public relations ploys championed by the Bush administration and American power companies, even as only a few plants that capture and sequester carbon dioxide are actually planned for the United States. They suspect the Americans are trying to circumvent mandatory cuts in carbon emissions and avoid making steady improvements in the efficiency of their plants.

"There's a lot of media-driven talk," said Alfred Tacke, chief executive of Steag, Germany's fifth-largest power generator, which has eight coal plants scattered in the Rhine, Ruhr and Saar regions.

"In the United States, you defer all investments, because in the future maybe you have the perfect solution," said Mr. Tacke, who was deputy economics minister under the previous German chancellor, Gerhard Schröder. "I would prefer a solution that improves the situation now."

By that, Mr. Tacke means using existing technology like raising the temperature or pressure of the steam that turns the turbine, to make conventional coal plants more efficient. Steag is building such a plant in the Ruhr city of Duisburg — a $1 billion project that, he says, will be more efficient than any rival in the United States.

The debate over coal in the European Union has to be seen within the context of the Kyoto Protocol, a global climate-control agreement that commits Germany and 34 other nations to measurable reductions in emissions of carbon dioxide and several other greenhouse gases.

With a legal imperative to cut emissions by up to a fifth within the next six years, power companies here face a clearer challenge than those in non-Kyoto countries, like the United States or China.

Yet while the Kyoto pact has focused minds, environmental advocates say it has not yet pushed companies far enough. In 2005, without any extraordinary effort, emissions of carbon dioxide in Germany, Britain and other countries actually came in below the caps set by national governments in the first phase of the Kyoto process, which runs from 2005 to 2007.

This, critics said, suggests that the reductions were not tough enough; much of the improvements were simply a natural outgrowth of slow economic growth and the closing of outdated coal operations. Britain and Germany both pledged to impose deeper cuts in the next phase, which starts in 2008 and runs through 2012.

"It's true that the first phase of emissions reductions are not that challenging," said Daniel Lashof, deputy director of the climate center at the Natural Resources Defense Council in Washington. "Europe can make its targets with only incremental improvements."

Though Europeans are united in their concern about global warming, they have a patchwork of energy policies. Some countries, like Germany and Poland, remain heavily dependent on coal, while others, like France and Finland, are redoubling their investment in nuclear power. Italy and Spain use a lot of oil and gas, though Italy is converting some oil-fired plants to coal.

The recent spike in the price of oil has thrown the spotlight back on coal, even in places like Britain, where the industry had been in a death spiral for decades. Richard Budge, a longtime British coal executive, has announced plans to reopen a colliery in South Yorkshire. With financing from Russian investors, he also hopes to build a $1.5 billion power plant on the site, equipped with technology to capture and store carbon dioxide.

After years in disrepute, coal is still struggling for public acceptance in Britain. The government is drafting a new energy policy that is expected to stress windmills and other renewable energy sources.

But economic and geopolitical realities, Mr. Budge said, make a bigger role for coal inevitable. "Wind farms only work one day in three, and nobody knows which day," he said, with only a hint of exaggeration, in a telephone interview.

Coal, he noted, is not a hostage to politics. When Russia abruptly switched off its natural gas pipeline to Ukraine in January over a pricing dispute, gas supplies dwindled all over Western Europe. To Germany and other gas importers, it was a chilling reminder of their vulnerability.

"Fifty-eight percent of the world's gas is owned by Russia, Iran and Qatar," Mr. Budge said. "Coal is on every continent."

Here in eastern Germany, vast deposits of brown coal, also known as lignite, lurk beneath the table-flat countryside. There are similar deposits in the Rhine and Ruhr valleys in the west. Though Germany has been mining in these regions for decades, the supply is far from exhausted.

So great is the demand that the government allows companies to forcibly resettle villages that lie in the path of their excavators. The process is costly and litigious and can take more than a decade.

"This is a very difficult issue for us," Mr. Hassa said, noting that Vattenfall has begun negotiating with 230 residents of a village next to a mine, for a relocation that would not happen until 2018.

Haidemühle, the village being swallowed by the Schwarze Pumpe mine, acquiesced to relocation fairly quietly. Among the few holdouts was Heinz Attula, 84, who said Vattenfall did not pay him enough for his property. But even he was ready to move to a new home provided by the company.

"It's not an easy step," Mr. Attula said, as he walked his dog past deserted houses and a ghostly schoolyard recently. "I've lived my whole life in this town. But I know the mining must go on."

The economic forces are getting harder to resist. Coal is Germany's main generator of electricity, and the government plans to phase out the next largest source, nuclear power, by 2021. Though use of natural gas is growing — Germany and Russia are jointly building a pipeline under the Baltic Sea — last winter's cut-off left a bad taste in Berlin.

"This really changed the thinking of politicians and economists," said Johannes F. Lambertz, a member of the management board of RWE Power, the No. 1 electricity generator in Germany and No. 3 in Britain. "People now talk about competitiveness and security together."

Coal is the bedrock of RWE's business, and its strategy illustrates the tension between environmental progress and the status quo. The company is expanding its huge BoA plant in the Rhine valley, which uses brown coal, and it plans a new black, or hard, coal plant, east of the Ruhr valley. Neither, at least initially, will be equipped to capture and store carbon dioxide.

Long viewed as a holdout, RWE recently surprised competitors by announcing its first carbon-free plant, scheduled to go into service in 2014. The $1.2 billion project would have a capacity of 450 megawatts, more than ten times that of the pilot plant in Schwarze Pumpe.

"We have to be prepared for a scenario in which carbon emission reductions are much greater than today," Mr. Lambertz said in an interview at RWE Power's headquarters in Cologne. "We have to keep all our options open since we face an uncertain future."

With so few details and such a long timetable, critics said the announcement was a public relations maneuver, at a time when the German government is setting the next stage of emissions reduction targets.

"Last year, RWE said it was skeptical about a carbon-free plant before 2015," said Brian Ricketts, a coal industry analyst at the International Energy Agency in Paris. "It's a game between industry and government."

While Europe's longer-term reductions in emissions are still undecided, there is a general agreement that they will have to be radical — if only to compensate for the additional greenhouse gases being generated by China and India, to say nothing of the United States.

The plant at Schwarze Pumpe shows how European industry is adapting to this future. Originally built in 1955 by East German Communists, it was equipped with the best technology then available. But it still contributed to East Germany's reputation for horrendous pollution.

The town's name translates as "black pump," and outsiders regularly assume it refers to its pollution record. Actually it stems from a tale that in the Thirty Years' War of the 1600's, townspeople painted their pump black to trick invaders into thinking the water was infected with the plague.

After German reunification in 1990, the government opted to replace the Schwarze Pumpe plant. The new one, opened in 1998, is equipped with filters and scrubbers that reduced sulfur dioxide emissions by 91 percent, nitrogen oxide by 61 percent, and almost completely eliminated dust. Carbon dioxide emissions were reduced only 31 percent, however.

Vattenfall's carbon-free plant will burn the coal in an atmosphere of pure oxygen and recirculated gas. Three quarters of the carbon dioxide produced by the burning is recycled back into the boiler. What remains is pressurized into a liquid-gas mixture and injected underground. Mr. Hassa said it was no accident that a Swedish company was on the vanguard of this effort. "The Swedish philosophy is different than the German philosophy," he said. "Climate change and environmental protection are more deeply rooted in Swedish society than in German society."

Vattenfall concedes it will not be able to produce carbon-free electricity on a large scale until at least 2015. Still, it says it has little choice but to start now. "In the long run," said a spokesman, Martin May, "we'll have to reduce emissions by 60 percent to 70 percent."

In China It's * Vs. Netizens (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, June 20, 2006

BEIJING

To test the limits of the Internet in China, I started a couple of Chinese blogs — in which I huff and puff as outrageously as I can.

For a country that employs some 30,000 Internet censors, that turned out to be stunningly easy. In about 10 minutes, I started Ji Sidao's blog — that's my Chinese name — on two Chinese Web hosts, at no cost and without providing any identification.

Writing in Chinese, I began by denouncing the imprisonment of my Times colleague, Zhao Yan, by the Chinese authorities. I waited for it to be censored. Instead, it promptly appeared on my blog.

In frustration, I wrote something even more provocative: a call for President Hu Jintao to set an example in the fight against corruption by publicly disclosing his financial assets. To my astonishment, that wasn't censored either.

Desperate, I mentioned Falun Gong, the religious group that is the Chinese government's greatest enemy: "In Taiwan, the Chinese people have religious freedom. So in the Chinese mainland, why can't we discuss Falun Gong?" That instantly appeared on both my blogs as well, although on one the characters for "Falun" were replaced by asterisks (functioning as pasties, leaving it obvious what was covered up).

Finally, I wrote the most inflammatory comment I could think of, describing how on June 4, 1989, I saw the Chinese Army fire on Tiananmen Square protesters. The two characters for June 4 were replaced by asterisks, but the description of the massacre remained intact.

These various counterrevolutionary comments, all in Chinese, are still sitting there in Chinese cyberspace at http://blog.sina.com.cn/u/1238333873 and http://jisidao.blog.sohu.com. (When State Security reads this, it may finally order my blogs closed.)

All this underscores, I think, that China is not the police state that its leaders sometimes would like it to be; the Communist Party's monopoly on information is crumbling, and its monopoly on power will follow. The Internet is chipping away relentlessly at the Party, for even 30,000 censors can't keep up with 120 million Chinese Netizens. With the Internet, China is developing for the first time in 4,000 years of history a powerful independent institution that offers checks and balances on the emperors.

It's not that President Hu Jintao grants these freedoms, for he has arrested dozens of cyberdissidents as well as journalists. But the Internet is just too big and complex for State Security to control, and so the Web is beginning to assume the watchdog role filled by the news media in freer countries.

A year ago, I wrote about a blogger named Li Xinde who travels around China with his laptop, reporting on corruption and human-rights abuses. I hailed Mr. Li as an example of the emerging civil society in China — and the government promptly closed down his Web site. I wondered if I had overstated the challenge.

But today Mr. Li is as active as ever. His Web sites are constantly closed down, but the moment a site is censored he replaces it with a new one. An overseas master site, www.lixinde.com, tells people the best current address.

"They can keep closing sites, but they never catch up," Mr. Li told me. "You can't stop the Yellow River from flowing, and you can't block the bloggers."

In today's China, young people use proxy software to reach forbidden sites and Skype to make phone calls without being tapped — and the local Web pornography is relentless and explicit, ranging from sex videos to nude online chats.

"We're very relaxed now on pornography, but on politics it's very tight," said Yao Bo, a censor at a major chat-room site in China. He explained how the censorship works for a chat room:

Filtering software automatically screens the several hundred thousand comments typically posted on his Web site every day. Comments with a banned word go into a special queue, but Mr. Yao says he ends up posting all but the most subversive of these — his Web site, after all, wants to be provocative to attract visitors. State Security periodically scolds him for his laxity, but he seems unconcerned: "I just tell them I'm dumb about politics."

China's leaders decided years ago to accept technologies even if they are capable of subversive uses: photocopiers and fax machines at first, and now laptops and text messaging. The upshot is that China is much freer than its rulers would like.

To me, this trend looks unstoppable. I don't see how the Communist Party dictatorship can long survive the Internet, at a time when a single blog can start a prairie fire.

The Bleeding Heart Of Islam (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, June 20, 2006

In the early 1990s, Harvard professor Samuel Huntington observed that "Islam has bloody borders." Back then, he was right.

Picture a map of Muslim lands, circa 1993. In the Balkans, Orthodox Serbs were at war with Bosnian Muslims. In Sudan, the Islamist government in Khartoum was waging a campaign of murder and enslavement against the Christian south. Israel was fighting Hezbollah in southern Lebanon even as it signed a peace agreement with the Palestinians -- one that would, in time, literally explode in its face. In the Caucasus, Muslim Azeris and Christian Armenians were battling over the Nagorno-Karabakh enclave, while 200 miles north Muslim Chechnya had declared independence and was about to be invaded by Russia. Further east, India and Pakistan were lobbing artillery shells across the Line of Control in Kashmir.

Picture that map today. The violence at the periphery of Islam has, for various reasons, faded. But the antagonisms at its center have grown.

Look at Palestine, where the ostensibly secular Fatah party of President Mahmoud Abbas and the fundamentalist Hamas of Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh may be in the early stages of civil war. Look at Darfur, where Arab Muslims are slaughtering African Muslims. The dynasts of Jordan and Saudi Arabia are being forced to confront the terrorism of al Qaeda. In Egypt, liberals oppose the Muslim Brotherhood, the Brotherhood opposes the government, and the government suppresses them both. In Iran, the youth confront the clerical establishment. Pro-independence factions in Lebanon are struggling to survive a campaign of assassination and terror by Syria. The bloody heart of it all, of course, is Iraq.

Amid routine slaughter in Baghdad and Darfur, nobody would call the present state of affairs good. But it is an improvement over the previous state, not only because a clash within one civilization is better than a clash among several, but because Islamic civilization has long been in need of a reformation. That's what's happening today in one Muslim state after another: The struggle for power has become a contest of ideas (and vice versa), with fateful consequences and, sometimes, good results.

Take Saudi Arabia. Before Sept. 11, says Hawazen Nassief, a Saudi journalist at the Dubai-based Gulf Research Center, "the Saudi government lived in denial and refused to acknowledge that its blind support for strict Wahhabi religious institutions and preachers was breeding extremism, intolerance and violence." The denial persisted even after the disclosure that 15 of the 19 hijackers were Saudis.

What changed? Ms. Nassief points to the succession of al Qaeda attacks, beginning in May 2003, on residential complexes, government offices, oil facilities and foreigners. "It was a slap on the face," she says. "There was no international player to blame for this deviancy except the political, social, economic and religious climate of the kingdom. The shattering of the viable image of the kingdom led the government to allow critical voices that were previously pushed underground. . . . The minute the government loosened its restrictions, people flooded the media with criticism of the status quo."

A similar dynamic took hold elsewhere in the Arab world as the phenomenon of suicide bombing -- widely admired when the victims were Israeli or American -- boomeranged on Muslims. After Sept. 11, Jordanian newspapers were filled with speculation that the deed could not have been the work of Muslims and must have been orchestrated by Zionists, Christian evangelicals, the Bush administration or some combination thereof. But the delusion and the pretense came abruptly to an end after suicide bombers murdered 63 Muslims at three hotels in Amman, Jordan, on Nov. 9, 2005. The Amman bombings, Salafist cleric Abu Basir al-Tartusi wrote in a Web posting translated by Memri, "cannot be considered Islamic," adding that "he who approves of a sin is like he who committed it."

At an off-the-record session last month of young Arab leaders at the World Economic Forum in Sharm El-Sheikh, Egypt, the sense of exhaustion with the way things are was palpable. A young Saudi on his social life: "I can't go anywhere. Malls are strictly for families. It's horrible." A Gulf State participant on her upbringing: "Teachers don't encourage disagreement. We are not raised to choose. We don't have a culture of accepting the other." An Egyptian on Arab political life: "'Deviant' ideas are dangerous. Young people are suspect. Leaders are inaccessible."

Not that the participants there -- upper class, fluent in English, many of them educated in the West -- were especially representative of their societies. But what struck an outsider was the extent to which the nature of elite conversation had changed. The Arab intelligentsia's stale litany of complaint against imperial America, perfidious Zion, the legacy of colonialism and so on -- what Bernard Lewis described as the habit of asking, "who did this to us?" -- is giving way to a new mentality. Now the question is: "What did we do wrong?"

It's in this context that an event such as January's protests over the Danish cartoons is best understood. The (mostly orchestrated) demonstrations were, above all, an attempt by Islamists and autocrats to remind Muslims that their principal grievances were external, not domestic. They sought to impress Western audiences with the intensity of Muslim rage while silencing domestic critics who didn't share that passion. Burning down Scandinavian embassies, however, does not contented Muslims make. Six months after l'affaire Muhammad, the offending cartoons have faded from memory, whereas the reality of domestic misrule remains.

There is a perception in the West -- general in Europe but strong also in the U.S. -- that the Reformation of Islam awaits the resolution of a centuries-long Hegelian dialectic. The world moves faster than that. Through wireless connections and satellite dishes, the outside world is filtering into the Middle East, mostly uncensored by regimes or imams. Not everyone likes it, but many do, and the difference between them not only bloodies the Middle East, but also, increasingly, offers it hope.

Justice Department wants call records case moved

The U.S. Justice Department asked a federal judicial panel to transfer to one judge in Washington, D.C., all lawsuits that accuse telephone companies of illegally turning over customer call records to the National Security Agency.

The filing Monday before the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation supports a similar request by Verizon Communications, which faces at least 20 class-action suits filed in various cities. AT&T and BellSouth have also been named in complaints.

Verizon and BellSouth have denied providing such customer records to the NSA, while AT&T has refused to confirm or deny whether it provided records to the NSA.

In San Francisco, where the Electronic Frontier Foundation is pressing a suit against AT&T, spokeswoman Rebecca Jeschke said: "We believe San Francisco is an appropriate forum to hear this case. Several cases are pending here. None are pending in Washington, D.C."

Justices Agree to Expand Review of 2003 'Partial-Birth' Abortion Ban

By LINDA GREENHOUSE

WASHINGTON, June 19 — The Supreme Court, acting on Monday over the Bush administration's objection, expanded its review of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act to include additional challenges to the constitutionality of the 2003 federal law.

The justices had already agreed in February to take up the issue in their next term. They were expected to hear that case, an appeal by the administration of a 2005 ruling by the federal appeals court in St. Louis, which declared the law unconstitutional, shortly after the term opens in October.

That argument is now likely to be postponed until November or December, making the issue less visible than it would otherwise have been during the weeks leading up to the 2006 Congressional elections.

The new case is also a Bush administration appeal, but one on which the administration had urged the justices to postpone action until after they ruled in the St. Louis case, Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380. Administration lawyers told the court that the new case, Gonzales v. Planned Parenthood, No. 05-1382, duplicated the other in significant respects, and that there was no reason to "delay the ultimate resolution of the extraordinarily important question of the act's constitutionality."

However, Planned Parenthood Federation of America, which brought the successful challenge to the law in the federal appeals court in San Francisco, urged the justices to add the new case because the appeals court decision had swept more broadly and provided "the most complete available record" on the likely impact of the statute.

The law, which has never taken effect because of legal challenges, makes it a crime for doctors to perform abortions by a method that abortion opponents have labeled partial birth. In its opinion on Jan. 31 invalidating the statute, the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit said the method was described so vaguely that the law could criminalize abortions commonly performed in the second trimester of pregnancy, well before a fetus is viable, thus violating the right to due process.

In the St. Louis case, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit had not addressed this issue, instead limiting its decision to the question of the law's failure to include an exception to protect a pregnant woman's health. Abortion rights advocates have generally viewed the Ninth Circuit's opinion as the more complete and persuasive.

Eve C. Gartner, a lawyer for Planned Parenthood, said in an interview that she was pleased by the court's action. It shows, she said, that "they're open to hearing our arguments."

Ex-agent testifies to probe of Bulger; Says Senate chief targeted in '83 case

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

A retired FBI official testified yesterday that then-Massachusetts Senate president William M. Bulger was the target of a 1983 FBI investigation that was compromised by leaks while his gangster brother, James ``Whitey" Bulger, was an FBI informant.

Robert Fitzpatrick, who was an assistant special agent in charge of the FBI's Boston office from 1981 to 1986, said the FBI wanted to ``get" three of the state's top politicians at the time: House majority whip Vincent J. Piro , House Speaker Thomas W. McGee , and Bulger.

``He was the target, I believe," said Fitzpatrick, referring to William Bulger. But there was ``a leak situation, and it got tanked," he said. ``It just went down the tubes."

Piro, a Somerville Democrat, accepted a $5,000 bribe in 1983 from an undercover FBI agent posing as a mall developer trying to get liquor licenses, then returned it three weeks later. The bribe was to ensure Legislative approval of the licenses. Piro was recorded on tape saying some of the money would be used to ``grease a few guys." Piro argued government entrapment at trial and was acquitted of conspiracy and extortion charges.

A witness at Piro's 1985 trial testified that Piro had demanded upfront money because ``I need to consider some people, like the speaker." McGee denied any involvement. He was never charged. No evidence surfaced against Bulger. Yesterday, Fitzpatrick didn't elaborate on why the FBI targeted him.

Boston lawyer R. Robert Popeo , who represented Piro in the criminal case and represented William Bulger on unrelated matters in the 1980s, called Fitzpatrick's testimony ridiculous and said William Bulger's name has never previously been linked to the Piro case.

``It's absolutely ridiculous to suggest that Bill Bulger would have been involved in anything that would have amounted to impropriety, let alone a matter that would have been the subject of an investigation of this type," Popeo said.

Prosecutors contended that Piro returned the bribe because he was tipped off to the true identity of the FBI undercover agent. On the stand, Fitzpatrick said the investigation was among nine in the FBI's Boston office during his tenure that he believed were compromised by leaks to Whitey Bulger, other informants, or others outside the office.

Popeo said, ``Nothing came to our attention prior to trial, during the trial, or after the trial that gives any validity to any suggestion that [Piro] was the beneficiary of any leak."

Yesterday was Fitzpatrick's fifth day on the stand in US District Court in Boston, where he is testifying in a $50 million wrongful death suit brought against the government by the family of John McIntyre , a Quincy fisherman. The family says the government negligently caused McIntyre's death by mishandling Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi and Whitey Bulger, both longtime FBI informants.

Flemmi testified earlier that he and Bulger killed McIntyre on Nov. 30, 1984, after their handler, FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. , warned them that McIntyre was cooperating against them. McIntyre had implicated the gangsters in an unsuccessful effort to ship weapons to the outlawed Irish Republican Army aboard the Valhalla, a Gloucester trawler.

Flemmi is serving a life sentence for 10 murders, including that of McIntyre.

Bulger, who is wanted for 19 killings, has been a fugitive since 1995. Connolly, who was convicted of racketeering in 2002, is serving a 10-year prison term.

Fitzpatrick, who had urged his superiors to drop Bulger as an informant in the 1980s, testified yesterday that he also wrote a letter to the FBI's third in command at headquarters in 1983, complaining about ``malfeasance" in the bureau's Boston office. He said he never received a response to his letter.

Fitzpatrick said he was concerned that Whitey Bulger, who was being eyed by the FBI as a suspect in at least three murders by 1983, was getting leaks from Connolly about ongoing investigations.

Earlier yesterday, Emily McIntyre, 77, of Quincy, spent an hour on the stand, sobbing uncontrollably at times as she clung to a photograph of her son, John McIntyre.

Justice Department lawyer Bridget Bailey Lipscomb grilled Emily McIntyre about her son's character, asking her if she knew he had allegedly abused his wife and had been charged with drunk driving and assault in the years before his slaying.

``No, I don't know that," Emily McIntyre said repeatedly, defending her son's reputation. ``He was such a beautiful person."

Tenet settlement should chill risk managers on physician referrals; Feds sought 'pound of flesh,' will not go easy on violations

The recent settlement of a case involving referrals and kickback allegations has some observers reeling from the tough stance taken by federal prosecutors. The case should a loud-and-clear alarm bell to risk managers, they say.

Tenet Healthcare Corp., based in Dallas, announced recently that it had reached a civil settlement with the U.S\l "l". Attorney\l "l" in San Diego to resolve the long-running criminal case United States of America v. Barry Weinbaum, Tenet HealthSystem Hospitals Inc. and Alvarado Hospital Medical Center Inc. Most in the industry know it as the Alvarado case.

Two federal juries deadlocked and were unable to reach a verdict on criminal charges first brought by a grand jury in mid-2003 regarding certain physician relocation agreements at Alvarado Hospital, a 311-bed Tenet hospital in eastern San Diego County. "To avert a third criminal trial as well as potential civil liabilities that could still result, the company agreed to a civil settlement that includes a payment of $21 million to resolve potential civil claims by the government," according to a statement released by Tenet. "Tenet has been informed that the U.S\l "l". attorney\l "l" in San Diego will now move to dismiss all criminal charges against all three defendants and will not file any civil litigation in the case."

To conclude the settlement, Tenet acceded to the demand of the Office of Inspector General in the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services that the company sell or close the hospital within a specified period of time or have the hospital face exclusion from health care programs such as Medicare. The OIG had announced the potential exclusion of the hospital on May 8. Tenet announced that as part of the settlement, it will divest itself from the hospital.

Peter Urbanowicz, JD, Tenet's general counsel, says the federal prosecutors drove a hard bargain.

"It has always been our strong desire to keep this hospital and continue providing needed health care to the residents of East San Diego County, as we have at Alvarado for more than 30 years," he says. "Unfortunately, we were given no choice by the government except to sell or close the hospital if we wanted to settle this matter."

As part of the civil settlement, Alvarado and the Tenet subsidiary that owns the hospital denied the government's allegations in the indictments. In both trials, they strongly maintained that physician relocation agreements are a common practice in the hospital industry as a means to bring needed health care resources to communities.

The feds weren't buying it. The terms of the settlement show the feds weren't willing to back down, says Mark H. Gallant, JD, former deputy chief counsel for the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services (CMS) and now chair of the health law practice group with the Philadelphia law firm of Cozen O'Connor.

"This appears to be a case where the government insisted on its pound of flesh," he says. "Unable to garner a criminal conviction in two tries, it responded with the rarely used nuclear option of termination, even absent ongoing quality issues. This signals the fierce concerns the government has about what they perceive as 'sweetheart' deals with referring physicians."

Risk managers should scrutinize every financial arrangement the organization has with lucrative admitters, Gallant says.

Intent can be hard to prove

The crux of the allegations against Tenet was that in the process of recruiting physicians, the organization compensated the doctors for referring patients. Alvardo hinged on what the government says you can and cannot do in recruiting physicians, notes Richard B. Spohn, JD, an attorney with the law firm of Nossaman Guthner in San Francisco. While the rules can be difficult to understand, Spohn says there is plenty of precedent on which to rely and that a good health care attorney should be able to walk you through the many requirements and prohibitions. The risk manager's role, he says, is to watch over recruitment efforts with an eye toward the overly aggressive player.

"Recruitment people can be like sales people and when there is an incentive, they will work hard to close the deal," he explains. "But you have to make sure they close the deal precisely in the way that is allowed by law."

Spohn notes that Tenet-style troubles can arise not just out of technical violations of the law, but also from the culture of the organization. Does the culture of the organization encourage employees to push hard for the growth and meeting goals, with just a wink toward the complicated rules that may be bent or broken?

"The risk manager may be the one who has to step in and make sure there is discipline," he says. "Check the type of culture you have. Is there too much enthusiasm for getting the right candidate? The competition for these doctors can be intense, and there has to be a check somewhere along the line, someone who can step up and say, 'Slow down, we're about to cross the line here.'"

Spohn says the feds intended to send a signal to the industry through the Alvarado settlement.

"That was a steep settlement, a very tough settlement," he says. "It was astonishing in its severity. If their [intent] was to send a message, I'd say the health care industry is saying, 'Message received.'"

Firm being sued under false-claims act

By MIKE DUNNE
Advocate staff writer

The company the state hired to help collect hurricane-damaged automobiles and boats is being sued by the Justice Department over work the firm did after Hurricane Mitch hit Honduras.

The suit, filed under the Federal False Claims Act, alleges DRC Emergency Services of Mobile, Ala., was paid $12.698 million for work in Honduras done by subcontractors who were paid $7.489 million, making a profit of $5.209 million for DRC.

The government alleges DRC falsely stated its qualifications and subcontracted 22 of the 23 projects without necessary approvals. DRC has denied the allegations.

Meanwhile, DRC was the beneficiary of a recent jury decision filed under the same false-claims act in a northern Virginia federal court. DRC and the government sued Custer Battles, alleging fraudulent billing for work done regarding a $16.8 million contract to provide security for the Baghdad airport in Iraq. DRC was a subcontractor for Custer Battles and blew the whistle, prompting court action, according to court documents.

Back in Louisiana, DRC recently won a bid on the state contract to collect and dispose of the thousands of vehicles flooded by Hurricane Katrina. DRC will be working with a longtime Louisiana company, Southern Scrap Material Co., which has facilities in New Orleans as well as Baton Rouge and Port Allen.

Louisiana Department of Environmental Quality officials showed off that work on Monday morning with a media event.

Director of State Purchasing Denise Lea said Monday she was not aware of the false claims suit.

“In general, people are innocent until proven guilty,” she said. “I think that on any of the contracts the state is handling right now, we are providing close scrutiny.”

DEQ is administering the contract, she said. DEQ spokesman Rodney Mallett said state purchasing supervised the bidding and his agency just outlined the scope of work.

Robert J. Isakson, who runs DRC, could not be reached for comment during working hours Monday by either telephone or e-mail.

The suit against DRC claims it improperly subcontracted work, paid for through the U.S. Agency for International Development, to help Honduras recover from Hurricane Mitch in 1998.

In 2000, DRC was the low bidder for work on repairing water systems, sewerage facilities and other infrastructure work in the Central American country through the Honduran Social Investment Fund, which administered the grant.

The lawsuit also alleges that 40 percent of the equipment DRC stated it owned was actually owned by SJ&L, a company working with DRC. The lawsuit alleges that one-third of the personnel listed by DRC were either employed by SJ&L or didn't work or no longer worked for DRC. In one case, the same person was listed with two names.

The Justice Department said DRC was required to notify and get the approval of the U.S. Agency for International Development and the USAID and Honduran investment fund to subcontract the work.

"DRC took steps to conceal its use of these unauthorized subcontractors," the lawsuit alleges.

In legal answer to the allegations, DRC has maintained it didn't conceal its partnership with SJ&L and that its contract was with Honduran Social Investment Fund and not with the U.S. Agency for International Development, so it did not need USAID's permission to subcontract the work.

DRC also said its bid of $17.678 million was well below the two other bids the Honduran investment fund received — for $22.8 million and $34.3 million.

In court pleadings, DRC says the company is still owed $4.6 million on the contract and another contract. Payments were suspended by the judge hearing the case pending the outcome of the lawsuit.

While DRC is the target of one government suit, the company was co-plaintiff with the federal government in a false claims suit against Custer Battles.

After four weeks of legal wrangling and testimony this spring, a federal jury found Custer Battles guilty of defrauding the government of $3 million through several fraudulent acts.

Custer Battles' contract reimbursed the company for its expenses plus a profit. DRC claimed Custer Battles created shell companies to increase its actual costs and drive up its profit.

Under the Federal False Claims Act, a plaintiff such as DRC can collect up to 30 percent of the damages.

In the New Orleans area, DRC is working on cleaning up those abandoned, flooded cars. It bid $33.8 million and was the second-lowest bidder out of nine proposals. The low bid was for $28 million but that company was disqualified for failing to meet bonding requirements

Highmark settles charges it underpaid Medicare patients' benefits

By DEBORAH YAO

AP Business Writer

PHILADELPHIA_Health insurer Highmark Inc. on Monday settled allegations that it underpaid health benefits due aged employees who also qualify for Medicare.

U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania said the Pittsburgh-based insurer has agreed to pay over $2 million in the settlement.

During its own internal investigation in recent years, Highmark already voluntarily refunded $2.5 million to Medicare, which has had to pay medical bills the insurer should have, but didn't, cover.

Highmark also agreed to set up a program to count the number of Medicare patients in its plans more accurately. An independent group will watch over the program's policies and procedures for three years.

"Today's settlement not only addresses the underpayment but it also represents a significant step forward in how insurers operate with the Medicare Secondary Payer System," Meehan said in a statement.

The issue revolves around employees or their spouses who qualify for Medicare but also are covered by a company's group health plan.

Federal regulations dictate that the company or health plan is the primary insurer of the worker and Medicare is the secondary payer. The only exception would be companies with fewer than 20 employees that are not members of a multiple-employer health plan with larger member firms.

Authorities said Highmark didn't fully cover its portion of expenses for these workers, shifting more of the burden to Medicare.

The nonprofit insurer did not admit or deny wrongdoing, according to the settlement.

"The settlement of the lawsuit does not mean that Highmark acted improperly or inappropriately," the insurer said in a statement. "The agreement helps to clarify the operating responsibilities of Highmark and the federal government under the MSP (Medicare Secondary Payer) program."

The U.S. Attorney's office in Philadelphia sued Highmark in 2003 after former employee Elizabeth Drescher filed a whistle blower lawsuit six years ago. She'll receive over $818,600 from the more than $2 million settlement.

Highmark serves 4.3 million members, mainly in Pennsylvania. It operates as Highmark Blue Cross Blue Shield in 29 counties in Western Pennsylvania and Highmark Blue Shield in the rest of the state.

Arab-Americans Sue U.S. Over Re-entry Procedures

NEIL MacFARQUHAR

A group of Muslim and Arab-Americans, frustrated by what they say is the climate of suspicion and fear that dogs their re-entry into the United States from trips abroad, sued the Department of Homeland Security and the F.B.I. yesterday, demanding that the courts protect their civil rights.

The seven main plaintiffs in the class action suit assert that both the United States Congress and the federal government are ignoring the plight of innocent Americans harassed repeatedly because of problems with the terrorist watch list.

The lawsuit, filed in Federal District Court in Chicago by the American Civil Liberties Union, contends that the courts alone can ensure that antiterrorism policies do not repeatedly subject ordinary Americans to detention, questioning, fingerprinting and the like.

"These are law-abiding citizens, and it is too extreme, too offensive," said Harvey Grossman, the legal director for the A.C.L.U.'s Illinois branch, saying that repeated complaints to Homeland Security as well as senators or congressmen barely get a response. "The court is the only forum where these people have a chance to get a hearing."

The lawsuit asserts that repeated border detentions and improper actions of border guards violate the plaintiffs' constitutional protection against unreasonable search and seizure and their right to travel.

Civil rights lawyers and government officials note that the courts have often struck down efforts to limit the scope of searches or questioning by border agents. But at least one other suit, a New York case involving five Muslim Americans who were detained without explanation after returning from a religious conference in Toronto, is proceeding.

"We will not let anybody into the country until we are sure they are not going to do harm to our citizens and violate our laws; it is that simple," said Bill Anthony, the senior public affairs spokesman for United States Customs and Border Protection. He said Congress had given the agency broad authority to conduct border searches. Mr. Grossman said most case law on border searches hinged on criminal suspects, with extended detention and searches deemed reasonable to catch drug smugglers. His plaintiffs are not outlaws and are always re-admitted eventually -- the government could question them at home if needed, he said.

He noted that Robert S. Mueller III, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, testifying May 2 before the Senate Judiciary Committee, could not guarantee that inaccuracies on the terrorist watch list would be corrected within the next five years.

The watch list, maintained since 2003 by the Terrorist Screening Center of the F.B.I., had more than 237,000 names in 2005, according to a Homeland Security report. Some 12 agencies can add names, and only the originating agency can remove a name.

Donna A. Bucella, the center's director, said that matches were made every day from the list and that it was an important tool for local law enforcement agencies. "Obviously there have been a lot of people complaining about it, so there must be ways the U.S. government could refine it and make it better," Ms. Bucella said.

The Illinois lawsuit, expanding on one first filed a year ago, focuses on two main issues. First, those whose names resemble ones on the watch list and who find it virtually impossible to get off the list.

A June 2005 government review found that 42 percent of the calls to the screening center from December 2003 to January 2005 showed that the wrong person was being detained. Second, some people on the list are wrongly categorized as dangerous, resulting in agitated, armed border agents swarming them, the suit claims.

The customs agency says the number of passengers detained for additional checks is relatively small -- roughly 2 percent.

The men suing compare their brusque treatment to that in a totalitarian state.

Niaz Anwar, 55, who fled Afghanistan 11 days after the Soviets occupied the country in 1978 and eventually settled near Boston, said he has been detained nine times since April 2004. In April at the Peace Bridge in Buffalo, he said, a border agent asked him his opinion about the Iraqi war and his party affiliation.

"I was thinking that I was in Moscow during Brezhnev's time," Mr. Anwar said.

Mr. Anthony denied that any such questions could have been asked, saying any officer who did risked termination.

Dr. Elie Ramzy Khoury, a 68-year-old Christian who immigrated from Jerusalem in 1963 and has been an American since 1974, said he had been stopped seven times since May 2002 and now avoided even family funerals abroad because he so dreaded the return. When he complained to Homeland Security, he received a letter back two years later explaining how he could board domestic flights, which is not the issue.

"They never tell me what they are looking for nor what they want," Dr. Khoury said. "I've never done anything unlawful or irregular. I'm a practicing physician and I've been criminalized."

Critics believe the government has not recovered from the shock that the 19 hijackers in the Sept. 11 attacks were moving about freely and has constructed a big, ineffective sieve to try to avoid a repeat.

But the erroneous detentions show intelligence gathering remains poor, Mr. Grossman said. "It is this endless collection of information without any kind of focus, and they allow it to go on and on and on."

Full appeals court will hear S.J. refugee's asylum case

By Howard Mintz
Mercury News

A federal appeals court Monday voted to reconsider an asylum case involving a refugee living in the South Bay who maintains that ethnic Chinese Christian women in Indonesia face the threat of rape and violence in the world's largest Muslim nation.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals agreed to reconsider a March 2005 ruling that found Marjorie Lolong eligible for asylum because of the potential for persecution if forced to return to Indonesia. A three-judge 9th Circuit panel ruled in Lolong's favor, but a majority of the court's members has now voted to rehear the case with 15 judges.

The San Francisco-based court broke new ground last year by concluding that ethnic Chinese Christian women are particularly at risk for persecution in Indonesia, opening the door for asylum claims. The decision to rehear the case with a larger panel is generally a signal that the judges believe the issues have broad importance.

Lolong, 36, left Indonesia after high school and enrolled at Golden Gate University in San Francisco at a time when anti-Chinese rioting broke out in Indonesia in 1998. According to court papers, she applied for asylum after hearing that Chinese women were being raped during the rioting.

Lolong has lived on the Peninsula and with an aunt in San Jose in recent years. Robert Jobe, her attorney, could not be reached for comment.

Woman fights deportation after 10 years here; Zhen Xing Jiang arrived here illegally in 1995 and lived quietly for 10 years. But she miscarried this year in U.S. custody and now is fighting to stay

By Jeff Gammage
Inquirer Staff Writer

After she finished telling her story, her supporters - her husband, lawyer and Chinatown activists - pressed around a coffee table to talk tactics and debate which politicians might be willing to help.

The woman whose future they weighed, Zhen Xing Jiang, sat away from the group, silent, staring at the floor.

Her babies were dead. And her ordeal was not over.

In person, Jiang, 32, seems too slight a presence to have provoked rallies in two cities and headlines as far away as Beijing. Her most prominent feature is the dark circles under her eyes.

" href="http://www.philly.com/mld/inquirer/14856807.htm#recent_comm"Post a Comment

Jiang entered the United States illegally in 1995 and for nearly a decade lived quietly in Philadelphia, helping her husband run their Chinese restaurant. Today she stands at the center of a storm, buffeted by government machinations, legal motions, uncertainty and fear.

At rallies, demonstrators carry placards that bear Jiang's photo, her face partly hidden by a hospital oxygen mask. The "Justice for Mrs. Jiang" campaign is the most visible protest the Asian community has mounted in years - and it's running out of time. Jiang could be deported in 10 weeks.

Her situation has sharpened a divisive political and societal debate about U.S. immigration policy.

On Feb. 7, Jiang was 13 weeks pregnant with twins when she arrived at the federal immigration office in Center City for what she thought would be a routine interview. Instead, as her husband and two sons waited in the lobby, Jiang was seized by authorities, hustled into a van, and driven to New York's JFK Airport for immediate deportation. The eviction halted when Jiang, complaining of stomach pain, was taken to a hospital and doctors found she had miscarried.

Jiang and her supporters say she was roughly shoved into the van, and that, at the airport, the officers ignored her tearful pleas for medical help - allegations the government adamantly denies. Officials say Jiang was treated with extra care because of her pregnancy.

It's difficult to determine the cause of a miscarriage, according to Katherine Sherif, director of the Center for Women's Health at Drexel University. Though miscarriages spontaneously occur more often among women carrying multiple fetuses, emotional and physical stress can also cause miscarriage, she said.

Recently, after months of turning down interview requests, Jiang sat on a couch in the sparsely furnished living room of her South Philadelphia rowhouse. She speaks little English. But with her husband on her left and an Inquirer-supplied interpreter on her right, she described the events of that day - and what her life is like now.

"I have a feeling of uncertainty," Jiang said. "I have a feeling of, 'I really don't know what to do.' "

These days, she rarely leaves her home. She's seeing a psychologist. Asked about her hopes, she said, "I want to stay here, raise my children, have a normal life."

Jiang said she was terrified of being returned to China, of being found in violation of the country's one-child birth-planning policy and sterilized as punishment.

Her husband, Tian Xiao Zhang, 34, also entered the United States illegally and is fighting his own immigration battle. The couple's sons, William, 6, and Jason, 5, were born here and are U.S. citizens.

As the interview drew on, Jiang became increasingly withdrawn, shrinking into the couch, while her husband became more agitated, talking over the translator to emphasize his points in English.

"The government kidnapped my wife," Zhang said forcefully. "Why the immigration was in a rush to send a pregnant woman back to China?"

In March 1995, Jiang left coastal Fujian Province and flew to New York with false documents, according to her attorney, Richard Bortnick, of the Cozen O'Connor law firm. She was stopped at customs, ordered to appear at a hearing, and released, he said.

Waiting at the airport, Bortnick said, was a member of the smuggling ring that helped Jiang leave China. She owed money - fees typically run to tens of thousands of dollars. The smugglers held Jiang captive for three months until her family arranged payment, he said.

Three years later, friends introduced Jiang to the man she would marry. The two found they could talk easily, and both saw hard work as the means to a better life. Zhang also had come here from Fujian, in 1994, entering the country, as he put it, "without inspection."

Zhang said he didn't leave China - he "escaped," like his wife, to seek "a better life of freedom... a better living."

Both have applied for asylum based on the one-child policy, grounds that are frequently invoked but often denied. Immigration authorities said China appears to deal "relatively leniently" with returnees who have two or more children, punishing them with fines instead of physical abuse, although the New York Times recently documented a case in which a man was beaten and sterilized.

The couple worked seven days a week at their King Food Chinese Restaurant in South Philadelphia. Jiang reduced her hours after the boys were born. The family, said Helen Gym of Asian Americans United, a Philadelphia advocacy group, "really tried to live and achieve an American dream."

Authorities notified Jiang in April 2004 that she would be deported the next month. Soon afterward, she was told that, at the government's discretion, she could stay in the U.S. "under supervision," which required regular check-ins.

It is unclear why Jiang was afforded that courtesy. Or why she was seized on Feb. 7. Officials at U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) did not respond to calls and written questions from The Inquirer about the case. A temporary stay of deportation issued after Jiang's miscarriage expires on Aug. 25.

"She hasn't really even had a chance to grieve," said Debbie Wei, principal of the Folk Arts Cultural Treasures charter school, which Jiang's son William attends. "She lost the babies, then she's immediately in the spotlight, but also in jeopardy."

Zhang said he recently sold the King Food restaurant and had taken a job as a real estate agent to devote more time to his wife. Also, the family needs to keep its assets liquid in case it must leave the country.

In August 2004, Zhang was nearly deported under nearly identical circumstances, according to New York lawyer Stanley Mark, who is helping the family.

Zhang managed to avoid deportation when he argued, from Philadelphia to New York to the door of the plane to China, that his seizure was a mistake because he had an active appeal. Still, he spent 100 days in detention, Mark said.

In this country, Zhang and Jiang are but two of an estimated 250,000 illegal Chinese immigrants. In China, Zhang taught high school physics. Mark recalled how, when they fell to talking about science, Zhang picked up a pen and sketched out an equation - Einstein's theory of relativity.

Bortnick, Jiang's attorney, said he hoped to meet with ICE officials this month and persuade them to let Jiang stay permanently. If that fails, he will seek relief in federal court - where Jiang's treatment on Feb. 7 could become an issue. Jiang's supporters have pressed her to file a civil suit against ICE concerning her miscarriage.

Her backers also are trying to have a member of Congress introduce what's known as a private bill, a law to grant her permanent residence or citizenship. Like all legislation, it must pass the House and Senate and be signed by the president. The odds against passage are long.

"Most people who have orders of deportation do get removed," said Mark, program director of the Asian American Legal Defense and Education Fund.

Walk the streets of Chinatown, and you might see activists posting photos of Jiang in a hospital bed, her arm hooked to an intravenous line. Her treatment by immigration authorities spurred protests in Philadelphia and New York. Even now, volunteers gather signatures on petitions.

"I don't want to see the father or the mother go out of this country," said Steven Zhu, executive vice president of the Greater Philadelphia Chinese Restaurant Association. "It's a disaster for the family."

The family's mixed immigration status is not unusual. Estimates are that 3.1 million citizen-children have been born to illegal immigrants, and parents who face deportation often wonder whether it's better for their children to stay or go.

Jiang's allies include State Rep. Curtis Thomas (D., Phila.) and City Councilman Jim Kenney, though she largely avoids the campaign, a dilemma for leaders who think her future could depend on how much publicity they generate.

"You're trying to respect the needs of the family, and what they're going through, with the desire to get this out as publicly as possible," said Ellen Somekawa, executive director of Asian Americans United. "Mr. Zhang is so concerned about his wife, and how she's just really not doing very well."

Zhang said if his wife is deported, the family will leave with her.

"We are scared, really scared," Zhang said in English. "I try to fight to stay here. They say it's an immigrant country, right?"

Feds sue former Alameda exec

Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

The U.S. Department of Labor has sued the former president and CEO of a now-defunct Alameda high-tech company to recover almost $150,000 he is suspected of shorting his firm's 401(k) retirement plan participants.

The civil lawsuit filed June 5 in U.S. District Court in San Francisco claims Richard Baldyga, the former president and chief executive officer of RadixOne, was responsible for distributing the 401(k) plan's assets after the company closed in June 2003, but he did not take the proper steps to pay out assets to some workers, according to the Labor Department.

The suit asks the court to remove Baldyga as a plan fiduciary and appoint an independent fiduciary to terminate the plan and distribute assets to eligible workers.

Baldyga, now executive vice president of sales at San Francisco-based ServiceSource, said Monday that he met with Labor Department officials about this last year.

"I'd worked with them earlier to educate them that the company went bankrupt and out of business, and I've done everything in my power to help folks get their money back," he said.

"I'm not sure what they're trying to accomplish here. I have nothing to hide."

Doctor accused of injecting fake Botox

ALBUQUERQUE_A federal grand jury has indicted a doctor who runs skin-care clinics in New Mexico and West Texas for allegedly injecting patients with a Botox substitute that is not approved by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration for human use.

Mark Van Wormer faces 12 counts of fraud and one count each of misbranding a drug and tampering with evidence, according to the U.S. attorney's office in Albuquerque. The indictment was issued last week.

Van Wormer operates the GreatSkin clinics in Albuquerque, Clayton and Amarillo, Texas. Among other things, the clinics offer laser hair removal, chemical peels and Botox injections.

Botox is popular because it temporarily eliminates frown lines by paralyzing the muscles that cause wrinkles. It's also used to treat migraine headaches, excessive sweating and muscle spasms in the neck and eyes.

During most of 2004, Van Wormer advertised Botox, the FDA-approved Botulinum Toxin Type A. The indictment alleges that he injected patients with a non-approved form of the toxin distributed by Toxin Research International of Arizona.

The vials clearly stated "Not for Human Use" and "For Research Purposes Only," according to the indictment.

Van Wormer is also accused of altering files to make it appear the patients received the approved form of the toxin.

State's PUC on hold in spying requests

PROVIDENCE -- The state Division of Public Utilities should forget about investigating whether two of the nation's biggest phone companies illegally gave Rhode Islanders' phone records to the federal government's biggest spying agency, the companies have told the division.

AT&T and Verizon said that if the division does try to investigate, it won't get any evidence because the whole matter is covered by a blanket of national security and the companies won't tell.

If the division did get some evidence, it couldn't do anything about it, the companies said. First, that area of law has been preempted by the Federal Communications Commission, which has already said it won't investigate the accusations. Second, the matter is protected by the government's special national security privilege.

AT&T and Verizon were replying to complaints from the Rhode Island Affiliate of the American Civil Liberties Union that the companies broke state laws intended to protect telephone customers' privacy.

Thomas Kogut, chief of information for the division, said Thomas F. Ahern, the agency's administrator, is reviewing the responses. Among his choices are opening an investigation, dropping the matter, and asking for more information. Kogut said it isn't clear when the division will decide what course to take.

Both companies refused to confirm or deny whether they were involved in the National Security Agency program, saying they did whatever they did legally. Verizon denied that it had turned over data on local calls, and repeated its "long-standing commitment to vigorously safeguard our customers' privacy."

ACLU Executive Director Steven Brown said the responses were "straight out of George Orwell."

In essence, Brown said, the phone companies are saying, "You shouldn't assume we did anything wrong, and even if we did, it's none of your business, and even if it is, we won't tell you anyway."

The phone company response, Brown said, "encapsulates the Bush administration's unceasing penchant for keeping the public in the dark about its so-called war on terrorism."

The ACLU had accused Verizon and AT&T of "systematic and flagrant violation" of their customers' privacy.

The issue arose in two steps. In December, The New York Times reported that President Bush had told the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on international calls and e-mails to search for evidence of terrorist activity without getting warrants. Then in May, USA Today reported that the NSA had been secretly gathering the phone call records of tens of millions of Americans from AT&T, Verizon and BellSouth.

The ACLU filed complaints with state utility regulators in 20 states, including Rhode Island, on May 24. The division asked the companies for replies by Friday.

In urging the division to drop the matter, AT&T argued that it and other telecommunications carriers enjoy "broad immunities" when acting on the government's behalf on "national security-related surveillance and intelligence activities."

In their responses the the division, the phone companies frequently quoted federal authorities who are opposing numerous lawsuits challenging the accusations about telephone records.

For example, AT&T lawyer Jay E. Gruber quotes the U.S. Justice Department as saying that "No aspect of this case can be litigated without disclosing state secrets" in seeking the dismissal of one of the lawsuits filed against the phone companies.

ACLU PRESS RELEASE: Citizens Call on Federal Government to Fix Dysfunctional Screening System Responsible for Detentions and Harassment on Re-Entry to the United States

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
Contact: media@aclu.org

CHICAGO -- Nine American citizens from across the country today joined together in an effort to force the federal government to implement changes to the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Terrorist Screening Center (TSC) and the policies of Customs and Border Protection that will ensure innocent Americans are not subjected to humiliating and unnecessary detentions and harassment by federal officials when they re-enter the United States.

The American Civil Liberties Union of Illinois filed a federal lawsuit in Chicago today on behalf of the nine individuals who have been subjected to repeated lengthy stops, questioning, body searches, handcuffing, excessive force, separation from family members and confinement by customs officers when they return to the United States from travel abroad. The plaintiffs all report being unnecessarily delayed, while some recite tales of being shackled to a chair for hours and others had their automobiles surrounded by agitated guards with firearms -- a frightening sight for their young children.

"It simply is not necessary for the government to detain these Americans for lengthy periods of time in the fashion in which they have been treated," said Harvey Grossman of the ACLU of Illinois in announcing the lawsuit. "The fault lies in the chaotic operations of the Terrorism Screening Center and inappropriate responses by customs officials. Indeed, FBI Director Mueller recently declined to predict that the problems in the TSC could be repaired in five years. Innocent Americans should not be compelled to bear repeated abuse simply because the FBI and the Department of Homeland Security cannot correct their own mistakes."

The complaint filed today builds on a lawsuit filed last year by Akif Rahman, a native born United States citizen who lives in suburban Chicago with his wife Masooda. Rahman has been detained and questioned by Department of Homeland Security (DHS) officials on five separate occasions since March 2004 as he re-entered the country after business or personal trips abroad. Four of the detentions lasted much longer than was reasonably required for determining Rahman's identity and allowing him to proceed into the United States. On one occasion, Rahman was subjected to unnecessary excessive force during a body search and shackled to a chair for approximately three hours while isolated from his wife and children.

Another plaintiff, Dr. Sammy Rehman, a radiologist from the Chicago area, was detained on June 9, 2005. Dr. Rehman and his family, his mother and his mother-in-law were returning to the United States from a visit in Canada. After Dr. Rehman gave a border officer his passport, federal agents surrounded the family car, holding their hands on their holstered guns. One agent identified Dr. Rehman as "A and D" (armed and dangerous). Armed guards then led Dr. Rehman away from his family and detained him for approximately two hours.

"This event was terrifying for me, for my wife and for our 7-year-old son," said Dr. Rehman. "The physically threatening nature of these stops and detentions seem to be escalating."

The ACLU said the nine plaintiffs named in the lawsuit represent thousands of individuals who are stopped, questioned, abused and harassed at points of entry to the country each year as a result of flaws in the TSC. According to a U.S. Department of Justice report, the TSC administers a database with more than 200,000 names of persons who are claimed by the government to have "any degree of terrorism nexus." However, the report found that the process for classifying these individuals is flawed, resulting in many individuals being "over-classified" and considered dangerous when they pose no real threat to our nation. The Justice Department report alson found that mistakes in the database cause many individuals to be "misidentified" and subject to more scrutiny than is necessary. As a result of these problems, the plaintiffs in today's lawsuit collectively have been stopped and questioned on more than 30 occasions, despite the fact that they are law-abiding citizens. On each occasion, the plaintiffs have been cleared for re-entry to the United States only after punitive detentions.

In addition to the Rahmans and Dr. Rehman and his wife Riffat Mehmood, the ACLU plaintiffs include: Niaz Anwar from suburban Boston; Khalid Bhatti, a physician in gastroenterology in Troy, New York; Shimrote Ishaque, a pharmacist in Seattle, Washington; Osama Jammal, an educational video producer from suburban Chicago; and Dr. Elie Khoury, an OB/GYN in practice in Detroit, and his wife Farideh Khoury.

The plaintiffs ask the federal court to order the FBI and DHS to adopt polices that ensure expeditious reentry to the United States for citizens who are over-classified or misidentified, and to institute adequate training and supervision to ensure that citizens are not unduly detained and harassed upon entering the country.

Roger Pascall, Everett Cygal, Paula Ketcham, and Joshua Lee of the Chicago law firm Schiff Hardin LLP are assisting the ACLU of Illinois in this case, along with Junaid M. Afeef of Hoffman Estates, Sarah Wunsch of the ACLU of Massachusetts, Kary Moss and Michael Steinberg of the ACLU of Michigan, Noel Salah of Detroit and Aaron H. Caplan of the ACLU of Washington.

AP: Police got phone data from brokers

WASHINGTON - Numerous federal and local law enforcement agencies have bypassed subpoenas and warrants designed to protect civil liberties and gathered Americans' personal telephone records from private-sector data brokers.

These brokers, many of whom advertise aggressively on the Internet, have gotten into customer accounts online, tricked phone companies into revealing information and even acknowledged that their practices violate laws, according to documents gathered by congressional investigators and provided to The Associated Press.

The law enforcement agencies include offices in the Homeland Security Department and Justice Department - including the FBI and U.S. Marshal's Service - and municipal police departments in California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia and Utah. Experts believe hundreds of other departments frequently use such services.

"We are requesting any and all information you have regarding the above cell phone account and the account holder ... including account activity and the account holder's address," Ana Bueno, a police investigator in Redwood City, Calif., wrote in October to PDJ Investigations of Granbury, Texas.

An agent in Denver for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Anna Wells, sent a similar request on March 31 on Homeland Security stationery: "I am looking for all available subscriber information for the following phone number," Wells wrote to a corporate alias used by PDJ.

Congressional investigators estimated the U.S. government spent $30 million last year buying personal data from private brokers. But that number likely understates the breadth of transactions, since brokers said they rarely charge law enforcement agencies any price.

PDJ said it always provided help to police for free. "Agencies from all across the country took advantage of it," said PDJ's lawyer, Larry Slade of Los Angeles.

A lawmaker who has investigated the industry said Monday he was concerned by the practices of data brokers.

"We know law enforcement has used this because it is easily obtained and you can gather a lot of information very quickly," said Rep. Ed Whitfield, R-Ky., head of the House Energy and Commerce investigations subcommittee. The panel expects to conduct hearings this week.

Whitfield said data companies will relentlessly pursue a target's personal information. "They will impersonate and use everything available that they have to convince the person who has the information to share it with them, and it's shocking how successful they are," Whitfield said. "They can basically obtain any information about anybody on any subject."

The congressman said laws on the subject are vague: "There's a good chance there are some laws being broken, but it's not really clear precisely which laws."

James Bearden, a Texas lawyer who represents four such data brokers, compared the companies' activities to the National Security Agency, which reportedly compiles the phone records of ordinary Americans.

"The government is doing exactly what these people are accused of doing," Bearden said. "These people are being demonized. These are people who are partners with law enforcement on a regular basis."
The police agencies told AP they used the data brokers because it was quicker and easier than subpoenas, and their lawyers believe their actions were lawful. Some agencies, such as Immigrations and Customs Enforcement, instructed agents to stop the practice after congressional inquiries.

The U.S. Marshal's Service told AP it was examining its policies but compared services offered by data brokers to Web sites providing public telephone numbers nationally.

None of the police agencies interviewed by AP said they researched these data brokers to determine how they secretly gather sensitive information like names associated with unlisted numbers, records of phone calls, e-mail aliases - even tracing a person's location using their cellular phone signal.

"If it's on the Internet and it's been commended to us, we wouldn't do a full-scale investigation," Marshal's Service spokesman David Turner said. "We don't knowingly go into any source that would be illegal. We were not aware, I'm fairly certain, what technique was used by these subscriber services."

At Immigration and Customs Enforcement, spokesman Dean Boyd said agents did not pay for phone records and sought approval from U.S. prosecutors before making requests. Their goal was "to more quickly identify and filter out phone numbers that were unrelated to their investigations," Boyd said.

Targets of the police interest include alleged marijuana smugglers, car thieves, armed thugs and others. The data services also are enormously popular among banks and other lenders, private detectives and suspicious spouses. Customers included:

_A U.S. Labor Department employee who used her government e-mail address and phone number to buy two months of personal cellular phone records of a woman in New Jersey.

_A buyer who received credit card information about the father of murder victim Jon Benet Ramsey.

_A buyer who obtained 20 printed pages of phone calls by pro basketball player Damon Jones of the Cleveland Cavaliers.

The athlete was "shocked to learn somebody had obtained this information," said Mark Termini, his lawyer and agent in Cleveland. "When a person or agency is able to obtain by fraudulent means a person's personal information, that is something that should be prohibited by law."

PDJ's lawyer said no one at the company violated laws, but he acknowledged, "I'm not sure that every law enforcement agency in the country would agree with that analysis."

Many of the executives summoned to testify before Congress this week were expected to invoke their Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination and to decline to answer questions.

Slade said no one at PDJ impersonated customers to steal personal information, a practice known within the industry as pretexting.

"This was farmed out to private investigators," Slade said. "They had written agreements with their vendors, making sure the vendors were acquiring the information in legal ways."

Privacy advocates bristled over data brokers gathering records for police without subpoenas.

"This is pernicious, an end run around the Fourth Amendment," said Marc Rotenberg, head of the Washington-based Electronic Privacy Information Center, a leading privacy group that has sought tougher federal regulation of data brokers. "The government is encouraging unlawful conduct; it's not smart on the law enforcement side to be making use of information obtained improperly."

A federal agent who ordered phone records without subpoenas about a half-dozen times recently said he learned about the service from FBI investigators and was told this was a method to obtain phone subscriber information quicker than with a subpoena.

The agent, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to speak with reporters, said he and colleagues use data brokers "when he have the need to act fairly quickly" because getting a subpoena can involve lengthy waits.

Waiting for a phone company's response to a subpoena can take several days or up to 45 days, said police supervisor Eric Stasiak of Redwood City, Calif. In some cases, a request to a data broker yields answers in just a few hours, Stasiak said.

Legal experts said law enforcement agencies would be permitted to use illegally obtained information from private parties without violating the Fourth Amendment's protection against unlawful search and seizure, as long as police did not encourage any crimes to be committed.

"If law enforcement is encouraging people in the private sector to commit a crime in getting these records that would be problematic," said Mark Levin, a former top Justice Department official under President Reagan. "If, on the other hand, they are asking data brokers if they have any public information on any given phone numbers that should be fine."

Levin said he nonetheless would have advised federal agents to use the practice only when it was a matter of urgency or national security and otherwise to stick to a legally bulletproof method like subpoenas for everyday cases.

Congress subpoenaed thousands of documents from data brokers describing how they collected telephone records by impersonating customers.

"I was shot down four times," Michele Yontef complained in an e-mail in July 2005 to a colleague. "I keep getting northwestern call center and they just must have had an operator meeting about pretext as every operator is clued in."

Yontef, who relayed another request for phone call records as early as February, was among those ordered to appear at this week's hearing.

Another company years ago even acknowledged breaking the law.

"We must break various rules of law in acquiring all the information we achieve for you," Touch Tone Information Inc. of Denver wrote to a law firm in 1998 that was seeking records of calls made on a calling card.

The FBI's top lawyers told agents as early as 2001 they can gather private information about Americans from data brokers, even information gleaned from mortgage applications and credit reports, which normally would be off-limits to the government under the U.S. Fair Credit Reporting Act.

FBI lawyers rationalized that even though data brokers may have obtained financial information, agents could still use the information because brokers were not acting as a consumer-reporting agency but rather as a data warehouse.

The FBI said it relies only on well-respected data brokers and expects agents to abide by the law. "The FBI can only collect and retain data available from commercial databases in strict compliance with applicable federal law," spokesman Mike Kortan said Monday.

Opinion: The ACLU's tortured logic on Gitmo, Bush critics won't accept that detainee abuse is the exception, not the rule.

THE "GOTCHA" crowd has fallen on its face again.

In an effort to show that on the Bush administration's evil watch the U.S. military has been systematically mistreating prisoners in Iraq and Afghanistan with tacit approval or even outright encouragement from its civilian superiors, the American Civil Liberties Union has been demanding the release of dozens of internal military investigative reports. But the two reports on U.S. detainee policy just released in response to an ACLU lawsuit paint a picture quite the opposite of what the ACLU expected.

Though heavily redacted to remove operational details, the reports (by Brig. Gens. Richard Formica and Charles Jacoby) show a Pentagon open to criticism and change, and determined to guarantee detainees the humane treatment promised by President Bush when the war on terror began.

Genuine instances of abuse are noted, but these are very much the exception and not the rule. The reports indicate that many allegations of abuse simply are unsubstantiated — or that the "victim's" story changes once carefully examined. The most serious criticism is that the administration's detainee policies were not adequately communicated down the chain of command, resulting in confusion on the ground about what treatment was permissible. In addition, there was a lack of training on detainee handling. These points have been corrected.

Predictably, the ACLU has cried "whitewash." But what we are seeing is the refusal by administration critics to see anything other than the "torture narrative" they have constructed.

That "narrative" goes like this: Bush and his war Cabinet opened the door to detainee abuse, first by refusing to accord captured Al Qaeda and Taliban members Geneva Convention rights, and second, by permitting the use of aggressive interrogation techniques. Therefore, says the human rights crowd, Bush and other senior officials are morally — and some say legally — responsible for all of the abuses that have taken place since Sept. 11, 2001. Although this story has become holy writ in liberal circles, it is legally preposterous and logically flawed.

As a matter of law, guilt for war crimes can be imposed up the chain of command only when superiors have ordered the offending conduct or have failed to take appropriate disciplinary measures once they become aware that abusive conduct is taking place. But as these reports demonstrate, allegations of wrongdoing by U.S. forces have been thoroughly investigated and punished when called for. There simply is no rule of "strict liability" that would support the punishment of either military or civilian superior officers or officials without evidence that they ordered or condoned abuses.

The narrative is also flawed because Bush has from the beginning made clear that all individuals captured in the war on terror must be treated humanely. This is the case regardless of their legal status or where they were captured. To the extent that abuses have taken place, there is no reason to believe that granting the detainees prisoner-of-war status would have made a difference. The abuse of inmates at Abu Ghraib occurred because the prison was dysfunctional, not because the inmates were denied classification as POWs.

The same is true with respect to interrogation methods — clearly the most controversial aspect of the administration's detainee policy. None of the methods authorized by administration officials over time — including standing for long periods, dietary manipulation and sleep interruption — are inherently torture or inhumane treatment. All could, if taken to a sufficient extreme, cross the line. The only way to guarantee that the line is never crossed would be to eschew any method of interrogation that could, in the wrong hands, be taken too far.

However, the only way to protect civilians against a terrorist attack is to obtain intelligence about the enemy's capabilities and plans, so that U.S. forces can act first. Although many experts believe that noncoercive interrogation methods do work (and that harsher methods do not), these experts tend to be vague when it comes to timelines — and it's the timing that matters. This is why U.S. officials turned to stressful interrogation methods in the first place.

To avoid future excesses, the Pentagon has considered scores of recommendations, and most of them have been implemented. All of this compares favorably with actions taken in past conflicts. Americans can justly take pride in their fighting men and women and in the Pentagon's civilian leadership. If the ACLU was hoping to prove otherwise, it failed.

Opinion: Decision to hear NSA case marks welcome change

The uproar over the Bush Administration's domestic-spying program led this past week to a lawsuit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union against the National Security Agency. In an effort to curtail efforts by the government to obtain phone and other records without a warrant, the lawsuit is one of the first against the many new measures the government initiated since Sept. 11.

The ACLU has an impressive case against the NSA. Its argument alleges that the surveillance program violates not only the fourth amendment to the U.S. Constitution, but also the first. Infringements upon the fourth amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and seizures are obvious. But the ACLU also asserts an infringement upon the first amendment because communications across the world from within the United States are hindered as a result of the program.

But the suit's grievances don't end there. The ACLU also claims a violation of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978. Thus, even if any court rules the program constitutional, it may still be found in violation of FISA, which allows for limited wiretapping by the executive branch. But FISA allows only for a maximum of 72 hours of warrantless wiretaps, within which the attorney general must obtain a warrant. NSA's program of warrantless wiretaps has certainly been functioning for longer than that.

The lawsuit was filed in the Eastern District Court of Michigan, and will be heard by U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor. In agreeing to hear the case in the first place, Judge Taylor has already taken a significant step. Previous efforts by both the Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility and the Federal Communication Commission to investigate NSA's policies have been thwarted, supposedly because the findings would be detrimental to national security. But Judge Taylor declined to dismiss this particular case on similar grounds, perhaps marking a turn of the tide, where potential violations of civil liberties may actually be investigated and heard by the courts.

Until now, the Bush Administration has not answered the charges levied against the NSA surveillance program sufficiently. Instead of debating the charges themselves, its response has simply been that such a program is needed due to the war against terrorism. Not only is such a reply inadequate, it's also evidence of this administration's circular reasoning that works only to suspend certain civil liberties indefinitely.

The American public understands fully that there is a war, but we also understand that we fight this war to protect our liberties and freedoms, not to lose them to our own government. This case is an important milestone in this war because it will determine how far the government can reach into our lives to fight it. But government attorneys will likely not argue the ACLU case on its merits, but rather scold the judge for even agreeing to hear it in the first place. For a nation that prides itself on justice, governmental openness and accountability, that's simply not acceptable. Hopefully, the courts will send an important message that unmonitored violations of Americans' constitutional rights cannot go unpunished.

- Supreme Court Declines to Exercise Its Original Jurisdiction to Hear States' Challenge to Provisions of the Medicare Prescription Drug, Improvement, and Modernization Act of 2003
  Texas, et al. v. Leavitt [United States Supreme Court; Original]. On June 19, the Supreme Court declined to exercise its original jurisdiction to hear a constitutional challenge brought by several states to certain provisions of the Medicare Prescription Drug, Improvement, and Modernization Act of 2003. Those provisions adjust the federal funding that states receive under the Medicaid program to account for the savings that states realize through the Medicare Prescription Drug, Improvement, and Modernization Act's provision of a prescription drug benefit to Medicaid recipients who are eligible for Medicare. In opposing the motion for leave to file a bill of complaint and the motion for a preliminary injunction, the Federal Government explained that the adjustment is a valid exercise of Congress's power under the Spending Clause and the Necessary and Proper Clause.

C. LAST WEEK

- First Amendment Claim Brought Against USDA Official by Meat Processing Plant Is Dismissed
  Munsell, et al. v. United States Department of Agriculture, et al., Civil Action No. 04-1745 [District of Columbia] (Judge J. Lamberth). Plaintiffs brought this action against a District Manager of the Minneapolis, Minnesota, Office of the Food Safety and Inspection Service, United States Department of Agriculture (USDA). Plaintiffs claimed retaliatory regulatory action by a USDA official to punish them for the exercise of First Amendment rights. On May 16, Judge Lamberth granted the government's motion to dismiss, holding that the plaintiffs failed to satisfy the statutory requirement and exhaust all available administrative remedies prior to bringing suit against an officer or employee of the USDA.

- Dutch Court Sets Aside Default Judgment.
  Sonneborn v. United States [Court of the Hague, the Netherlands]. On June 7, we were notified that the court of first instance in the Hague set aside a previously imposed default judgment against the United States in a wrongful termination case. In January 1999, Mr. Sonneborn was discharged from employment with the United States Embassy in the Netherlands. Mr. Sonneborn instituted suit against the United States in 2003, and obtained default judgment in 2004 in the amount of €204,406 (approximately $257,400). The United States contested the default judgment on the grounds that under Dutch law formal notice of intention to commence litigation must be provided the employer within six months of the discharge or the case will be time-barred. The Court set aside the default judgment because Mr. Sonneborn failed to toll the statute of limitations by giving timely notice of his intention to commence litigation. He was ordered to pay the Government €1,684 (approximately $2,120) in court costs.

- En Banc Ninth Circuit Rules that Alien Must Be Given Notice and Opportunity to Rebut Administrative Notice of Controversial Facts
  Circu v. Gonzales [9th Cir.]. On June 9, the en banc Ninth Circuit reversed the Board's affirmance of an Immigration Judge's decision denying asylum and withholding of removal to a Romanian Pentecostal Christian alien. The Court held the Immigration Judge violated due process by taking administrative notice of changed conditions shown in a State Department report issued 19 months after the asylum hearing, without affording the alien prior notice and an opportunity to respond. The Court ruled that the Board compounded the error by streamlining the appeal rather than remanding to give the alien an opportunity to rebut the noticed facts.

- En Banc Ninth Circuit Reverses Denial of Fijian Alien's Asylum Application Based on Immigration Judge's Firm Resettlement Determination
  Maharaj v. Gonzales [9th Cir.]. On June 9, the en banc Ninth Circuit remanded the case for further proceedings. The Court held that the government has the burden of showing that a third country proffered a formal offer of some type of official status permitting the alien to reside in that country indefinitely. Because there was insufficient evidence in the record indicating that the alien was entitled to permanent resettlement when he departed Canada prior to the completion of his asylum process in that country, the Court remanded the case to further develop the record with respect to whether the alien chose not to accept permanent refuge to which he was entitled, or declined the mere possibility of it. Judges O'Scannlain, Kleinfeld, Rawlinson, and Callahan filed an opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part.

- Pesticide Manufacturer Drops Suit to Prevent Release of Business Information Submitted to Environmental Protection Agency
  Amvac Chemical Corp. v. Environmental Protection Agency [District of Columbia]. By order dated June 13, Judge Ricardo M. Urbina approved the stipulated dismissal. Amvac, a producer of the pesticide dichlorovos, brought suit against the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and its Administrator to enjoin the release under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) of portions of five letters alleged to contain confidential business information. When advised that EPA was about to file a motion for summary judgment, Amvac questioned its right to do so, then offered to withdraw the complaint with prejudice "[i]n light of changed circumstances." The motion for summary judgment would have shown that the decision of EPA to release the contested material was valid under the arbitrary-and-capricious standard of the Administrative Procedure Act, the standard applicable to "reverse FOIA" cases like this one.

- Eighth Circuit Reverses District Court Order Awarding Disability Benefits with Instructions to Reinstate the Commissioner's Denial of Benefits
  Roger L. Baker v. Jo Anne B. Barnhart, Commissioner of Social Security [United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit; United States District Court for the Northern District of Iowa]. On June 13, in a published opinion, the Eighth Circuit (Gruender, Colloton, JJ., Heaney, J., dissenting) reversed the district court's order awarding Supplemental Security Income disability benefits, holding that the district court had abused its discretion in going outside the record to impeach part of the record upon which the Commissioner of Social Security had relied in denying benefits. The court further held that the record, considered as a whole, constituted substantial evidence supporting the denial of benefits and remanded the case to the district court with instructions to reinstate the Commissioner's denial of benefits. The court thus found it unnecessary to reach the Division's further argument that the district court abused its discretion in actually ordering an award of benefits rather than remanding the case back to the Social Security Administration. The decision is an important ruling reaffirming the limitations of judicial review of Commissioner disability decisions under 42 U.S.C. § 405(g).

- Federal Circuit Affirms Dismissal of Challenge to FTC Enforcement Action
  Kevin Trudeau v. United States [Fed. Cir.] (Gajarsa, Prost, Clevenger). On June 13, the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit affirmed without opinion the dismissal of breach-of-contract suit brought in the Court of Federal Claims by Kevin Trudeau, a ubiquitous "infomercial" personality known for his book "Natural Cures They Don't Want You To Know About." In his complaint, Mr. Trudeau challenged a Federal Trade Commission (FTC) press release announcing the settlement of a civil enforcement action brought by the FTC against Mr. Trudeau to enjoin his sale of a dietary supplement named Coral Calcium Supreme, which he falsely advertised would cure cancer. Mr. Trudeau alleged that the FTC's press release breached the settlement agreement because it implied that Mr. Trudeau had admitted wrongdoing. Mr. Trudeau sought an unspecified amount of money damages for business injuries resulting from the alleged breach. The Court of Federal Claims dismissed the complaint for lack of jurisdiction, agreeing with the government that the FTC entered into the settlement agreement in its sovereign capacity, and did not unmistakably agree to pay money damages in case of breach.

- Court Dismisses Meat Packer's Claim of First Amendment Retaliation by Federal Meat Inspectors
  Munsell v. United States Department of Agriculture [District of Columbia]. On June 13, Judge Royce C. Lamberth granted the government's motions to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Plaintiffs – a small meat processing plant and its owner, Munsell – alleged that the Department of Agriculture (USDA) and an agency employee, Dr. Nathaniel Clark, had vindictively taken regulatory actions against the plaintiffs in retaliation for Munsell's criticism of USDA policies regarding inspection of ground beef for contamination by the bacteria "E. coli." Both USDA and Dr. Clark (against whom plaintiffs asserted a Bivens claim) moved to dismiss on grounds including lack of subject matter jurisdiction due to plaintiffs' failure to exhaust administrative remedies, as required under 7 U.S.C. § 6912(e). The Court held that the exhaustion requirement of § 6912(e) is jurisdictional, that plaintiffs had failed to exhaust their administrative remedies, and that they should not be allowed to "short-circuit the exhaustion requirement" by asserting that USDA violated their First Amendment rights by allegedly retaliating against them. The Court concluded, instead, that plaintiffs' constitutional claims "fall under the aegis of the jurisdictional exhaustion requirement." Finally, as to the Bivens defendant, the Court adopted the reasoning of the Eighth Circuit in Nebraska Beef, Ltd. v. Greening, 398 F.3d 1080, 1084 (8th Cir. 2005), in holding that because Congress mandated exhaustion of administrative remedies prior to suit against USDA employees, it did not intend for the judiciary to create an alternative remedial scheme for aggrieved parties.

- Court Grants and Denies in Part Motions to Dismiss in 9/11 Detainee Case Turkmen, et al. v. United States, Civil Action No. 02-CV-2307 [Eastern District of New York] (Judge Gleeson). On June 14, Judge Gleeson entered an order granting in part and denying in part various motions to dismiss in a case concerning the arrest, detention, and treatment of aliens of Middle Eastern origin who were incarcerated in the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn, New York, in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. The court found that plaintiffs' claims fell within two general categories: (1) the government used their status as illegal aliens as an excuse to keep them incarcerated while it investigated whether they were involved in the 9/11 attacks, were terrorists, or could help locate terrorists; and, (2) the conditions of plaintiffs' confinement violated their constitutional rights. In dismissing the claims in the first category, the court found that the government was permitted to keep the plaintiffs in jail while it "used all available law enforcement tools to ferret out the persons responsible for those atrocities and to prevent additional acts of terrorism." The court upheld the government's authority to detain plaintiffs for immigration purposes while conducting this criminal investigation and that the length of plaintiffs' detention was within the statutory authority of the Attorney General. The second category of claims, however, survived. With respect to the claims brought under the Federal Tort Claims Act, the court also dismissed the international law claims for lack of jurisdiction and the inadequate medical treatment claims of certain plaintiffs who failed to exhaust their administrative remedies. The court also concluded that 28 U.S.C. § 2680(c) did not bar plaintiffs' claims for conversion, finding that this exception only applies to officers exercising customs or tax functions.

- Government Pays Temple-Inland Inc. $99 million to Settle Tax Benefit Case
  Temple Inland v. United States (Ct. Fed. Cl.)[Futey, J.]. On June 14, the parties executed an agreement settling the last of seven cases holding the government liable for breach of contract as a result of Congress' enactment of section 13224 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1993 (commonly referred to as the "Guarini legislation"). The Guarini legislation eliminated a tax deduction for reimbursed asset losses that plaintiffs alleged they were otherwise entitled to take under the Internal Revenue Code as a result of their agreements with the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation to acquire failing savings and loan institutions. The court found that plaintiff had paid approximately $30 million in additional taxes and lost $121 million of tax credits as a result of the Guarini legislation (the present value of which remained to be tried). The court rejected plaintiffs' claim for a tax "gross-up" of approximately $83 million. Plaintiffs' claims totaling $233 million were settled for $99 million, plus the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation's agreement to reimburse a portion of certain taxes, if they are assessed, upon the settlement payment.

- Court Holds Patents Not Infringed by EPA's Clean-up of Summitville Superfund Site
  Chemical Separation Technology, Inc., et al. v. United States (Fed. Cl.)
  [Allegra, J.]. On June 14, after a trial on liability and damages for alleged infringement of two patents, the Court of Federal Claims held that the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) did not infringe either patent and dismissed the complaint. Plaintiffs alleged that they were entitled to $11.3 million for EPA's alleged infringement by four water treatment plants utilized at the Summitville Mine Site in Colorado to clean up heavy metal-laden water and acid mine drainage. The Court held that one unit, originally sold by plaintiffs, was licensed for such use, and EPA's modifications of it were permissible. As to the three remaining treatment units EPA used at the Summitville site, the Court held that plaintiffs failed to prove infringement of either patent in the suit. Therefore, the Court held that plaintiffs were entitled to no damages and dismissed the complaint.

- Court Grants Summary Judgment in Favor of the United States and Against the State of South Carolina for Violations of the DCIA
United States v. State of South Carolina, [D.S.C.](Perry, J.). On June 14, in this case of first impression, the United States sued various South Carolina state agencies pursuant to the Debt Collection Improvement Act of 1996 (DCIA) for failing to honor wage garnishment orders issued by the Department of the Treasury and the Army and Air Force Exchange Service to collect federal debts owed by state employees. The DCIA authorizes federal agencies to collect non-tax debts by issuing wage garnishment orders to undefined "employers." In its implementing regulations, Treasury defined "employers" to include state and local governments. In cross motions for summary judgment, the state argued that Treasury's regulation is outside the scope of the statute and violates the Tenth and Eleventh Amendments of the Constitution and the plain statement rule. After two oral arguments, the court denied the state's motion in a ruling from the bench and granted the United States' motion in a written opinion.

- Government Files Supplemental Opposition to First Amendment Challenge to Avocado Promotion Program
Avocados Plus Inc. v. Johanns [District of Columbia]. On June 15, we filed a supplemental motion for summary judgment to defend the constitutionality of the Hass Avocado Promotion, Research, and Information Act of 2000 (the "Avocado Act"). The Avocado Act is one of a series of statutes establishing government programs to promote agricultural products with funds collected through producer assessments, akin to the beef promotion program upheld against First Amendment attack in Johanns v. Livestock Marketing Association, 554 U.S. 450 (2005). Judge Gladys Kessler previously held, following Livestock Marketing Association, that advertisements and promotional campaigns under the Avocado Act constituted government speech not subject to a First Amendment facial challenge, and did not violate the free-association rights of the plaintiff avocado importers. Judge Kessler left open, however, whether on an "as-applied" challenge a factfinder would reasonably attribute the generic advertisements for imported Hass avocados specifically to these individual plaintiffs. In response to a market survey submitted by plaintiffs' expert claiming that approximately 40% of the consumers surveyed would attribute the advertisements to these plaintiffs, our supplemental brief argues, with support by a declaration of our market survey expert, that plaintiffs' survey was suggestive, and did not comply in essential characteristics with generally accepted standards for scientific market surveys, and was neither so probative, reliable, nor trustworthy for plaintiffs to sustain their burden of proof of attribution to these individual plaintiffs.

- Lead Investment Scam Defendant Pleads Guilty to Conspiracy
United States v. Melvin Webman [Southern District of Florida] (Judge Altonaga). On June 15, Melvin Webman pled guilty to conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud in connection with the solicitation of investments in CheckMate Financial, Inc. Webman was Corporate Vice President, Secretary and a sales person for CheckMate. In soliciting investments in CheckMate, Webman and others misrepresented that CheckMate had at least one mobile check cashing unit that was in operation cashing checks in Florida, when it had no mobile check cashing unit. Potential investors were also falsely told that CheckMate had numerous routes to cash checks at places such as construction sites, hospitals, cruise ships, and large factories. CheckMate promoted the investment across the country through unsolicited telephone calls. At the plea hearing, Webman admitted that CheckMate Financial took in over $2,500,000 from more than 50 victims.

- Business Opportunity Defendant Pleads Guilty
  United States v. Leonard Needelman [Southern District of Florida] (Judge Cohn). On June 15, Leonard Needelman pled guilty in Ft. Lauderdale to one count of conspiracy to commit mail fraud. The indictment alleges that Needelman and others engaged in the fraudulent sale of business opportunities through Cash Link Systems, Inc. Needelman served as Cash Link's director of operations. Cash Link purported to sell cash-less ATMs to the public, along with assistance in establishing, maintaining, and operating a cash-less ATM business. Potential purchasers were told that after being placed in the locations Cash Link provided, the cash-less ATMs would be used by the public to swipe debit cards and receive a receipt which would be taken to the store's cash register for cash or store credit. Cash Link promoted the business opportunities to consumers nationwide through television commercials, the Internet, and other media. Potential purchasers were falsely told that for approximately $12,000, Cash Link would, among other things: perform the most difficult part of the business - securing viable high-traffic locations to place the cash-less ATMs; relocate any kiosk that underperformed; and give distributors geographic exclusivity. Needelman and others also falsely represented that potential purchasers would earn their investment back in 12 months or less. Needelman and others fraudulently induced over 800 consumers to invest a total of approximately $15 million.

- D.C. Circuit Rejects Effort to Limit Third-Party Subpoenas Issued to Government Agencies
  Youssuf v. Department of State [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. In recent years, the Department has advanced the argument that Rule 45 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which authorizes the issuance of a subpoena to command a "person" to give testimony or produce documents in litigation, does not encompass government agencies, in light of the canon of construction presuming that the term "person" does not include the government. Although some district courts have agreed with that view, the District of Columbia Circuit on June 16, rejected that argument in the first appellate decision addressing the question directly, concluding that the district court in this case should not have relied on that canon to quash a non-party subpoena issued to the State Department by a plaintiff suing former officials of the Somali government under the Alien Tort Statute. The District of Columbia Circuit concluded that the term "person" throughout the Federal Rules has been applied to the federal government, and there was no indication by the drafters of Rule 45 that they meant to exclude the government from the reach of non-party subpoenas.

AMENDED PETITION FOR WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS

Civil Action No. 05-CV-2371 (RCL)

Petitioner Ahmad Mohammad Al Darbi ("Al Darbi" or "Ahmad Al Darbi") seeks the Great Writ. A citizen of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, Petitioner Al Darbi acts on his own behalf and through his Next Friend, his brother Ali Mohammad Al Darbi ("Ali Al Darbi"). Petitioner Al Darbi is being held virtually incommunicado in military custody at the United States Naval Station in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba ("Guantánamo"). His detention is without lawful basis, without charge, and without access to counsel or any fair process by which he might challenge his detention. Petitioner Al Darbi is being held under color and authority of the Executive, in violation of the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, in violation of the fundamental due process principles of the common law, and in violation of customary international law. Accordingly, this Court should issue a Writ of Habeas Corpus compelling Respondents either to release Petitioner Al Darbi or to establish in this Court a lawful basis for Petitioner Al Darbi's detention. This Court should also order injunctive and declaratory relief.

I. JURISDICTION AND VENUE

1. Petitioners bring this action under 28 U.S.C. §§ 2241(a), (c)(1) and (c)(3), and 2242. Petitioners further invoke this Court's jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331, 1350, 1651, 2201, and 2202; 5 U.S.C. § 702; and Articles I and II of, and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments to, the United States Constitution. Because they seek declaratory relief, Petitioners also rely upon Fed. R. Civ. P. 57.

2. This Court is empowered to declare the rights and other legal relations of the parties in this matter by 28 U.S.C. § 2201, and to effectuate and enforce declaratory relief by all necessary and proper means by 28 U.S.C. § 2202, as this case involves an actual controversy within the Court's jurisdiction, and to issue all writs necessary or appropriate in aid of its jurisdiction by 28 U.S.C. § 1651.

3. Venue is proper in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia because at least one Respondent resides in this district, a substantial part of the events or omissions giving rise to the claims herein occurred in this district, at least one Respondent can be found in this district, and all Respondents are either officers or employees of the United States or an agency thereof acting in their official capacities. See 28 U.S.C. §§ 1391(b) and (e).

II. PARTIES

4. Petitioner Ahmad Mohammad Al Darbi, a citizen of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, is presently incarcerated at Guantánamo. See U.S. Dep't of Defense, List of Individuals Detained by the Department of Defense at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba from January 2002 through May 15, 2006, at 3 (May 15, 2006), http://www.defenselink.mil/pubs/foi/detainees/ detaineesFOIArelease15May2006.pdf (attached hereto as Ex. A). Petitioner Al Darbi's Internment Serial Number (ISN) is 768. Id. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi has been held in Respondents' unlawful custody at Guantánamo and at Bagram Air Base, Afghanistan ("Bagram") since approximately early 2002. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi desires undersigned counsel to file this Petition on his behalf. See Authorization of Ali Mohammad Al Darbi (attached hereto as Ex. B).

5. Petitioner Ali Mohammad Al Darbi, a citizen of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, is the brother of Petitioner Al Darbi. See Ex. B. Petitioner Ali Al Darbi has authorized undersigned counsel to serve as attorneys for his brother, Petitioner Al Darbi. Id. Petitioner Ali Al Darbi acts as the Next Friend to Petitioner Al Darbi because Petitioner Al Darbi has been denied access to legal counsel and to the courts of the United States. Id. Petitioner Ali Al Darbi acts as Next Friend in order to assist Petitioner Al Darbi in seeking redress for these grievances. Id.

6. Respondent George W. Bush is the President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the United States Military. Petitioner Al Darbi is detained pursuant to Respondent Bush's authority as Commander-in-Chief, under the laws and usages of war or, alternatively, pursuant to the Military Order of November 13, 2001, Detention, Treatment, and Trial of Certain Non-Citizens in the War Against Terrorism, 66 Fed. Reg. 57,833 ("Military Order"). Respondent Bush is responsible for Petitioner Al Darbi's unlawful detention and is sued in his official capacity.

7. Respondent Donald H. Rumsfeld is the Secretary of the United States Department of Defense. Respondent Rumsfeld has been charged with maintaining the custody and control of Petitioner Al Darbi, pursuant to the President's authority as Commander-in-Chief, his authority under the laws and usages of war or, alternatively, pursuant to the Military Order. Respondent Rumsfeld is responsible for Petitioner Al Darbi's custody and control and is sued in his official capacity.

8. Respondent Rear Admiral Harry B. Harris, Jr. is the Commander of Joint Task Force-GTMO, the task force running the detention operation at Guantánamo.[1] Respondent Harris has supervisory responsibility for Petitioner Al Darbi and is sued in his official capacity.

9. Respondent Army Colonel Michael Bumgarner is the Commander of the Joint Detention Operations Group and the JTF-GTMO detention camps, including the United States military facility where Petitioner Al Darbi is presently held. Respondent Bumgarner is the immediate custodian responsible for Petitioner Al Darbi's detention and is sued in his official capacity.

10. Respondents are directly responsible, individually and collectively, for any activities undertaken by or under the supervision of any agents or employees acting on their behalf, or of agents or employees of private contractors ("contractor employees") with whom any agency under Respondents' authority or supervision has contracted for the provision of services at Guantanamo. All references to Respondents' actions in this Petition include activities performed by Respondents' agents or employees, other government agents or employees or contractor employees.

III. STATEMENT OF FACTS

11. Under the unique and extraordinary circumstances of this case, the factual allegations made "upon information and belief" in the following paragraphs are made pursuant to Rule 11(b)(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, on the basis that those allegations "are likely to have evidentiary support after a reasonable opportunity for further investigation or discovery." Fed. R. Civ. P. 11(b)(3).

12. Petitioner Al Darbi remains incarcerated at Guantánamo, a territory over which the United States exercises exclusive jurisdiction and control.

13. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi desires undersigned counsel to file this Petition on his behalf. Specifically, Petitioner Al Darbi seeks to enforce his right to a judicial determination by an appropriate and lawful authority as to whether there is a lawful and factual basis for Respondents' determination that he is either an "enemy combatant" as defined by the United States Supreme Court in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507, 516, 124 S. Ct. 2633, 2639 (2004) (plurality), or an "enemy combatant" as that term is defined and used by the Executive in the Combatant Status Review Tribunals.

14. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi is not, nor has he ever been, an enemy alien, lawful or unlawful belligerent, or combatant of any kind under any definition adopted by the government in any civil or military proceeding.

15. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi is not, nor has he ever been, an "enemy combatant" who was "part of or supporting forces hostile to the United States or coalition partners in Afghanistan and who engaged in an armed conflict against the United States there." Hamdi, 542 U.S. at 516, 124 S. Ct. at 2639 (internal quotations omitted).

16. Upon information and belief, at the time of his seizure and detention, Petitioner Al Darbi was not a member of the Taliban's armed forces or Al Qaeda.

17. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi did not commit any violent act against any American person or property prior to his detention.

18. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi was not involved in the terrorist attacks on the United States on September 11, 2001, the ensuing international armed conflict, or any act of international terrorism attributed by the United States to Al Qaeda.

19. Upon information and belief, Respondents have not afforded Petitioner Al Darbi any procedures that would satisfy his rights under the most fundamental common law notions of due process, the United States Constitution, the laws and treaties of the United States, or customary international law.

20. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi desires to pursue in United States courts every available legal challenge to the lawfulness of his detention.

A. The Joint Resolution

21. In the wake of the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States, the United States, at the direction of Respondent Bush, began a massive military campaign against the Taliban government, then in power in Afghanistan. On September 18, 2001, a Joint Resolution of Congress authorized Respondent Bush to use force against the "nations, organizations or persons who planned, authorized, committed or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001, or harbored such persons or organizations." Joint Resolution, Authorization for Use of Military Force, Pub. L. 107-40, 115 Stat. 224 (Sep. 18, 2001) ("Joint Resolution").

22. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi is neither properly detained pursuant to President Bush's authority as Commander-in-Chief nor under the laws and usages of war or the Joint Resolution.

B. The Military Order

23. On November 13, 2001, Respondent Bush issued a Military Order authorizing Respondent Rumsfeld to detain indefinitely anyone Respondent Bush has "reason to believe":

> (i) is or was a member of the organization known as al Qaeda;
> (ii) has engaged in, aided or abetted, or conspired to commit, acts of international terrorism, or acts in preparation therefor, that have caused, threaten to cause, or have as their aim to cause, injury to or adverse effects on the United States, its citizens, national security, foreign policy, or economy; or
> (iii) has knowingly harbored one or more individuals described in subparagraphs (i) or (ii) . . .

See Military Order at § 2(a). Respondent Bush must make such a determination "in writing." Id. The Military Order was neither authorized nor directed by Congress.

24. The Military Order purports to vest Respondent Bush with sole discretion to determine which individuals fall within its purview. It establishes no standards governing the exercise of this discretion. There is no requirement that a person detained under the Military Order be notified of the charges he may face, nor of his rights under domestic and international law. The Military Order provides a detainee with no right to counsel, no rights to notice of consular protection or to consular access at the detainee's request, and no right to appear before a neutral tribunal to review the basis for or the legality a detainee's continued detention. There are no guidelines for or restrictions placed upon the length of time a detainee may be held subject to the Military Order. Furthermore, the Military Order expressly bars review by any court.

25. The Military Order was promulgated in the United States and in this judicial district. Upon information and belief, the decisions to incarcerate Petitioner Al Darbi pursuant to the Military Order, to detain Petitioner Al Darbi at Guantánamo, and to subject Petitioner Al Darbi to ongoing detention of an indeterminate duration, were and are being made by Respondents in the United States and in this judicial district.

26. Upon information and belief, Respondent Bush has never certified or determined in any manner, in writing or otherwise, that Petitioner Al Darbi is subject to the Military Order.

27. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi is not properly subject to the Military Order.

C. The U.S. Naval Station, Guantánamo Bay, Cuba

28. On or about January 11, 2002, the United States military began transporting prisoners captured in Afghanistan to Camp X-Ray at Guantánamo. In April 2002, prisoners were transferred to Camp Delta, a more permanent prison facility at Guantánamo. Currently, some prisoners are housed in Camp Delta and Camp Five, an additional maximum-security interrogation and detention center.

29. Prisoners incarcerated at Guantánamo are entitled to test the legality of their detention in the federal courts. See Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466, 483, 124 S. Ct. 2686, 2698 (2004).

30. On a date unknown to counsel, but known to Respondents, the United States military transferred Petitioner Al Darbi from Bagram to Guantánamo. Petitioner Al Darbi has been held at Guantánamo since that date, in the custody and control of Respondents.

D. The Conditions of Detention at Guantánamo

31. Upon information and belief, since gaining control of Petitioner Al Darbi, the United States military has held him virtually incommunicado.

32. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi has been or will be interrogated repeatedly by agents of the United States Departments of Defense and Justice, and the Central Intelligence Agency, although he has not been charged with an offense and has not been notified of any pending or contemplated charges. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi has not appeared before a lawful military or civilian tribunal, and has not been provided access to counsel or the means to contact and secure counsel. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi has not been adequately informed of his rights under the United States Constitution, the regulations of the United States Military, the Geneva Convention, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the American Declaration on the Rights and Duties of Man, the 1954 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees or customary international law. Indeed, Respondents have taken the position that Petitioner Al Darbi should not be informed of these rights. As a result, Petitioner Al Darbi lacks any ability to protect or to vindicate his rights under domestic and international law.

33. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi may have been forced to provide involuntary statements to Respondents' agents at Guantánamo.

34. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi has been held under conditions that violate his constitutional and international rights to dignity and freedom from torture and from cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment. See, e.g., U.N. Econ. & Soc.

35. Indeed, many of these violations—including isolation for up to 30 days, 20-hour interrogations, extreme and prolonged stress positions, sleep deprivation, sensory assaults, forced nudity and humiliation, hooding, and the use of dogs to create anxiety and terror—were interrogation techniques expressly approved for use at Guantánamo by Respondent Rumsfeld. See e.g., Action Memo from William J. 36. In a confidential report to the United States government, the International Committee of the Red Cross ("ICRC") charged the United States military with intentional use during interrogations of psychological and physical coercion on prisoners at Guantánamo that is "tantamount to torture." See Neil A. Lewis, Red Cross Finds Detainee Abuse in Guantánamo, N.Y. Times, Nov. 30, 2004, at A1. The report includes claims that doctors and other medical workers at Guantánamo participated in planning for interrogations. Id.; see also M. Gregg Bloche & Jonathan H. Marks, When Doctors Go to War, New Eng. J. Med., Jan. 6, 2005, 3-4.

37. Since details of the ICRC's report emerged, new revelations of abuse and torture at Guantánamo have appeared, including FBI memos detailing torture and "highly aggressive interrogation techniques" including 24-plus hour interrogations involving beatings, temperature extremes, dogs, prolonged isolation, and loud music. See, e.g., Carol D. Leonnig, Guantánamo Detainee Says Beating Injured Spine; Now in Wheelchair, Egyptian-Born Teacher Objects to Plan to Send Him to Native Land, Wash. [2] Additional details of the cruel and degrading conditions suffered by detainees at Guantánamo are set out at length in a statement by numerous released British detainees. See Shafiq Rasul, Asif Iqbal & Rhuhel Ahmed, Composite Statement: Detention in Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay (July 26, 2004), available at http://www.ccr-ny.org/v2/reports/docs/Gitmo-compositestatementFINAL23july04.pdf. The Department of Defense also informed the Associated Press that a number of interrogators at Guantánamo have been demoted or reprimanded after investigations into accusations of abuse at the facility. See Paisley Dodds, Report Details Guantanamo Abuses, Assoc. Press, Nov. 4, 2004.

38. In fact, many of the egregious interrogation techniques used in the Abu Ghraib detention center and other detention facilities in Iraq—such as the use of aggressive dogs to intimidate detainees, sexual humiliation, stress positions, and sensory deprivation—were pioneered at Guantánamo for use on post-September 11, 2001 detainees. See Josh White, Abu Ghraib Dog Tactics Came From Guantanamo; Testimony Further Links Procedures at 2 Facilities, Wash. Post, July 27, 2005, at A14; Josh White, Abu Ghraib Tactics Were First Used at Guantanamo, Wash. Post, July 14, 2005 at A1.

39. Upon information and belief, the unlawful interrogation techniques used by Respondents at Guantánamo include not only direct physical and psychological abuse but also impermissible conduct intended to undermine the detainees' due process rights, such as representing to detainees that government agents are their habeas lawyers for the express purpose of extracting information from the detainees. See Sam Hannel, Lawyers Describe Guantánamo Detainees, Seattle Post-Intelligencer, Jan. 19, 2005.

40. Respondents, acting individually or through their agents, have stated that the humanitarian limitations which normally apply to the United States military's use of coercive interrogation techniques under the auspices of the Department of Defense do not apply to interrogations conducted by CIA agents or other specially-designated government officers assigned to such work. See Amnesty Int'l, Guantánamo and Beyond, at 27-43, Ch. 5; Eric Lichtblau, Gonzales Says Humane-Policy Order Doesn't Bind CIA, N.Y. Times, Jan. 19, 2005, at A17.

41. In published statements, Respondents Bush and Rumsfeld, and the predecessors of Respondents Harris and Bumgarner, Michael Lenhert and Terry Carrico, respectively, have proclaimed that the United States may hold the detainees under their current conditions indefinitely. See, e.g., Roland Watson, British team to question Cuba detainees, The Times (London), Jan. 18, 2002 ("Donald Rumsfeld, the US Defence Secretary, suggested last night that Al-Qaeda prisoners could be held indefinitely at the base. He said that the detention of some would be open-ended as the United States tried to build a case against them."); Lynne Sladky, Treatment of detainees at Guantanamo getting more scrutiny, Assoc. Press, Jan. 22, 2002 ("Marine Brig. Gen. Mike Lehnert, who is in charge of the detention mission, defended the temporary cells where detainees are being held . . . 'We have to look at Camp X-ray as a work in progress […]' Lehnert told CNN. Lehnert said plans are to build a more permanent prison 'exactly in accordance with federal prison standards.'"); John Mintz, Extended Detention in Cuba Mulled, Wash. Post, Feb. 13, 2002 ("As the Bush Administration nears completion of new rules for conducting military trials of foreign detainees, U.S. officials say they envision the naval base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, as a site for the tribunals and as a terrorist penal colony for many years to come.").

42. According to the Department of Defense, detainees who are adjudged innocent of all charges by a military commission may nevertheless be kept in detention at Guantanamo indefinitely. See Dep't of Defense, Background Briefing on Military Commissions (July 3, 2003), http://www.defenselink.mil/transcripts/2003/tr20030703-0323.html; see also Dana Priest, Long-Term Plan Sought for Terror Suspects, Wash. Post, Jan. 2, 2005, at A1.

43. Counsel for Respondents has also consistently maintained that the United States may indefinitely hold detainees such as Petitioner Al Darbi. In re Guantánamo Detainee Cases, Nos. 02-CV-0299 (CKK), et al., (D.D.C.), Tr. of Dec. 1, 2004 Oral Argument on Mot. to Dismiss at 22-24 (Statements by Principle Deputy Associate Attorney Gen. Brian Boyle).

44. The United States government has acknowledged its plan to begin constructing a new, more permanent detention facility at Guantánamo. Christopher Cooper, Detention Plan: In Guantánamo, Prisoners Languish in a Sea of Red Tape, Wall St. J., Jan. 26, 2005, at A1; Paisley Dodds, Guantánamo Takes on the Look of Permanence, Assoc. Press, Jan. 9, 2005.

E. Rendition

45. During interrogations, upon information and belief, detainees at Guantánamo have been threatened with rendition or transfer to countries where they may be imprisoned indefinitely, tortured and denied access to the courts.

46. Upon information and belief, the United States has secretly transferred detainees to such countries without complying with the applicable legal requirements for extradition. This practice, known as "extraordinary rendition," is used to facilitate interrogation by subjecting detainees to torture. See Jane Mayer, Outsourcing Torture: The secret history of America's "extraordinary rendition" program, The New Yorker, Feb. 14, 2005, at 106.

47. The United States government's "extraordinary rendition" program has been well-documented by key American and international news organizations, including the Washington Post, The Los Angeles Times, and the British Broadcasting Corporation (the "BBC"). According to news accounts:

> Since September 11, the U.S. government has secretly transported dozens of people suspected of links to terrorists to countries other than the United States, bypassing extradition procedures and legal formalities, according to Western diplomats and intelligence sources. The suspects have been taken to countries . . . whose intelligence services have close ties to the CIA and where they can be subjected to interrogation tactics—including torture and threats to families—that are illegal in the United States, the sources said. In some cases, U.S. intelligence agents remain closely involved in the interrogations, the sources said.

Rajiv Chandrasekaran & Peter Finn, U.S. Behind Secret Transfer of Terror Suspects, Wash. Post, Mar. 11, 2002, at A1; see also Dana Priest, Long Term Plan Sought for Terror Suspects, Wash. Post, Jan. 2, 2005, at A1 ("The transfers, called 'renditions,' depend on arrangements between the United States and other countries, such as Egypt, Jordan and Afghanistan, that agree to have local security services hold certain suspects in their facilities for interrogation by CIA and foreign liaison officers.").

48. The United States government recently transferred several Saudi detainees from Guantánamo to the custody of the government of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. See U.S. Dep't of Defense, Detainee Transfer Announced (May 18, 2006), http://www.dod.mil/releases/2006/nr20060518-13076.html (reporting transfer of 15 Saudi detainees from Guantánamo to Saudi custody). Upon information and belief, the United States government is contemplating the transfer of several more Saudi detainees. See, e.g., id. (indicating that "approximately 120 detainees remain at Guantanamo who the U.S. government has determined are eligible for transfer or release through a comprehensive series of review processes.").

49. In a report released on March 8, 2006, the United States Department of State declared that the human rights record of the Saudi government "remained poor overall with continuing serious problems." U.S. Dep't of State, Country Reports on Human Rights Practices 2005: Saudi Arabia (Mar. 8, 2006), http://www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2005/61698.htm.

According to this report, such "serious problems" included the following violations of human rights: "infliction of severe pain by judicially sanctioned corporeal punishment," "beatings and other abuses," "arbitrary arrest," "incommunicado detention," and "denial of fair public trials." Id. Furthermore, the Department of State found that "ambiguities in implementation of [Saudi] law and lack of due process give the minister of the interior broad powers to detain persons indefinitely," and thus security forces continued to "detain persons without following explicit legal guidelines." Id. at §1(d). The Department of State also found that:

> [Saudi] authorities abused both citizens and foreigners. Ministry of Interior officials were responsible for most incidents of abuse of prisoners, including beatings, whippings, and sleep deprivation. In addition, there were allegations of beatings with sticks and suspension from bars by handcuffs. There were allegations that these practices were used to force confessions from prisoners.

Id. at § 1(c).

50. In light of the above, upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi may be at risk of being rendered, returned or transferred without lawful process to a country that permits indefinite detention without process and/or engages in torture or abuse during interrogation.

IV. CAUSES OF ACTION

FIRST CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(COMMON LAW DUE PROCESS AND DUE PROCESS CLAUSE OF THE FIFTH AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES – UNLAWFUL DEPRIVATION OF LIBERTY)

51. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

52. By the actions described above, Respondents, acting under color of law, have violated and continue to violate common law principles of due process as well as the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Respondent Bush has ordered the prolonged, indefinite, and arbitrary detention of individuals including

Petitioner Al Darbi, without due process of law, and the remaining Respondents have implemented those orders. Respondents' actions deny Petitioner Al Darbi the process accorded to persons seized and detained by the United States military in times of armed conflict as established by, inter alia, the Uniform Code of Military Justice, Army Regulation 190-8, Articles 3 and 5 of the Third and Fourth Geneva Conventions, the common law, and customary international law as reflected, expressed, and defined in multilateral treaties and other international instruments, international and domestic judicial decisions, and other authorities.

53. To the extent that Petitioner Al Darbi's detention purports to be authorized by the Military Order, that Order violates the Fifth Amendment on its face and as applied to Petitioner Al Darbi, and therefore also violates 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(3).

54. To the extent that Petitioner Al Darbi's detention is without basis in law and violates the common law principles of due process embodied in 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(1), Petitioner's detention is unlawful.

55. Accordingly, Petitioner Al Darbi is entitled to habeas, declaratory, and injunctive relief as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

SECOND CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(DUE PROCESS CLAUSE OF THE FIFTH AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES – UNLAWFUL CONDITIONS OF CONFINEMENT)

56. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

57. By the actions described above, Respondents, acting under color of law, have violated and continue to violate Petitioner Al Darbi's right to be free from unlawful conditions of confinement, in violation of the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0035638

58. Accordingly, Petitioner Al Darbi is entitled to declaratory and injunctive relief as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

THIRD CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(GENEVA CONVENTIONS – ARBITRARY DENIAL OF DUE PROCESS)

59. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

60. By the actions described above, Respondents, acting under color of law, have denied and continue to deny Petitioner Al Darbi the process accorded to persons seized and detained by the United States military in times of armed conflict as established by specific provisions of the Third and Fourth Geneva Conventions. See Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, Aug. 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3316, 75 U.N.T.S. 135 ("Third Geneva Convention"); Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, Aug. 12, 1949, 6 U.S.T. 3516, 75 U.N.T.S. 267 ("Fourth Geneva Convention").

61. Violations of the Geneva Conventions are direct treaty violations and are also violations of customary international law, and constitute an enforceable claim under 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(3).

62. Respondents are liable for this conduct described above, insofar as they set the conditions, directly and/or indirectly facilitated, ordered, acquiesced, confirmed, ratified, and/or conspired to violate the Geneva Conventions.

63. Accordingly, Petitioner Al Darbi is entitled to habeas, declaratory, and injunctive relief as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0035639

FOURTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(INTERNATIONAL HUMANITARIAN AND HUMAN RIGHTS LAW – ARBITRARY DENIAL OF DUE PROCESS)

64. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

65. By the actions described above, Respondents have denied and continue to deny Petitioner Al Darbi the process due to persons seized and detained by the United States military in times of armed conflict, established by customary international humanitarian and human rights law as reflected, expressed, and defined in multilateral treaties and other international instruments and domestic judicial decisions, and other authorities.

66. Because Respondents are detaining Petitioner Al Darbi "under or by color of the authority of the United States," they are violating 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(1), and because Respondents are detaining Petitioner Al Darbi "in violation of the Constitution or laws or treaties of the United States," they are also violating 28 U.S.C. § 2241(c)(3).

67. Accordingly, Petitioner is entitled to habeas, declaratory, and injunctive relief as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

FIFTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(ALIEN TORT STATUTE – TORTURE)

68. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

69. By the actions described above, Respondents directed, ordered, confirmed, ratified, and/or conspired together and with others to bring about acts that deliberately and intentionally inflicted severe physical and psychological abuse and agony upon Petitioner in order to obtain coerced information or confessions from him, punish or intimidate Petitioner Al Darbi or for other purposes. Upon information and belief, among other abuses, Petitioner Al

Darbi has been: held in and surrounded by conditions of isolation, constant vulnerability to repeated interrogation and severe beatings, and the threat or reality of being kept in a cage with no privacy; shackled with heavy chains and irons; placed under or threatened with prolonged periods of solitary confinement as punishment for minor rule infractions; interrogated while shackled and chained in painful positions; exposed to extremes of temperature; subjected to violent behavior or the threat of violence; threatened with rendition to countries that practice torture; sexually humiliated; denied access to counsel and family; deprived of adequate medical care; and subjected to repeated psychological abuse.

70. The acts described herein constitute torture in violation of the law of nations under the Alien Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1350, in that the acts violate customary international law prohibiting torture as reflected, expressed, and defined in multilateral treaties and other international instruments, international and domestic judicial decisions, and other authorities.

71. Respondents are liable for said conduct because they directed, ordered, confirmed, ratified, and/or conspired together and with others to commit the acts of torture against Petitioner Al Darbi.

72. Petitioner Al Darbi was forced to suffer severe physical and psychological abuse and agony, and is entitled to habeas, declaratory, and injunctive relief and other relief to be determined at trial.

SIXTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(ALIEN TORT STATUTE – CRUEL, INHUMAN OR DEGRADING TREATMENT)

73. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

74. The acts described herein had the intent and the effect of grossly humiliating and debasing Petitioner Al Darbi, forcing him to act against his will and conscience, inciting fear and anguish, and breaking his physical or moral resistance. As such, the acts described herein constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in violation of the law of nations under the Alien Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1350, in that the acts violated customary international law prohibiting cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment as reflected, expressed, and defined in multilateral treaties and other international instruments, international and domestic judicial decisions, and other authorities.

75. Respondents are liable for said conduct in that they directed, ordered, confirmed, ratified, and/or conspired together and with others to cause the cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of Petitioner Al Darbi.

76. Petitioner Al Darbi was forced to suffer severe physical and psychological abuse and agony, and is entitled to declaratory and injunctive relief as well as other relief to be determined at trial.

SEVENTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF (ALIEN TORT STATUTE – ARBITRARY ARREST AND PROLONGED ARBITRARY DETENTION)

77. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

78. The acts described herein constitute arbitrary arrest and detention of Petitioner Al Darbi in violation of the law of nations under the Alien Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1350, in that the acts violated customary international law prohibiting arbitrary detention as reflected, expressed, and defined in multilateral treaties and other international instruments, international and domestic judicial decisions, and other authorities.

79. Respondents are liable for said conduct in that they directed, ordered, confirmed, ratified, and/or conspired together and with others to bring about the arbitrary arrest and prolonged arbitrary detention of Petitioner Al Darbi in violation of the law of nations under the

Alien Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1350, in that the acts violated customary international law prohibiting arbitrary arrest and prolonged arbitrary detention as reflected, expressed, and defined in multilateral treaties and other international instruments, international and domestic judicial decisions, and other authorities.

80. As a result of Respondents' unlawful conduct, Petitioner Al Darbi has been and is deprived of his freedom, separated from his family, and forced to suffer severe physical and mental abuse, and is therefore entitled to habeas, declaratory, and injunctive relief, and such other relief as the court may deem appropriate.

EIGHTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(ALIEN TORT STATUTE – ENFORCED DISAPPEARANCE)

81. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

82. Through the actions described above, Respondents directed, ordered, confirmed, ratified, and/or conspired to bring about the enforced disappearance of Petitioner Al Darbi in violation of the law of nations under the Alien Tort Statute, 28 U.S.C. § 1350, in that the acts violated customary international law prohibiting enforced disappearances as reflected, expressed, and defined in multilateral treaties and other international instruments, international and domestic judicial decisions, and other authorities.

83. As a result of Respondents' unlawful conduct, Petitioner Al Darbi has been and is deprived of his freedom, separated from his family, and forced to suffer severe physical and mental abuse, and is therefore entitled to habeas, declaratory and injunctive relief and such other relief as the court may deem appropriate.

NINTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(ARTICLE II OF THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION – UNLAWFUL DETENTION)

84. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

85. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi is not, nor has he ever been, an enemy alien, lawful or unlawful belligerent, or combatant of any kind. The Executive branch of the United States government lacks the authority to order or direct military officials to detain civilians who are seized far from the theater of war or occupied territory or who were not "carrying a weapon against American troops on a foreign battlefield." Hamdi, 542 U.S. at 522, 124 S. Ct. at 2642 n.1.

86. Through the actions described above, Respondent Bush has exceeded and continues to exceed his authority under Article II of the United States Constitution by authorizing, ordering and directing that military officials seize Petitioner Al Darbi and transfer him to military detention, and by authorizing and ordering their continued military detention at Guantánamo. All of the Respondents acted and continue to act without lawful authority by directing, ordering, and/or supervising the seizure and military detention of Petitioner Al Darbi.

87. The military seizure and detention of Petitioner Al Darbi by the Respondents is ultra vires and illegal because it violates Article II of the United States Constitution. To the extent that the Respondents assert that Petitioner Al Darbi's detention is authorized by the Military Order, that Order exceeds Respondents' authority under Article II and is ultra vires and void on its face and as applied to Petitioner Al Darbi.

88. To the extent that Respondents assert that their authority to detain Petitioner Al Darbi derives from a source other than the Military Order, including without limitation Respondent Bush's inherent authority to conduct foreign affairs or to serve as Commander-in-

Chief of the United States Armed Forces, whether from Article II of the Constitution or otherwise, Respondents lack that authority as a matter of fact and law.

89. Accordingly, Petitioner Al Darbi is entitled to habeas, declaratory, and injunctive relief, as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

TENTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(VIOLATION OF THE APA – ARBITRARY AND CAPRICIOUS UNLAWFUL DETENTION)

90. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

91. Army Regulation 190-8 prohibits the detention of civilians who were seized away from the field of battle or outside occupied territory or who were not engaged in combat against the United States. See Enemy Prisoners of War, Retained Personnel, Civilian Internees and Other Detainees, A.R. 190-8 (Oct. 1, 1997), at 1-6(g), available at http://www.usapa.army.mil/pdffiles/r190_8.pdf (hereinafter "Army Reg. 190-8") ("Persons who have been determined by a competent tribunal not to be entitled to prisoner of war status may not be executed, imprisoned, or otherwise penalized without further proceedings to determine what acts they have committed and what penalty should be imposed.").

92. By arbitrarily and capriciously detaining Petitioner Al Darbi in military custody in the manner described above, Respondents have acted and continue to act ultra vires and unlawfully in violation of the Administrative Procedures Act, 5 U.S.C. § 706(2).

93. Accordingly, Petitioner Al Darbi is entitled to habeas, declaratory, and injunctive relief, as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0035645

ELEVENTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(VIOLATION OF THE APA – ARBITRARY AND CAPRICIOUS DENIAL OF DUE PROCESS)

94. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

95. Through the actions described above, Respondents, acting under color of law, have arbitrarily and capriciously denied and continue to deny Petitioner Al Darbi the process accorded to persons seized and detained by the United States military in times of armed conflict as established by Army Regulation 190-8 in violation of the Administrative Procedures Act, 5 U.S.C. § 706(2).

96. Accordingly, Petitioner Al Darbi is entitled to habeas, declaratory, and injunctive relief, as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

TWELFTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(VIOLATION OF THE APA – TORTURE AND CRUEL, INHUMAN OR DEGRADING TREATMENT)

97. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

98. Through the actions described above, Respondents have acted and continue to act arbitrarily and capriciously by directing, ordering, confirming, ratifying, and/or conspiring to unlawfully subject Petitioner Al Darbi to torture and/or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment in violation of Army Reg. 190-8 and the Administrative Procedures Act, 5 U.S.C. § 706(2). See Army Reg. 190-8, at 1-5(b) ("The following acts are prohibited: murder, torture, corporal punishment, mutilation, the taking of hostages, sensory deprivation, collective punishments, execution without trial by proper authority, and all cruel and degrading treatment.").

99. Accordingly, Petitioner Al Darbi is entitled to declaratory and injunctive relief, as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

THIRTEENTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(VIOLATION OF THE RIGHT TO COUNSEL AND TO ACCESS TO THE COURTS)

100. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

101. Respondents, purportedly acting from a concern for national security, consistently have contrived to intrude upon Petitioner Al Darbi's right to consult with counsel by conditioning counsel's access to Petitioner Al Darbi on unreasonable terms, including classification/declassification procedures, all in violation of Petitioner Al Darbi's attorney-client privilege, his work product privilege, and the Fifth and Sixth Amendments to the United States Constitution.

102. Accordingly, Petitioner Al Darbi is entitled to habeas, declaratory, and injunctive relief, as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

FOURTEENTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(DUE PROCESS CLAUSE – RENDITION)

103. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

104. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi is at risk of being rendered, expelled or returned without lawful procedures to a country that engages in torture. The transfer of Petitioner Al Darbi to a country where there is a foreseeable and direct risk that he will be subjected to torture constitutes a violation of his rights under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

105. Accordingly, Petitioner Al Darbi is entitled to declaratory and injunctive relief, as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

FIFTEENTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(CONVENTION AGAINST TORTURE AND CONVENTION RELATING TO THE STATUS OF REFUGEES – RENDITION)

106. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

107. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi is at risk of being rendered, expelled or returned without lawful procedures to a country that engages in torture. The transfer of Petitioner Al Darbi to a country where there is a foreseeable and direct risk that he will be subjected to torture constitutes a direct violation of Petitioner's rights under the Covenant Against Torture and the 1954 United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, entered into force Apr. 22, 1954, 19 U.S.T. 6259, 189 U.N.T.S. 150.

108. Accordingly, Petitioner Al Darbi is entitled to declaratory and injunctive relief, as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

SIXTEENTH CLAIM FOR RELIEF
(ALIEN TORT STATUTE – RENDITION)

109. Petitioners incorporate by reference all preceding paragraphs as if set forth fully herein.

110. Upon information and belief, Petitioner Al Darbi is at risk of being rendered, expelled or returned without lawful procedures to a country that engages in torture. The transfer of Petitioner Al Darbi to a country where there is a foreseeable and direct risk that he will be subjected to torture constitutes a violation of his rights under customary international law, which may be vindicated under the Alien Tort Statute.

111. Accordingly, Petitioner Al Darbi is entitled to declaratory and injunctive relief, as well as any other relief the court may deem appropriate.

V. PRAYER FOR RELIEF

WHEREFORE, Petitioners pray for relief as follows:

1. Grant the Writ of Habeas Corpus and order Respondents to release Petitioner Al Darbi from his current unlawful detention;
2. Order that Petitioner Al Darbi be brought before the Court or before a Magistrate Judge assigned by the Court at a convenient facility to conduct proceedings under the supervision of the Court to vindicate his rights;
3. Order that Petitioner Al Darbi cannot be transferred to any other country without the specific, written agreement of Petitioner Al Darbi and his counsel while this action is pending;
4. Order that Petitioner Al Darbi cannot be delivered, returned, or rendered to a country where there is a foreseeable and imminent risk that he will be subject to torture;
5. Order Respondents to allow counsel to meet and confer in person with Petitioner Al Darbi, in private and unmonitored attorney-client conversations;
6. Order Respondents to cease all interrogations of Petitioner Al Darbi, direct or indirect, while this litigation is pending;
7. Order Respondents to cease all acts of torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of Petitioner Al Darbi;
8. Order and declare that the Military Order to be ultra vires and unlawful in violation of Article II of the United States Constitution, the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution, the Uniform Code of Military Justice, the Administrative Procedures Act, 5 U.S.C. § 702, the treaties of the United States and customary international law;

9. Order and declare that the prolonged, indefinite, and restrictive detention of Petitioner Al Darbi without due process is arbitrary and unlawful and a deprivation of liberty without due process in violation of common law principles of due process, the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution, the regulations of the United States military, the treaties of the United States, and customary international humanitarian law; and

10. Grant such other relief as the Court may deem necessary and appropriate to protect Petitioner's rights under the common law, the United States Constitution, federal statutory law, and international law, including, if necessary, designating Petitioner Ali Al Darbi to act as Next Friend of Petitioner Ahmad Al Darbi.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

NAZUL GUL, Petitioner, v. GEORGE W. BUSH, et al., Respondents.	CV 05-888 (CKK) MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF MOTION TO MODIFY STAY TO DIRECT RESPONDENTS TO PRODUCE FACTUAL RETURN

The petitioner, Nazul (Nazar) Gul, through undersigned counsel, respectfully submits this Memorandum in support of his motion to modify the stay to direct respondents to produce a full factual return.

I. INTRODUCTION

In March 2006, pursuant to litigation with the Associated Press (AP), respondents released a large number of Combatant Status Review Tribunal (CSRT) documents related to the detainees held at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba. Recognizing that the current protective order entered in this case "includes provisions ensuring meaningful access to counsel," on March 1, 2006, this Court specifically ordered respondents to provide directly to Mr. Gul's counsel the same information respondents planned to release to the AP prior to counsels' first meeting with Mr. Gul at Guantanamo . CR23.[1] The following month, respondents released another batch of documents. These documents related to the Administrative Review Board (ARB) proceedings. The transcript of Mr. Gul's ARB proceeding was included in this second batch of documents.

The unclassified documents released by respondents in Mr. Gul's case to date (i.e., the transcripts of military review proceedings) are riddled with inconsistent allegations that undermine the basis of his detention. Respondents have neither proffered nor produced any evidence to support his indefinite detention. Counsel, otherwise confounded as to the basis of Mr. Gul's continued detention, respectfully request, therefore, that the Court modify the stay and direct respondents to submit justification for Mr. Gul's detention in the form of a complete factual return.

II. BACKGROUND ON DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE PROCEEDINGS, WHICH PROVIDE NEW INFORMATION IN THIS CASE.

In order to fully appreciate the importance of the documents most recently released by respondents in Mr. Gul's case, a brief background of respondents' classification standards and procedures for Guantanamo detainees is necessary.

A. Initial Field Designation As "Enemy Combatant"

According to Department of Defense (DoD) documents, all initial classifications of individuals as "enemy combatants" are made at the time of capture "in a hostile environment" by combatant and field commanders. Guantanamo Detainees, available at http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Apr2004/d20040406gua.pdf. The standard applied is "whether a captured individual was part of or supporting forces hostile to the United States or coalition partners, and engaged in armed conflict against the United States." Id. "Such persons are enemy combatants." Id. DoD officials, with recommendations from a "general officer" and military screening team, make the ultimate decision as to whether to transfer a detainee to Guantanamo for detention. Id.

B. Combatant Status Review Tribunal (CSRT) Proceedings.

On July 7, 2004, in response to the Supreme Court's decisions in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004), and Rasul v. Bush, 542 U.S. 466 (2004), the DoD announced its creation of CSRT procedures in order to "provide detainees at the Guantanamo Bay Naval Base with notice of the basis of their detention and an opportunity for them to contest their detention as enemy combatants." Defense Department CSRT Background Briefing, available at http://www.defenselink.mil/transcripts/2004/tr20040707-0981.html. The CSRT is a one-time review at Guantanamo of the initial field designation of "enemy combatant" status. A detainee is permitted to attend only the unclassified aspects of the CSRT proceeding and permitted to access only the unclassified portions of any evidence against him. http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jul2004/d20040707review.pdf at page 2.[2]

The CSRT defines the term "enemy combatant" as "an individual who was part of or supporting Taliban or al Qaeda forces, or associated with forces that are engaged in hostilities against the United States or its coalition partners." http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jul2004/d20040707review.pdf at page 1. The evidentiary standard applied in a CSRT is whether a preponderance of the evidence supports the detention of the individual as an "enemy combatant." Id. at page 3. There is a rebuttable presumption in favor of the government's evidence. Id. Once the evidence has been presented, the tribunal votes in closed session on whether the detainee should be designated an "enemy combatant." Id. A majority of the three-member panel may determine the status of the detainee. A unanimous decision is not necessary. Id.

A record of the CSRT proceeding is created and then forwarded within three days of the tribunal's decision to the CSRT Director, through the CSRT Legal Advisor. See http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jul2004/d20040707review.pdf at page 3; http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jul2004/d20040730comb.pdf. "The CSRT Legal Advisor shall conduct a legal sufficiency review of all cases." Id., Enclosure 1 at page 9, ¶7. The

[2] The CSRT consists of three military officers who have no previous involvement in the detainee's capture, interrogation, or prior designation as an enemy combatant. See http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jul2004/d20040707review.pdf at pages 1-2. For a complete description of the CSRT rules and processes, see http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Jul2004/d20040730comb.pdf.

CSRT Director then reviews the CSRT Legal Advisor's decision and decides whether to return the case to the tribunal for further proceedings or to approve the outcome of the proceedings. Id., Enclosure 1 at page 9, ¶8. The CSRT Director notifies the detainee of the tribunal's decision. Id., Enclosure 1 at page 9, ¶9.

C. Administrative Review Board (ARB) Proceedings.

The ARB proceedings[3] "determine annually if enemy combatants detained by the [DoD in Guantanamo] should be released, transferred or continue to be detained." http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Sep2004/d20040914adminreview.pdf at Enclosure 3, page 1. There is no stated standard of proof or presumptions to be applied in the ARB proceeding, but the issue is whether the detainee "poses a continuing threat to the United States or its allies." Id. at Enclosure 3, pages 1-4. The ARB may consider relevant information from the detainee's prior proceedings, such as the CSRT or prior ARBs, but "the disposition of those cases is not determinative of the ARB's recommendation in the case under review." Id. at Enclosure 3, page 4. In addition to a determination of whether the detainee is a threat, the ARB may also consider the likelihood of a military commission for the detainee and the detainee's continuing intelligence value.[4] Id. Unanimity is not required; a simple majority is sufficient for an ARB decision. Id. at Enclosure 4, page 3.

[3] Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz created the ARB process. See http://www.defenselink.mil/news/May2004/d20040518gtmoreview.pdf. The Order was implemented on September 14, 2004, by the Designated Civilian Official. See http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Sep2004/d20040914adminreview.pdf.

[4] The ARB Implementation Memorandum delineates 13 separate factors the ARB is to consider in determining whether a detainee poses a threat to the United States. See http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Sep2004/d20040914adminreview.pdf at pages 4-5.

After the ARB has made its determination in a particular case, the record of proceedings and ARB recommendation are forwarded to the Designated Civilian Official (DCO). A Staff Judge Advocated (SJA) "will provide a legal sufficiency review of the ARB proceeding", which is then forwarded to the DCO. http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Sep2004/d20040914adminreview.pdf at Enclosure 3, pages 5-6. The DCO makes the final decision "whether to release, transfer with conditions, or continue to detain the enemy combatant." Id. at Enclosure 3, page 6.

III. INFORMATION FROM DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE PROCEEDINGS NOW AVAILABLE IN MR. GUL'S CASE.

Respondents have finally released to the public information that purports to justify Mr. Gul's indefinite detention at Guantanamo. The release of this information is the catalyst for the current motion as the government documents are devoid of any justification for his continued detention.[5] Because the information released by respondents to date fails to support the continued detention of Mr. Gul, he respectfully requests this Court to direct respondents to produce a complete factual return so that it may be determined whether or not any records yet to be produced by respondents provide any valid basis for his continued detention at Guantanamo.

A. Mr. Gul's CSRT Proceeding.

The unclassified version of Mr. Gul's CSRT proceeding is attached hereto as Exhibit 1. The exact date of the CSRT proceeding does not appear in the unclassified document. Mr. Gul participated in the CSRT, at which time he faced five allegations of wrongdoing in the Unclassified Summary of the Evidence:

---

DOJ_NMG_0035656

1. That he is "a member of an organization that associated with and supported al Qaida."

2. That he "was captured at the home of a suspected Hezb-e-Islami Gulbuddin (HIG) commander."[6]

3. That he is "a member of the Itihad Islami (II), a known HIG front organization, and when captured had an identification card."

4. That he "participated in military operations against the United States and its coalition partners."

5. That he, "as HIG commander, and his brother have been linked to several attacks against U.S. forces in the vicinity of Jalalabad, Afghanistan."

Exhibit 1 at pages 1-3.

Mr. Gul testified in his own defense at the CSRT proceeding. He denied being a member of any organization that supported or associated with al Qaida in any way. Exhibit 1 at page 1. He denied having any knowledge of "HIG or what even al Qaida was." Id. at page 2. He explained the innocent circumstances surrounding his presence at the home in which he was arrested in Gardez, Afghanistan, in May 2003. Id. He denied possession of any sort of identification card. Id. at page 3. He explained that it was "Akhtiar Haji [who] had a card." Id. "I told the people that captured me, it was his card." Id. Finally, he denied participation in any military operation against the United States, either alone or with his brother. Id.

[6] The CSRT alleges that "HIG is [a] known terrorist organization that has long established ties to al Qaida." Unclassified CSRT Transcript, attached hereto as Exhibit 1, at page 2.

Mohammed Akhtiar, the man with whom Mr. Gul was arrested, testified as a witness at Mr. Gul's CSRT.[7] Exhibit 1 at pages 4-5. Mr. Akhtiar's testimony corroborated important details surrounding Mr. Gul's presence in the home that Mr. Akhtiar rented in Gardez, as well as the circumstances surrounding the arrests of both men. Id. Both men independently testified that the identification card located in the home at the time of their arrest belonged to Mr. Akhtiar, not to Mr. Gul. See Exhibit 1 at pages 3 and 5. Mr. Akhtiar further testified that the identification card signified his membership in Itihad Islami, not HIG. Exhibit 1 at pages 5-6.

During his CSRT, Mr. Gul testified that on the day of his arrest he went into Gardez because he "had a toothache." Exhibit 1 at page 2. See also Exhibit 2 at page 10. Mr. Akhtiar offered to let him spend the night in a house he was renting in Gardez to recuperate. Mr. Gul "went there and washed out my mouth to make the pain go away." Id. at page 4. Mr. Akhtiar independently corroborated this testimony. Id. at 5. He testified:

> Your tooth was painful and you went to the doctor to treat the pain in your teeth. After you visited the doctor, you came to my room. I told him you had to stay the night with me and cook a dish for me and pass your night in my house.

Id. at 4.

Mr. Akhtiar was not a long-time friend of Mr. Gul. See Exhibit 2 at page 6 ("My friend Haji Baht knew Haji Ehtyar and through him [Haji Baht] I became acquainted [with Ehtyar]."). They did not know each other well until they met in Gardez. Exhibit 1 at 6. The two men were introduced by a mutual friend, Bakht Haji, during their employment as security guards at a local fuel depot outside Gardez for the newly-formed Afghan government headed by President Hamid Karzai. Id. at 2. The testimony of Mr. Gul and Mr. Akhtiar on these matters has always been consistent. Compare Exhibits 1, 2, 3 & 4.

---

[7] Mr. Akhtiar's name has been spelled differently in various documents. His name appears as both "Mohammad Akhtiar" and "Akhtiar Haji" in Mr. Gul's CSRT (Exhibit 1 at pages 1 and 3, respectively); "Haji Ehtyar" in Mr. Gul's ARB (Exhibit 2 at page 4); "Haji Mohammed Akitar" in proceedings for another detainee (ISN #1100); and "Akhteyar Mohammad" in his own federal habeas proceeding (CV-05-996).

B. Mr. Gul's ARB Proceeding.

Mr. Gul participated in the ARB proceeding on an unknown date in late 2005. The unclassified portion of the proceeding is attached hereto. See Unclassified ARB transcript, attached hereto as Exhibit 2. Of particular significance is the dramatic change in the allegations between the original CSRT and the ARB. In the 2005 ARB proceeding, respondents only accused Mr. Gul of a single allegation: having been "captured with an identified long-time Hezb-e Islami Gulbuddin (HG) member." Exhibit 2 at 2. Mr. Gul denied the allegation. Id. at 2. He also noted the sudden disappearance of the earlier allegations:

> At the previous [CSRT proceeding] I was accused of being a commander of Hezb-e Islami Gulbuddin and my brother was fighting the United States forces in Jalalabad. Then why don't you sit down and make the allegations?

Id. at 4. The Presiding Officer responded:

> We are here today to talk about [the allegation that you were captured with an HIG member]. I just want to make sure that the statement you are making is relevant. Nowhere in here did we say you were a commander. We strictly said you were with Hezb-e Islami Gulbuddin. I just want to make sure your statement you were talking about things in which we did not discuss.

Id.

The remainder of the unclassified ARB documents do not allege that Mr. Gul is a member of any alleged terrorist organization or that he participated in any hostile activities against the United States. Instead, respondents' assertion that Mr. Gul poses a "threat to the United States and its allies" is based solely on the fact he was arrested inside a house in Gardez that was admittedly rented by Mohammed Akhtiar. Again, Mr. Gul testified: "The house belonged to Haji Akhtiar and he rented that house." Id. at 4. It is Mr. Akhtiar – not Mr. Gul – whom respondents allege is connected to one organization (Itihad Islami) that is further alleged to be connected to another organization (HIG) that is then alleged to have provided support to al Qaida. These multiple degrees of separation do not provide adequate justification for respondents' otherwise bald assertion that Mr. Gul poses a threat to the United States or its allies.

C. Mohammed Akhtiar's CSRT and ARB proceedings

Interestingly, in the Associated Press litigation, respondents also released the unclassified versions of the CSRT and ARB proceedings of the man with whom Mr. Gul was arrested, Mohammed Akhtiar. See Unclassified CSRT Transcript and Unclassified ARB Transcript, attached hereto as Exhibits 3 and 4, respectively. The information released concerning those proceedings provides even more insight into the lack of evidence to support Mr. Gul's continued detention.

In the CSRT proceeding, Mr. Akhtiar was originally accused of possessing the same identification card that Mr. Gul allegedly possessed. Exhibit 3 at page 3.[8] Mr. Akhtiar requested that the identification card be produced at his hearing to prove that it associated him with Itihad Islami, not HIG. The CSRT officer responded to his request as follows:

[8] Respondents also accused Mr. Akhtiar of: (1) fighting against the United States or its coalition partners; (2) being an HIG commander; (3) participating in the planning and attack of the governor in Seyyed Karam district; (4) participating in a rocket attack against U.S. forces in Gardez in February 2003; and (5) possessing ammunition to a U.S. sniper rifle. See Exhibit 3 at pages 3-4.

> We have attempted to find it but have exhausted our resources here. Essentially even if we find it, it does not seem to provide us a lot of additional information. If at a later point its production becomes meaningful to your enemy combatant status, we will examine your request.

Exhibit 3 at page 2. Remarkably, however, on the very next page of the CSRT transcript, respondents proceed to level an accusation against Mr. Akhtiar based specifically on the identification card that they had just refused to produce: "The detainee had a HIG identification card on his person when he was captured." Id. at 3.

In his 2005 ARB proceeding, Mr. Akhtiar testified about the differences between his organization, Itihad Islami, and the HIG. Exhibit 4 at pages 2-3. He also mentioned Mr. Gul, the one person he was arrested with on May 4, 2003. Id. at 6. Mr. Akhtiar testified that "Nazar Gul" was "one of [President Hamid] Karzai's government soldiers." Exhibit 4 at 6. See also Exhibit 1 at 4 (describing Mr. Gul as "a kind of a soldier in the [Afghan] National Guard.") As in Mr. Gul's case, the earlier allegations of active participation in acts of violence suddenly disappeared from Mr. Akhtiar's ARB proceeding. Instead, the ARB focused entirely on Mr. Akhtiar's association with Itihad Islami and his connections with the Afghan government. See generally, Exhibit 4.

The transcripts of Mr. Akhtiar's CSRT and ARB proceedings establish several important facts. First, that respondents' supposed evidence of his alleged association with HIG (i.e., the same "evidence" that respondents relied on to assert that Mr. Gul was associated with HIG) is nowhere to be found. Second, that Mr. Akhtiar's independent testimony corroborates Mr. Gul's testimony concerning: (1) his employment with the current and first democratically-elected government of President Hamid Karzai; and (2) the circumstances surrounding the arrest of both men in Gardez. And, third, that in the cases of both men, very specific prior allegations of violent acts and intentions have now been suddenly transformed into nothing more than a specter of guilt by alleged association.

IV. A MODIFICATION OF STAY IS APPROPRIATE IN THIS CASE.

Regarding the propriety of stays of proceedings, the Supreme Court has held:

> [T]he power to stay proceedings is incidental to the power inherent in every court to control the disposition of the causes on its docket with economy of time and effort for itself, for counsel, and for litigants. How this can best be done calls for the exercise of judgment, which must weigh competing interests and maintain an even balance. . . . True, the suppliant for a stay must make out a clear case of hardship or inequity in being required to go forward, if there is even a fair possibility that the stay for which he prays will work damage to some one else. Only in rare circumstances will a litigant in one cause be compelled to stand aside while a litigant in another settles the rule of law that will define the rights of both. Considerations such as these, however, are counsels of moderation rather than limitations upon power.

Landis v. North American Co., 299 U.S. 248, 254-55 (1936) (internal citations omitted). See also Dellinger v. Mitchell, 442 F.2d 782, 786 (D.C. Cir. 1971). The Court went on to reject a bright-line rule prohibiting stays of proceedings pending related decisions in other courts. The Court explained:

> All the cases [rejecting a bright-line rule against such stays] could have been adequately disposed of on the ground that discretion was abused by a stay of indefinite duration in the absence of a pressing need. If they stand for more than this, we are unwilling to accept them. Occasions may arise when it would be 'a scandal to the administration of justice' in the phrase of Jessel, M.R. (Amos v. Chadwick, L.R. 9 Ch.Div. 459, 462), if power to coordinate the business of the court efficiently and sensibly were lacking altogether.

As it now stands, the record in this case amply demonstrates that Mr. Gul's detention is unlawful under any standard that may be applied. The scant information provided by respondents to date does not support extending the detention of Mr. Gul beyond the three years that already have passed. These circumstances create a pressing need for the Court to modify the current stay and require respondents to provide a complete factual return in support of Mr. Gul's continued detention. In the absence of any further allegations or evidence of wrongdoing, Mr. Gul's detention is illegal under either the "enemy combatant" or "threat to the United States or its allies" standard. No concern for economies of time and effort outweigh the unjust detention of an innocent person. Requiring respondents to provide a complete factual return will do nothing more than afford Mr. Gul and his counsel the long overdue opportunity to advance his representation and to investigate his case further, including enabling them to respond fully to the U.S. Navy's invitation to submit information in support of Mr. Gul's release at his impending ARB proceeding in 2006.

IV. CONCLUSION

For each of the foregoing reasons, Mr. Gul respectfully requests that this Court, acting pursuant to its inherent power, recognize that Mr. Gul has articulated a pressing need for judicial intervention on his behalf to address his continuing, unconstitutional, and illegal detention. He urges the Court to grant his motion to modify the stay order and direct respondents to provide a complete factual return.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

MAZIN SALIH AL-HARBI,	)
Petitioner,	)
v.	)	Civil Action No. 05-CV-1857 (CKK)
GEORGE W. BUSH,	)
President of the United States, et al.,	)
Respondents.	)

RENEWED MOTION FOR PRESERVATION OF EVIDENCE

Respondents allege that Petitioner Mazin Salih Al-Harbi (ISN #588) is deceased as a result of an apparent suicide, but to date, Respondents have failed to provide counsel with a death certificate, an autopsy report, or any other official documentation of Petitioner's death or the circumstances thereof. Counsel therefore persist in their habeas representation of Petitioner.

Petitioner renews his request made initially by Motion dated October 20, 2005, for an Order compelling Respondents to preserve and maintain all evidence relating to his detention, the reasons for his detention, any interrogations of him, his treatment and potential mistreatment. In addition, Counsel now seeks additional relief, in the form of an Order that would also require Respondents to preserve and produce all evidence related in any way to Petitioner's alleged suicide, including but not limited to any alleged suicide note, video tapes showing Petitioner, death certificates, and any and all other evidence sufficient to test the veracity of any official documentation of death produced by Respondents..

The need for an independent investigation into Petitioner's alleged suicide is apparent; the nature of such an investigation will be addressed separately. What must be addressed now is the preservation of the evidence that will make an investigation possible. This relief is required forthwith, to prevent the very persons and agencies who were responsible for Petitioner's detention, and who now claim that he died in their custody, from destroying or otherwise mishandling evidence that is necessary for a public determination of his status and their potential culpability.

BACKGROUND

Petitioner was or is a citizen of Saudi Arabia was taken into custody and held virtually incommunicado in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. Petitioner was never charged with any crime, and was never able to examine any evidence against him. According to Respondents, on or about the morning of June 10, 2006, after spending years under these conditions, Petitioner committed suicide by hanging himself in his cell.

From Petitioner's capture until his death, Respondents have had exclusive access to him, information concerning his apprehension and detention , treatment, state of mind, health, and now, his alleged death. It is crucial that a complete and accurate record of this evidence be preserved, so that, among other things, an independent investigation can proceed and Petitioner's family and this Court can learn the facts surrounding Petitioner's fate and make determinations regarding future legal action. The evidence to be preserved includes but is not limited to: videos and logs of Petitioner, especially in the 24 hours before and after his death, photographs, suicide notes, medical and mental health records, interrogation records, autopsy records, and any other documentary, photographic, video, or other records related to Petitioner or his detention or death in U.S. custody. Additionally, Counsel seeks the ISN numbers of the detainees in cells adjoining Petitioner's cell, so that they may be interviewed about the circumstances of his alleged death.

1. THIS COURT HAS THE INHERENT POWER TO ENTER THE PRESERVATION ORDER

This Court is empowered to enter a preservation order when circumstances warrant it. Pueblo of Laguna v. United States, 60 Fed. Cl. 133, 138 n.8 (2004); see also United States v.

Philip Morris USA, Inc., 327 F.Supp. 2d 21, 23 (D.D.C. 2004). The court in Pueblo of Laguna set forth a two-part test to determine when a preservation order should be issued. It required that the party seeking "a preservation order demonstrate that it is [1] necessary and [2] not unduly burdensome." Pueblo of Laguna, 60 Fed. Cl. At 138.[1]

A. A Preservation Order is Necessary

The Court's intervention is necessary to determine whether Petitioner is alive or dead. If dead, the circumstances of his death will never be known unless evidence is preserved.

There is legitimate concern that Respondents will intentionally dispose of relevant evidence. The FBI has documented efforts by the military to cover up the physical abuse of detainees. See Urgent Report, dated June 25, 2004, attached as Ex. A. An FBI e-mail confirms that unnamed individuals "observed numerous physical abuse incidents . . includ[ing] strangulation, beatings, placement of lit cigarettes into the detainees['] ear openings, and unauthorized interrogations." Id. at 2. Specific "cover-up efforts" were identified in the e-mail, but redacted before it was produced in litigation brought by the ACLU. Id. The New York Times has reported that the military's own investigation into detainee abuse was prejudiced because "crucial witnesses were not interviewed, documents disappeared, and at least a few pieces of evidence were mishandled." Tim Golden, "Army Faltered in Investigating Detainee Abuse," The New York Times, May 22, 2005, at A1, attached as Ex. B.

The immediate preservation of evidence is critical to answering these disturbing questions. The answer, in turn, will bear upon the legal rights of Petitioner's survivors—if indeed he is dead—and may affect the future treatment of other detainees, at least some of whom are certain to be released, as so many others have been released, precisely because they never belonged in captivity at all. In these circumstances, a preservation order is necessary.

[1] Petitioner need not meet the requirements for a preliminary injunction. "[A] document preservation order is no more an injunction than an order requiring a party to identify witnesses or to produce documents in discovery." Pueblo of Laguna, 60 Fed. C1. at 138 n.8. Although such pretrial and discovery orders take the basic form of an injunction (an order to do or not do something), courts need not observe the rigors of the four-factor analysis ordinarily employed in issuing injunctions. Jarallah Al-Marri v. Bush, Civ. No. 04-2035; see also Casey v. Planned Parenthood, 14 F.3d 848, 854 (3d Cir. 1994) (distinguishing such pretrial orders from injunctions).

B. A Preservation Order Would Not Be Unduly Burdensome

The only other requirement for issuing a preservation order is easily met. As the District Court has found in a similar proceeding, "entering a preservation order [against Respondents] will inflict no harm or prejudice upon them." Jarallah Al-Marri v. Bush, Civ. No. 04-2035 (GK) The failure to preserve evidence, however, would prejudice the Petitioners and their family, not to mention a democratic people's understanding of their own government's behavior. Finally, no security issues are gravely implicated here; the evidence, once preserved, will be subject to the Protective Order.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Petitioner prays that the Court compel the preservation of evidence.

Army Faltered In Investigating Detainee Abuse

By TIM GOLDEN (NYT) 2318 words
Published: May 22, 2005

Despite autopsy findings of homicide and statements by soldiers that two prisoners died after being struck by guards at an American military detention center in Bagram, Afghanistan, Army investigators initially recommended closing the case without bringing any criminal charges, documents and interviews show.

Within days after the two deaths in December 2002, military coroners determined that both had been caused by "blunt force trauma" to the legs. Soon after, soldiers and others at Bagram told the investigators that military guards had repeatedly struck both men in the thighs while they were shackled and that one had also been mistreated by military interrogators.

Nonetheless, agents of the Army's Criminal Investigation Command reported to their superiors that they could not clearly determine who was responsible for the detainees' injuries, military officials said. Military lawyers at Bagram took the same position, according to confidential documents from the investigation obtained by The New York Times.

"I could never see any criminal intent on the part of the M.P.'s to cause the detainee to die," one of the lawyers, Maj. Jeff A. Bovarnick, later told investigators, referring to one of the deaths. "We believed the M.P.'s story, that this was the most combative detainee ever."

The investigators' move to close the case was among a series of apparent missteps in an Army inquiry that ultimately took almost two years to complete and has so far resulted in criminal charges against seven soldiers. Early on, the documents show, crucial witnesses were not interviewed, documents disappeared, and at least a few pieces of evidence were mishandled.

While senior military intelligence officers at Bagram quickly heard reports of abuse by several interrogators, documents show they also failed to file reports that are mandatory when any intelligence personnel are suspected of misconduct, including mistreatment of detainees. Those reports would have alerted military intelligence officials in the United States to a problem in the unit, military officials said.

Those interrogators and others from Bagram were later sent to Iraq and were assigned to Abu Ghraib prison. A high-level military inquiry last year found that the captain who led interrogation operations at Bagram, Capt. Carolyn A. Wood, applied many of the same harsh methods in Iraq that she had overseen in Afghanistan.

Citing "investigative shortfalls," senior Army investigators took the Bagram inquiry away from agents in Afghanistan in August 2003, assigning it to a task force based at the agency's headquarters in Virginia. In October 2004, the task force found probable cause to charge 27 of the military police guards and military intelligence interrogators with crimes ranging from involuntary manslaughter to lying to investigators. Those 27 included the 7 who have actually been charged.

"I would acknowledge that a lot of these investigations appear to have taken excessively long," the Defense Department's chief spokesman, Larry Di Rita, said in an interview on Friday. "There's no other way to describe an investigation that takes two years. People are being held accountable, but it's taking too long."

Mr. Di Rita said the Pentagon was examining ways to speed up such investigations, "because justice delayed is justice denied."

A spokesman for the Criminal Investigation Command, Christopher Grey, would not discuss details of the case, but played down the significance of the agents' early proposal to close it. He said that the investigation had been guided by a desire for thoroughness rather than speed, and that it eventually included more than 250 interviews around the world.

"Case agents make recommendations all the time," Mr. Grey said. "But the review process looks at investigations constantly and points to other things that need to be completed or other investigative approaches."

While the proposal to close the case was ultimately rejected by senior officials, documents show that the inquiry was at a virtual standstill when an article in The New York Times on March 4, 2003, reported that at least one of the prisoner's deaths had been ruled a homicide, contradicting the military's earlier assertions that both had died of natural causes. Activity in the case quickly resumed.

The details of the investigation emerged from a file of almost 2,000 pages of confidential Army documents about the death on Dec. 10, 2002, of Dilawar, a 22-year-old taxi driver. The file was obtained from a person involved in the inquiry who was critical of the abuses at Bagram and the military's response to the deaths.

The file presents the fates of Mr. Dilawar and another detainee who died six days earlier, Mullah Habibullah, against a backdrop of frequent harsh treatment by guards and interrogators who were in many cases poorly trained, loosely supervised and only vaguely aware of or attentive to regulations limiting their use of force against prisoners they considered to be terrorists.

According to interviews with military intelligence officials who served at Bagram, only a small fraction of the detainees there were considered important or suspicious enough to be transferred to the American military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, for further interrogation. Two intelligence officers estimated that about 85 percent of the prisoners were ultimately released.

Still, most new detainees at Bagram were hooded, shackled and isolated for at least 24 hours and sometimes as long as 72 hours, the commander of the military police guards at Bagram, Capt. Christopher M. Beiring, told investigators. Prisoners caught in infractions like talking to one another were handcuffed to cell doors or ceilings, often for half an hour or an hour, but sometimes for far longer. Interrogators trying to break the detainees' resistance sometimes ordered that they be forced to sweep the same floor space over and over or scrub it with a toothbrush.

The responsibility of senior officers at Bagram for carrying out such methods is not clear in the Army's criminal report.

In several instances, the documents show Captain Wood and her deputy, Staff Sgt. Steven W. Loring, sought clarification about what techniques they could use. "Numerous requests for strict guidance on P.U.C. treatment have been voiced to the Staff Judge Advocate," Sergeant Loring said, referring to the detainees by the initials for Persons Under Control, "but no training has been offered."

Major Bovarnick, the former legal adviser to the detention center, told investigators that the shackling of detainees with their arms overhead was standard operating procedure when he arrived at Bagram in mid-November 2002. On Nov. 26, after complaints from the International Committee of the Red Cross, he convened a group of military and C.I.A. officials at Bagram to discuss methods of interrogation and punishment, including shackling to fixed objects.

"My personal question then was, 'Is it inhumane to handcuff somebody to something?'" he said. Referring to his consultations with the two senior lawyers at Bagram, he added, "It was our opinion that it was not inhumane."

After the deaths, officers who served at Bagram said, there was a similar debate over whether criminal charges were warranted.

Military lawyers noted that the autopsies of the two dead detainees had found severe trauma to both prisoners' legs -- injuries that a coroner later compared to the effect of being run over by a bus. They also acknowledged statements by more than half a dozen guards that they or others had struck the detainees. But the lawyers and other officers did not press for a fuller accounting, two officers said in interviews.

Instead, statements showed, they pointed to indications that both detainees had some existing medical problems when they arrived at Bagram, and emphasized that it would be difficult to determine the responsibility of individual guards for the injuries they sustained in custody.

"No one blow could be determined to have caused the death," the former senior staff lawyer at Bagram, Col. David L. Hayden, said he had been told by the Army's lead investigator. "It was reasonable to conclude at the time that repetitive administration of legitimate force resulted in all the injuries we saw." Both Major Bovarnick and Colonel Hayden declined requests for comment.

As late as Feb. 7 -- nearly two months after the first autopsy reports had classified both deaths as homicides -- the American commander of coalition forces in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. Daniel K. McNeill, said in an interview that he had "no indication" that either man had been injured in custody.

General McNeill, who has since been promoted, declined repeated requests to clarify his remarks.

In retrospect, the investigators' initial interviews with guards, interrogators and interpreters at the detention center appear cursory and sometimes contradictory. As transcribed, many of the statements are little more than a page or two long.

Most of the guards who admitted punching the detainees or kneeing them in the thighs said they did so in order to subdue prisoners who were extraordinarily combative. But both detainees were shackled at the hands and feet throughout their time at Bagram. One of them, Mr. Dilawar, weighed only 122 pounds and was described by interpreters as neither violent nor aggressive. Both detainees also complained of being beaten and seemed to have trouble walking, some witnesses said.

The early interviews also included statements by two of the interpreters that they had been so troubled by the abusive behavior of some interrogators that they had gone to the noncommissioned officer in charge of the military intelligence group, Staff Sergeant Loring, to complain. One of the interrogators, Specialist Damien M. Corsetti, refused to speak to the agents at all, and another told of the guards' beating one of the detainees who died.

Even so, investigators failed to interview some crucial witnesses, including the officer in charge of the interrogators, Captain Wood, and the commander of the military police company, Captain Beiring. They also neglected an interrogator who had been present for most of Mr. Dilawar's questioning. When he finally went to investigators at his own initiative, he described one of the worst episodes of abuse.

Many of the guards who later provided important testimony were also initially overlooked. Computer records and written logs that were supposed to record treatment of the detainees were not secured and later disappeared. Blood taken from Mr. Habibullah was stored in a butter dish in the agents' office refrigerator, from which it was only recovered -- or "seized" as a report explains it -- when the office was later moved.

The record of the investigation indicated that Army investigators almost entirely stopped interviewing witnesses within three weeks after Mr. Dilawar's death. And although Major Bovarnick, the detention center's legal adviser, said he told Captain Beiring after the first death "that there would be no shackling to the ceiling ever again," the issue was largely ignored in the initial investigation.

While the Army's criminal inquiry continued, General McNeill ordered a senior officer, Col. Joseph G. Nesbitt, to conduct a separate, classified examination of procedures at the detention center. That led to changes including prohibitions against the shackling of prisoners for sleep deprivation and interrogators' making physical contact with detainees.

Documents from the criminal investigation suggested that Colonel Nesbitt was also dismissive of the notion that the two deaths pointed to wider wrongdoing. He concluded that military police guards at the detention center "knew, were following and strictly applying" proper rules on the use of force, documents showed, and he cited a "conflict between obtaining accurate, timely information and treating detainees humanely."

Senior officials at the Criminal Investigation Command's headquarters took a different view. On April 15, 2003, they rejected the field agents' proposal to close the case, sending it back "for numerous investigative, operational, administrative and security classification-related issues, which required additional work, pursuit, clarification or scrutiny." Four months later, the headquarters officials reassigned the case to the task force that eventually implicated the 27 soldiers.

519TH MILITARY INTELLIGENCE BATTALION

July 2002 -- The 519th M.I. Battalion arrives at the Bagram detention center in Afghanistan.

Jan. 2003 -- Interrogators from the battalion return home to Fort Bragg, N.C. The operations officer, Capt. Carolyn A. Wood (left), is awarded a Bronze Star for meritorious service.

March -- Personnel from the battalion deploy to Iraq.

July -- Personnel from the battalion take over interrogations at Abu Ghraib prison under the direct leadership of Captain Wood.

DETAINEE DEATHS

Nov. 30- Dec. 4, 2002 -- Mullah Habibullah arrives at the Bagram detention center. He dies after days of beatings by guards.

Dec. 5-10 A second Afghan man, Dilawar (left), is taken into custody. He dies after being shackled to the ceiling of his cell for much of five days.

Dec. 8, 13 -- Initial autopsy reports show both men were victims of homicide.

INVESTIGATIONS

Dec. 2002 -- Military spokesmen at Bagram say the men died from natural causes.

Dec. 12 -- Lt. Gen. Daniel K. McNeill, commander of allied forces in Afghanistan, orders an investigation that finds serious problems at the detention center.

Dec. 31 -- The Army's Criminal Investigation Command conducts the last full interview of their initial inquiry into the deaths of the two men. Weeks later, they recommend that the case be closed without seeking charges against any of the soldiers.

April 15, 2003 -- Bagram report is sent back by Criminal Investigation Command headquarters for many issues that "required additional work, pursuit, clarification or scrutiny."

Aug. 6 -- After "a review of investigative shortfalls" by senior officials at the Criminal Investigation Command, the Bagram inquiry is assigned to the agency's headquarters.

Oct. 8 -- The Army's criminal investigation ends, finding probable cause to charge 27 officers and soldiers with crimes related to the deaths of Mr. Dilawar, and 15 of the personnel were charged in the case of Mr. Habibullah.

Aug. 2004 -- Report into abuses at Abu Ghraib by Lt. Gen. Anthony R. Jones finds that Captain Wood instituted methods at the Iraqi prison that were "remarkably similar" to those she applied at Bagram.

Administrative Law

Senator DeWine. Judge, let me ask you--moving to the administrative law issue. As you know, in the 18th and 19th centuries we really did not have the governmental agencies that have such a profound influence, for better or worse, on the lives of Americans today, daily lives of Americans. Today administrative agencies set workplace safety rules, establish environmental regulations, lay down traffic safety standards, just to name a few things.

As far as I know there is no specific article in the Constitution dedicated to the administrative state that we live in today. In your view, what is there in the text or history of the Constitution that supports the growth of this administrative state that we live in? Is the growth of the administrative state an example of the Constitution being amended simply out of necessity, or is the administrative state consistent with the Constitution as drafted by our Founding Fathers? How do we get to where we are from a constitutional point of view?

Judge Roberts. Well, you know, we all of course begin in high school civics with the notion of three branches of Government, the Executive, the Legislative and the Judicial, and we study that. and then only occasionally do people look at the real world and say, "Well, what is this agency? What is that? Is that Legislative or is that Judicial or is that Executive?" Of course, the answer is, well, it's a little bit of each. It's exercising power delegated by Congress. It's executing it in a particular way. It's issuing regulations that have the force and effect of law, and quite often it's adjudicating particular disputes.

The activities of the administrative agencies are of course the bulk of what judges on the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit do, and the principles of administrative law that have recognized the legitimacy of these agencies, and sought to ensure that their exercise of authority is consistent with constitutional provisions by basically--I mean I know the issue can seem arcane to many people, but the fundamentals of administrative law really go back to the basic principles of justice, is someone being given an opportunity to be heard? Is someone being treated fairly? Is someone who's making a decision doing it for a rational reason or an arbitrary reason?

These are the same basic principles that have animated the common law system since the time of Lord Cook, and they are being applied here as well. The objection is often, "This agency made a decision without adequately hearing our concerns," or "This agency made an adjudicatory decision without hearing the record evidence," or "They did not explain." That's the basic requirement of administrative law, explain your decision. That's the limitation on arbitrariness, and the agency didn't explain why it's doing this.

The notion that even in these arcane areas our legal system insists upon the observance of these basic requirements of--I don't want to say due process as a technical term, but that's the principle that is being applied. That goes a long way to explaining how these agencies have been accepted into the constitutional system, because they have been required under principles of administrative law to comply with these basic precepts of procedural regularity.

Antitrust

Senator Kohl. Judge Roberts, I would like to talk a little bit about antitrust. I am the Ranking Member on the Antitrust Subcommittee. To me, antitrust is not some mysterious legal theory that only lawyers can talk about or understand. Antitrust is just another word for fair competition. The laws that we use to protect consumers and competitors from unfair and illegal trade practice is what antitrust is all about.

Do you agree that government enforcement of antitrust law is crucial to ensuring that consumers are protected from anticompetitive practices, such as price fixing and illegal maintenance of monopolies?

Judge Roberts. Yes, I do, Senator. In fact, when I was in private practice, one of the cases I handled was the Microsoft antitrust case on behalf of government officials, the States in particular. A number of States retained me to argue that case before the D.C. Circuit en banc. So I certainly appreciate the role of governments, both State and Federal, in enforcing the protections of the antitrust laws, because as you know, there is concurrent authority in that area, the Sherman Act, of course, on the Federal level and then what people call the "Baby Sherman Acts" on the State level.

Senator Kohl. I am glad to hear you say that because on June 14, 1983, which is more than 20 years ago, in a memo to the White House Counsel Fred Fielding, you wrote, quote, "Enforcement of Federal rights is advanced most effectively by private suits in antitrust cases." So isn't it often true that individual consumers don't have the resources to pursue these private suits against large corporations, and isn't that why government enforcement of antitrust is essential? So you would, perhaps, not be feeling the same way today as you did 22 years ago when you made that comment?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think it depends on what area you're talking about. I do think that the system established under the Sherman Act of private antitrust enforcement, and, of course, the opportunity to recover additional damages and attorneys' fees and other aspects, has been an effective tool in enforcing the law. There are areas, as you mentioned. If the issue is mostly consumer rights as opposed to business rivals, government action may be more necessary in those areas as opposed to the others.

And I know that government antitrust regulators make those determinations every day, that their resources are best directed to areas where consumers or attorneys bringing class actions on consumers' behalf, whatever the reasons were, the incentive system for private litigation may not be as effective, and that's often the area where State Attorneys General, the Justice Department, decide to get involved to supplement the private enforcement activity.

Senator DeWine. Judge, let me turn to the area of antitrust, a matter that is very important for the businesses and the consumers of this country. For over 100 years our antitrust laws have helped consumers by ensuring their economy is competitive and vibrant. Our antitrust laws are the oldest in the world, and many people, including me, think they are the best in the world. In fact, I am proud to say that John Sherman, Republican Senator from my own home State of Ohio, wrote the first antitrust law back in 1890.

Over the past 20 years we have achieved a great deal of consensus I think about how the antitrust laws should be enforced, Democrat and Republican administrations. As the Chair of this Committee's Subcommittee on Antitrust, Competition, Policy and Consumer Rights, I have worked very closely with Senator Kohl who asked you some questions about antitrust. I think we have worked in a bipartisan way to ensure that consumers and competition are protected.

It is a simple goal, but it is not always easy to achieve or put into practice. For example, recently, the rise and expansion of the Internet and the technological explosion of the so-called new economy have led to a marketplace that is changing faster and more often than we have really ever experienced before.

Judge, what challenges do you think the courts face in trying to square our old antitrust laws as they are currently written with new business strategies and the high-technology markets, and do you think that these laws give courts enough guidance to deal with these new economy issues?

Judge Roberts. Well, that was really the basic issue that I faced in the Microsoft case before the D.C. Circuit en banc. There was a lot of argument, academic commentary back and forth, the idea this is a whole new area. You can't apply the old principles. They don't work in this context. You need to do something different, the so-called new paradigm and all that.

At least the argument that I tried to make on behalf of the States was that the basic principles are the same. The Sherman Act was, as many have said, a charter of economic freedom and that those basic principles do have to be applied regardless of changes in the economics of the underlying businesses or the structure of the markets. Obviously, it requires a great deal of sensitivity on the part of the judges and it's a really challenge for the lawyers sometimes to be able to understand the economics, to be able to explain them to the judges, and judges appreciate that.

But my basic instinct, and it's nothing more than that, is that the principles are there and the issue is simply application in a new context.

Senator DeWine. Good. Thank you.

Civil Rights – Affirmative Action

Senator Kennedy. Could I move on to the issue of affirmative action.

Judge Roberts. Certainly.

Senator Kennedy. In the Grutter v. Bollinger case, the Supreme Court decided very close, a five-four decision, Sandra Day O'Connor the deciding individual, the Justice, the Supreme Court upheld the university practices that considered race as one factor in its admission decisions. No one is talking today about quotas. We are talking about affirmative action as defined in this Grutter decision. The Court found that there was a constitutional affirmative action program aimed at achieving a racially diverse student body.

In this decision, the Court expressly gave great weight to the representation by military leaders--military leaders--that said a highly-qualified racially-diverse officer corps is essential to the military's ability to fulfill its principal mission and to provide national security.

What weight would you give to that kind of a comment or statement or testimony by the military in considering any issue dealing with affirmative action?

Judge Roberts. Well, the weight it was given was to help satisfy the test, because the Court, as you know, in Grutter applied strict scrutiny because it was dealing with considerations on the basis of race and that required a showing of a compelling governmental interest to support that legislative action. The testimony of the military officers, as the Court explained, helped substantiate the compelling nature of the interest in having a diverse United student body. That was the weight that the Court gave it.

There was, of course, the other case. There were two Michigan cases, the law school case and the university case, the Gratz case, where the Court did say that it looked too much like a quota in that case because it was given determinative consideration as opposed to being one of a variety of factors that is considered.

The two cases together kind of show where the Court is coming out, at least in the area of higher education. The Court permits consideration of race or ethnic background so long as it is not sort of a make-or-break test.

Senator Kennedy. Do you agree, then, with Justice O'Connor writing for the majority that gave great weight to the real-world impact of affirmative policies in universities? The reason--I have got 35 seconds left--you might say, well, this may eventually come on up before the Court, but the fact is, we know how every other Justice has voted because they have all voted and the American people would like to know where you stand on this very important public policy issue, particularly since Sandra Day O'Connor wrote such a compelling decision that was, I think, in the cause of fairness and justice.

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I think I can answer the specific questions you asked because as you phrased the question, do you agree with her that it's important to look at the real-world significance and impact, and I can certainly say that I do think that that is the appropriate approach without commenting on the outcome or the judgment in a particular case, that you do need to look at the real-world impact in this area, and I think in other areas, as well.

Senator Kennedy. Thank you very much.

Senator Feinstein. . . . Let me ask you a question about strict scrutiny and affirmative action. You mention in several of your memos from the Reagan administration addressing affirmative action that the Government should be color blind. And I would agree. And I wish we were there, but we are not there. And because America is well-served by educating all her people well, do you personally subscribe not to quotas but to measured efforts that can withstand strict scrutiny?

Judge Roberts. A measured effort that can withstand strict scrutiny is, I think, a--affirmative action of that sort, I think, is a very position approach. And I think people will disagree about exactly what the details should be, but the general notion--

Senator Feinstein. Such as Michigan, the University of Michigan--

Judge Roberts. In Michigan. In the Michigan case, obviously, you have--I always get the--whether it's the law school--I think the law school program was upheld and the university program was struck down because of the differences in the program. But efforts to ensure the full participation in all aspects of our society by people without regard to their race, ethnicity, gender, religious beliefs--all of those are efforts that I think are appropriate. At the time of the Reagan administration, President Reagan was at pains to make clear, and I know the Attorney General was as well, that in opposing quotas--and at the time, it was a much stricter quota approach that was being proposed, set-asides--they were not in any way opposed to what they regarded as beneficial affirmative action to bring minorities, women into all aspects of society. That's important, and as the Court has explained, we all benefit from that.

Senator Kennedy. . . . Let me ask you a broader question. Do you think having a diverse society where everyone has an equal chance to participate is an American value and is fundamental to the strength of our society?

Judge Roberts. I do, I agree with that statement Senator, yes.

Senator Kennedy. I want to--I do too, and I want to just review very quickly what I consider to be sort of a pattern in different judgments that you have made over a period of 20 years. We have not got a lot of time and I am not going to bother going through the memoranda unless you would like to. But for someone who is black or brown, a woman, a disabled, and looked at a pattern over 20 years where you were actively involved in the Reagan administration against affirmative action--I am leaving out the whole issue of quotas, all of us oppose quotas, we are talking about affirmative action--and you expressed strong reservations about the affirmation action. Then in 1991 in the FCC case, you as the advocate for the U.S., the Acting Solicitor General, refused to take the position of the FCC, your own client. And the FCC filed briefs in favor of its own affirmative action program and your office opposed the FCC. This is, as I understand, extremely unusual.

Part of the difficulty that we have, Judge Roberts, is we do not have your records on affirmative action. They were in the Reagan Library and at some time they became misplaced and we do not have those records to be able to give a complete review of these documents, although what I am stating here is factual. We do not have the information that we requested from the Solicitor General's Office, who, as you appropriately mentioned yesterday, was America's lawyers.

In this particular case, in the Solicitor case where the FCC--with its affirmative action program that recognized that with all of the broadcasting and the television stations there were no minority owned stations and they had a very modest program--they petitioned you, who regularly were going to intervene in behalf of the FCC and then you made a judgment that you would not, that you would enter a brief in opposition to it. The Supreme Court came out in favor of the FCC. I know that the standard altered and changed subsequently on that case.

And then in 2001 you took a private case to basically see that the Department of Transportation's affirmative action program that applied in this case to the highways, which has been overwhelmingly supported by the Congress year in and year out, would be effectively undermined.

The point I am asking here is, given these series of actions over a period of time, what do you think in your record would give some sense of hope to women, to minorities, blacks and browns, to those that are disabled that are not looking for a hand-out, but just looking for a chance in this diverse society to be able to have an equal opportunity?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I think there's a great deal in my background that you could look to in that respect. For example, you could look to the cases in which I argued in favor of affirmative action. I've argued on both sides of that issue. In the Rice v. Cayetano case, for example, before the Supreme Court, I argued in favor of affirmative action for Native Hawaiians. I lost that case but I was arguing on the side of affirmative action.

There are other episodes in my background that people could look to. For example, I regularly participate in, when I was at my law firm, a program sponsored by the firm, a legal reasoning program for minority and disadvantaged students going on to law school, to help them prepare for the rigors of law school, so not simply that they would be chosen, selected and admitted into law school, but be in a better position to be able to succeed once they got there.

With respect to the FCC case that you mentioned in the Metro Broadcasting case, I think a fuller understanding of the situation there is necessary. The United States had already taken a position before the FCC opposed to the FCC program. That put the Solicitor General's Office in the position where they had--the position of the United States, which was opposed to it, and the FCC position which had prevailed before the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. I authorized the FCC to defend its position in court. That was a discretionary decision. I didn't have to do that, but I thought the Supreme Court, in a situation where the FCC, part of the United States and the formal position of the United States, before I had ever gotten involved in the case, were at loggerheads, that the Court should have both views and decide the case. They did decide it in favor of the FCC 5-4, and as you noted in the other case that I participated in later, the Supreme Court overturned that decision.

The long and short of it is, that if you look at my record on the question of affirmative action, yes, I was in an administration that was opposed to quotas. Opposition to quotas is not the same thing as opposition to affirmative action. That was something that President Reagan emphasized repeatedly. I argued against quotas in the FCC case. I argued in favor of affirmative action in the Hawaiian case. In terms of my own personal involvement, I've been active in programs that promote the interests of minorities and disadvantaged to participate fully in our society.

Senator Kennedy. As you know, in the Hawaiian case, that was not an affirmative action case. You gave that response to Senator Durbin in the written answers to the--when you were promoted to the Circuit Court, and in the case itself it indicates that it was not an affirmative action. All right. Well, let me go--we will agree to differ.

Judge Roberts. Sure.

Civil Rights – Civil Rights Restoration Act (Grove City v. Bell)

Senator Kennedy. Let me, if I could, go to the Civil Rights Restoration Act. In 1981, you supported an effort by the Department of Education to reverse 17 years of civil rights protections at colleges and universities that receive Federal funds. Under the new regulations, the definition of Federal assistance to colleges and universities would be narrowed to exclude certain types of student loans and grants so that fewer institutions would be covered by the civil rights laws. As a result, more colleges and universities would legally be able to discriminate against people of color, women, and the disabled.

Your efforts to narrow the protection of the civil rights laws did not stop there, however. In 1984 in the Grove City v. Bell, the Supreme Court decided, contrary to the Department of Education regulations that you supported, that student loans and grants did, indeed, constitute Federal assistance to colleges for purposes of triggering civil rights protections.

But in a surprising twist, the Court concluded that the non-discrimination laws were intended to apply only to the specific program receiving the funds and not to the institution as a whole.

Under that reasoning, a university that received Federal aid in the form of tuition could not discriminate in admissions, but was free to discriminate in athletics, housing, faculty hiring, and any other programs that did not receive the direct funds. If the admissions office didn't discriminate, if they got the funds through the admissions office, they could discriminate in any other place of the university.

A strong bipartisan majority in both the House and the Senate decided to pass another law, the Civil Rights Restoration Act, to make it clear that they intended to prohibit discrimination in all programs and activities of a university that received Federal assistance. You vehemently opposed the Civil Rights Restoration Act. Even after the Grove City Court found otherwise, you still believe that there was--and this is your quote--"a good deal of intuitive appeal to the argument that Federal loans and grants to students should not be viewed as Federal financial assistance to the university." You realize, of course, that these loans and grants to the students were paid to the university as tuition. Then even though you acknowledged that the program-specific aspect of the Supreme Court decision was going to be overturned by the congressional legislation, you continued to believe that it would be "too onerous" for colleges to comply with non-discrimination laws across the entire university unless it was "on the basis of something more solid than Federal aid to students."

Judge Roberts, if your position prevailed, it would have been legal in many cases to discriminate in athletics for girls, women; it would have been legal to discriminate in the hiring of teachers; it would have been legal not to provide services or accommodations to the disabled.

Do you still believe today that it is too onerous for the Government to require universities that accept tuition payments from students who rely on Federal grants and loans not to discriminate in any of their programs of activities?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator, and I did not back then. You have not accurately represented my position.

Senator Kennedy. These are your words.

Chairman Specter. Let him finish his answer.

DOJ_NMG_0035690

Judge Roberts. Senator, with respect--

Chairman Specter. You had quite a long--

Judge Roberts. --you have selected--

Chairman Specter. Wait a minute, wait a minute. Senator Kennedy just propounded a very, very long question. Now, let him answer the question.

Judge Roberts. Senator, you did not accurately represent my position. The Grove City College case presented two separate questions, and it was a matter being litigated, of course, in the courts. The universities were arguing that they were not covered at all by the civil rights laws in question simply because their students had Federal financial assistance and attended their universities. That was their first argument.

The second argument was, even if they were covered, all that was covered was the admissions office and not other programs that themselves did not receive separate financial assistance.

Our position, the position of the administration--and, again, that was the position I was advancing. I was not formulating policy. I was articulating and defending the administration position. And the administration's position was, yes, you are covered if the students receive Federal financial assistance, and that the coverage extended to the admissions office. That was the position that the Supreme Court agreed with. We were interpreting legislation. The question is: What is the correct interpretation of the legislation? The position that the administration advanced was the one I have just described. The universities were covered due to Federal financial assistance to their students. It extended to the admissions office.

The Supreme Court in the Grove City case agreed with that position. So the position the administration had articulated, the Supreme Court concluded, was a correct interpretation of what this body, the Congress, had enacted.

Congress then changed the position about coverage, and that position was, I believe, signed into law by the President and that became the new law. The memo you read about Secretary Bell's proposal, if I remember it, was, well, he said, if we're going to cover all of the universities, then we shouldn't hinge coverage simply on Federal financial assistance. And the position I took in the memorandum was that, no, we should not revisit that question. We should not revisit the question that Federal financial assistance triggers coverage.

Senator Kennedy. Well, you are familiar--I have the memo here. I have got 22 seconds left. And your quote of this, "If the entire institution is to be covered, however, it should be on the basis of something more solid than Federal aid to the students." I think most of the Members of the Congress feel that if the aid to the universities, tuition and the loans and the grants are going to be sufficient to trigger all of the civil rights laws--your memorandum here, "If the entire institution is to be covered, however, it should be on the basis of something more solid than Federal aid to the students." That is your memorandum.

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, again, the administration policy was as I articulated it, and it was my job to articulate the administration policy.

Senator Grassley. I am going to go to an issue that Senator Kennedy left off with regarding the Grove City case. And I have the memo that was involved in this issue before me. And I see the memo being a summary of former Education Secretary Bell's views on this issue. But Senator Kennedy left out what your assessment was on it, and you wrote these words: "As a practical matter, however, I do not think the administration can revisit the issue at this late date."

Can you tell us what your position was in this memo? And Mr. Chairman, I would like to have this entire memo submitted for the record.

Chairman Specter. Without objection, it will be admitted as part of our record.

Judge Roberts. The issue was the--in the Grove City case, the Court had said that receipt of financial aid by students triggered coverage under the civil rights statutes, limited to the admissions office, the admissions policies. The Civil Rights Restoration Act changed that result to say that the limitation was not to the admissions office but applied more generally to the institution.

Secretary Bell submitted a proposal. He said, well, if it's going to apply more generally to the institution, then the trigger of simply having students who receive financial aid shouldn't be enough. And the position that we took in response to Secretary Bell's proposal was no, that we weren't going to revisit it. We had argued earlier in Grove City that financial aid was enough to trigger coverage and we weren't going to revisit that question. The position was that coverage of the entire institution based on receipt of financial aid was appropriate.

Senator Grassley. So Senator Kennedy's words were not quoting you but quoting words that Secretary Bell had in this memo, and you were reacting to those.

Judge Roberts. Well, it's, again, 23-some years ago. But my recollection is that that was his proposal. Our response was that, no, we're not going to do that, we're not going to change the position we've taken in light of the new legislation.

Senator Biden. . . . The next question. You know, I find it fascinating, this whole thing about Title IX and whether or not by Title IX--you and I know what we are talking about, but for the public at large who really has an interest in all of this as well, the issue was whether or not when a student gets aid, whether or not it only goes to the admissions piece of it.

Now, you said something that was accurate but I don't think fulsome to Senator Kennedy, and correct me if I am wrong. You said, look, we were arguing that it did apply--Title IX did apply. If a student got aid, it applied to the university. That was one of the questions, whether or not you have no application or a narrow application. And you argued that it should apply to the admissions process.

But there is a second issue in that case, and the second issue is: Do you apply it narrowly only to do with the admissions policy or do you apply it to if they are discriminating in dormitories?

I got your answer on the first part. You thought it should apply, at least narrowly. Were you arguing that it should apply broadly? And this was before--let me make it clear. The district court, I say to my friends--because I had forgotten this. The district court had ruled that this only applies to admissions, and there was a question. The

Chairman of Reagan's Commission on Civil Rights said we should get in on the side of the plaintiff here, and we should appeal this to the Supreme Court or to a higher court and say, No, no, this applies across the board, this applies if you don't put money in sports programs, you don't put money in dormitories, et cetera.

What was your position on Reagan's Civil Rights Chairman, Clarence Pendleton, suggesting that we appeal the decision of the circuit court narrowly applying it only to the admissions office?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I was a staff lawyer. I didn't have a position. The administration had a position, and the administration's position was the two-fold position you've set forth. First, Title IX applies. Second, it applies to the office, the admissions office.

Senator Biden. Only to the office, right? It applies narrowly.

Judge Roberts. The question--

Chairman Specter. Now, wait a minute. Let him finish his answer, Senator Biden.

Senator Biden. The answers are misleading, with all due respect.

Chairman Specter. Well, they--

Senator Biden. Let me get--

Chairman Specter. Wait a minute, wait a minute. They may be misleading, but they are his answers.

Senator Biden. Okay, fine.

Chairman Specter. You may finish, Judge Roberts.

Senator Biden. Fire away, Judge. At least I am misunderstanding your answers.

Judge Roberts. With respect, they are my answers, and, with respect, they're not misleading. They're accurate. This is a--

Senator Biden. I have now a minute and 45 seconds.

Judge Roberts. --dispute that was 20-some years ago. The effort was to interpret what this body, Congress, meant. The administration position was Federal financial aid triggers coverage. It's limited to the admissions office. The United States Supreme Court agreed on both counts.

Senator Biden. I understand that.

Judge Roberts. So I would say that the administration correctly interpreted the intent of Congress in enacting that legislation.

Senator Biden. Well, let me read what you wrote in that memo. You said you "strongly agree." Now, when my staff sends me a memo saying, "Senator, I recommend you do the following...and I strongly agree," that usually is a pretty good indication what they think. Now, maybe they don't. Maybe they just like to use the word "strongly." They said "strongly agree." It usually means they agree. Number one.

Number two, you went on to say, and I quote, that if you have the broad interpretation, it will be--the Federal Government will be rummaging "willy-nilly through institutions." So you expressed not only that you strongly agree, but you thought that if you gave them this power to broadly interpret it, to apply to dormitories and all these others things, that they would willy-nilly--they would rummage willy-nilly through institutions.

It seems to me you had a pretty strong view back then. Maybe you don't have it now.

Judge Roberts. Well, and the Supreme Court's conclusion was that that administration position was a correct reading of the law that this body passed. So if the view was strongly held, it was because I thought that was a correct reading of the law. The Supreme Court concluded that it was a correct reading of the law.

Senator Hatch. Well, thank you. Now, also yesterday the Democrat staff of the Committee released a press release stating that you failed to distance yourself from what it called your "earlier cramped positions on Title IX and women's rights." And after listening to you yesterday, I did not find your earlier positions cramped at all. In fact, as you explained here to the Committee, many of the documents that questioners relied upon reflected the positions of the Reagan administration for which you worked.

Now, what assurance can you give the Committee that you will fairly interpret the civil rights laws, including critical statutes such as Title IX, fully and fairly, consistent with the purposes Congress intended in passing these laws?

Judge Roberts. Well, I can give the commitment that I appreciate that my role as a judge is different than my role as a staff lawyer for an administration. As a judge, I have no agenda. I have a guide in the Constitution and the laws and the precedents of the Court, and those are what I would apply with an open mind, after fully and fairly considering the arguments and assessing the considered views of my colleagues on the bench. That's the way I would approach cases in that area, as in any other area.

The approach of someone who is obviously a staff lawyer in an administration is very different. The approach of someone who is an advocate for a client before the Court is obviously very different. Those are positions that I have held in the past. I am now a judge, and I have had the experience and I think my record will establish that that is how I approach cases across the spectrum of issues that are raised before the courts.

Senator Hatch. And reasonable people can differ on some of these issues.

Judge Roberts. Oh, certainly.

Senator Hatch. And the Grove City case, you won that case, didn't you?

Judge Roberts. The administration's position prevailed before the Court.

Senator Hatch. That is right. In other words, the position that you had advocated prevailed. Then we did not like it up here on Capitol Hill, so we passed the Civil Rights Restoration Act and we changed it, right?

Judge Roberts. Yes, which, of course, is always the prerogative of Congress when you're dealing with a question of statutory interpretation, and that's part of a regular interchange between the Court and the Congress. Sometimes if the Court gets something wrong, Congress can fix it. Even if the Court gets it right but Congress thinks the approach ought to be changed, Congress is free to legislate for a different result.

Senator Hatch. So I find it strange to criticize you because you won a case in the Supreme Court and have not advocated against women's rights in any way, shape, or form ever in your career, as far as I can understand. Is that correct?

Judge Roberts. That's correct, Senator.

Senator Hatch. And, in fact, you are a strong supporter of women's rights and gender equality?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator.

Senator Hatch. Okay.

DOJ_NMG_0035694

Civil Rights – Disability Discrimination (including ADA)

Senator DeWine. Judge, let me turn to the area of congressional power. It has been talked about before here, but I want to talk about it a little bit more. Really, this has to do with federalism cases. As you know, the Court has handed down a number of cases that have restricted the power of Congress to pass important legislation. The Court has struck down portions of the Violence Against Women Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, just to name a few.

In some of these cases the Court restricted Congress's power under the Commerce Clause. In some it relied on the 11th Amendment, and in some it cited Section 5 of the 14th Amendment. The particular provision is not that important for this discussion. Let me be perfectly frank. I think there are some problems with these decisions. I think it is wrong for judges to take on the role of policymaker. I realize that if a statute is blatantly unconstitutional, a judge has to do their duty. But I think for the reason I am going to discuss in a minute, that was not true in these cases.

I want to cite one example, and that is--because of time I can only go through one--and that is the Garrett case, a 5-4 decision, Board of Trustees v. Garrett. As you know, this case involved a woman who said that she had been discriminated against because she was disabled. She was employed by the State of Alabama. She sued the State under the Americans with Disabilities Act. The Supreme Court threw out the suit, holding that there was no evidence that the State discriminated against the disabled in employment decisions. I think the problem with Garrett is that the Court ignored findings by Congress.

There were other cases that have been decided, where we did not have findings, and you are familiar with those. I understand the Court's decisions. I might like them or not like them, but I understand them.

This case we made findings. While we were considering the Americans with Disabilities Act we held 13 hearings and we set up a task force, a task force that held hearings in every State. It was attended by more than 30,000 individuals. Based on these hearings we found 300 examples of disabled individuals being discriminated against in employment decisions. We found that two-thirds of all disabled Americans between the ages of 16 and 64 were not working at all, even though a large majority of them were capable of doing so. We found that this discrimination flowed from stereotypic assumptions about the disabled, as well as, quote, "purposeful, unequal treatment," all findings by this elected Congress of the United States.

In Garrett, however, the Court said this was not enough. They rejected our fact findings, holding that we had not pointed to any evidence that the States discriminated in employment decisions against the disabled.

Judge, you have stressed repeatedly in your writings and your opinions--and I have a great deal of respect for you and appreciate these writings and opinions--you stressed the limited role that judges must play in our system of Government. I applaud you for that approach. It is important for me to ensure that you still hold to this belief. In your opinion, what role should a judge play when reviewing congressional fact findings? In your view, how much deference do congressional fact findings deserve? I understand you are not going to talk about this case, or any of the cases I have just cited. I wanted to lay that kind of as a predicate. I wanted to tell you where I am coming from.

But just talk in general about when you see fact findings by Congress, when we have held hearings, when we have established a record, how do you approach? What are the tools that you use, Judge, based on the precedents and based on what you think the role of the judge is?

Judge Roberts. Again, and of course, without getting into the particulars, the reason that congressional fact finding and determination is important in these cases is because the courts recognize that they can't do that. Courts can't have, as you said, whatever it was, the 13 separate hearings before passing particular legislation. Courts--the Supreme Court can't sit and hear witness after witness after witness in a particular area and develop that kind of a record. Courts can't make the policy judgments about what type of legislation is necessary in light of the findings that are made. So the findings play an important role, and I think it is correct to say under the law in this area and others, they're neither necessary nor necessarily sufficient. But I know as a judge that they're extremely helpful when there are findings.

And judges know when they look at those, that they're the result of an exhaustive process of a sort that the Court cannot duplicate. We simply don't have the institutional expertise or the resources or the authority to engage in that type of a process. So that is sort of the basis for the deference to the fact finding that is made. It's institutional competence. The courts don't have it. Congress does. It's constitutional authority. It's not our job. It is your job. So the defence to congressional findings in this area has a solid basis.

Now, the particular area you're talking about under Section 5 of the 14th Amendment, the Garrett case, there are of course more recent cases that you know of, Tennessee v. Lane and the Hibbs case in Nevada v. Hibbs, where the Court did defer to the fact finding in those cases, and particularly in the Hibbs case focused on the legislative recognition based on its examination of the factual record developed at hearings about the statute that was at issue there, and the particular approach that they were taking to remedy discrimination under the 14th Amendment, which is the authority that Congress has.

Now, the legal requirement that the Court has articulated there came of course from the City of Boerne case, that the remedial approach has to be congruent and proportional. Justice Scalia signed on to that approach in the City of Boerne case. In the Lane case he said he had changed his mind and he no longer agreed with that. Any area of the law where Justice Scalia is changing his mind, has got to be one that is particularly difficult, and one that I think is appropriately regarded as still evolving and emerging. And so I don't know if the more recent cases in Lane and Hibbs represent a swinging of the pendulum away from cases like Garrett and Kimmel on the other side, or if it's simply part of the process of the Court trying to come to rest with an approach in this area.

But it is an area that the Court has found difficult, and just as a general matter, I think when you get to this point of reweighing congressional findings, that starts to look more like a legislative function, and the courts need to be very careful as they get into that area, to make sure that they're interpreting the law and not making it.

Chairman Specter. . . . Let me come now to the Americans With Disabilities Act, and you have 5-4 decisions going opposite ways. Ms. Garrett had breast cancer. The Court in 2001 said that the title of the Disabilities Act was unconstitutional, 5-4, on employment discrimination. Then 3 years later, you have the case coming up of Lane, the paraplegic crawling up the steps, accommodations, 5-4, and the Act is upheld. The record in the case was very extensive--13 congressional hearings, a task force that held hearings in every State, attended by more than 30,000 people, including thousands who had experienced discrimination. And in the Garrett case, the Supreme Court of the United States used a doctrine which had been in vogue only since 1997 in the Boerne case. You and I discussed this in my office. They came up with a standard of what is congruent and proportionate. Congruence and proportionality.

I was interested in your statement when we talked informally that you did not find those in the 14th Amendment. I did not either. Now, they plucked congruence and proportionality right out of thin air, and when Scalia dissented, he said that the congruence and proportionality test was a "flabby test," which is a "invitation to judicial arbitrariness by policy-driven decisionmaking."

Now, you said yesterday that you did not think that there was judicial activism when the Court overruled an act of Congress. Isn't this congruence and proportionality test, which comes out of thin air, a classic example of judicial activism where the view of congruence--hard to find a definition for congruence. Proportionality, hard to find a definition for proportionality. I have searched and cannot find any.

Isn't that the very essence of what is in the eye of the beholder where the Court takes carte blanche to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional?

Judge Roberts. Well, these questions arise, of course, under, as you know, section 5 of the 14th Amendment, where the issue is Congress' power to address violations of the 14th Amendment. And it's an extraordinary grant of power, and the Court has always recognized it as such. And their decisions in recent years--it's not just, as you point out, the Garrett case on the one hand and the Lane case on the other. You have the Hibbs case recently, which upheld Congress' exercise of authority. The most recent cases--Lane and Hibbs--uphold Congress' exercise of authority to abrogate--

Chairman Specter. But, Judge Roberts, they uphold it at the pleasure of the Court. Congress can't figure that out. There is no way we can tell what is congruent and proportional in the eyes of the Court.

Judge Roberts. Well, and that was Justice Scalia's position in dissent. He had originally--

Chairman Specter. Do you agree with Scalia?

Judge Roberts. Well, again, the congruent and proportional test--

Chairman Specter. Do you disagree with Justice Scalia?

Judge Roberts. I don't think it's appropriate in an area--and there are cases coming up, as you know, Mr. Chairman. There's a case on the docket right now that considers the congruence and proportionality test.

Chairman Specter. That is why I am raising it with you. I would like to see a sensible interpretation of the Court in that case.

Judge Roberts. Well, and if I am confirmed and I do have to sit on that case, I would approach that with an open mind and consider the arguments. I can't give you a commitment here today about how I will approach an issue that is going to be on the docket within a matter of months.

Chairman Specter. Judge Roberts, I am not talking about an issue. I am talking about the essence of jurisprudence. I am talking about the essence of a man/ woman-made test in the Supreme Court which has no grounding in the Constitution, no grounding in the Federalist Papers, no grounding in the history of the country, comes out of thin air in 1997, and it is used in Lane and Garrett, two 5-4 decisions on identical records, on an identical act, and the country and the Congress are supposed to figure out what the Court means. So I am really talking about jurisprudence.

Senator Kennedy. Let me ask you about those that are faced with disabilities. Do you think the 50 million Americans that are faced with disabilities in one form or another, challenges I like to say, do you think that we have the authority and the power to free this country, free our Nation from the forms of discrimination against those who have disability?

Judge Roberts. I do, Senator. Now, there are issues that come up, as you know, in several of the cases before the Supreme Court on the particular applications of that, cases concerning the question of do you have the authority under Section 5 of the 14th Amendment to abrogate State sovereign immunity if the claim of disability discrimination concerns a State as a defendant. And as you know, in the Garrett case there was conclusion that the authority was not there. Later in the Lane case under Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the conclusion was that the sufficient record had been established that there was the authority.

So while as a general matter, there is the authority in a particular case that may come up against other provisions in the Constitution, or--in that case the recognition of State sovereign immunity, and that presents an issue that the courts have to address.

Senator Kennedy. You mentioned the Lane case. That was decided 5-4, 5-4. We are going to hear later today from Beverly Jones, who was a plaintiff in that case. I have listened the her and met with her before, an extraordinary woman, mother of two, trying to provide for her family, court reporter, and it was either a issue or question whether she was going to crawl up the flight of stairs to have access to the courtroom and have someone bring up her wheelchair, or whether she was effectively going to be denied that opportunity to have access to a courtroom in Tennessee.

Four Justices indicated in their dissent that this kind of an issue or question ought to be resolved by States, effectively, 50 States ought to be making that judgment. I strongly believe that this country, in its march towards progress in dealing with disabilities, with Americans with Disabilities Act, the Rehabilitation Act, the work that was done with IDEA over a long period of time, that we have come to the point where we as a country want to invite all of those with forms of disability to be a part of the main stream. But that was a 5-4 decision.

And I appreciate the fact your at least answer in the Lane v. Tennessee, that you are at least sympathetic to the judgment that Justice O'Connor made in indicating that accommodation for those with disability in that case was appropriate.

Judge Roberts. Well, it's certainly the precedent of the Court in that area and I have no quarrel with it. The issue of course is whether or not Congress has the authority under Section 5 of the 14th Amendment to abrogate the State's sovereign immunity. It's not a policy judgment by the Court about leaving things to the States or the Federal Government, but a legal determination of whether the State's sovereign immunity has been abrogated. And the Court determined in that case that Congress did have that authority and that it could authorize the suit against the State institution.

Senator Kennedy. We are going to come back to sort of the kind of legalist determinations that make an extraordinary difference in terms of people's lives. We welcome guidance and invitation about which particular provisions of the Constitution that we ought to utilize in order to strike down these forms of discrimination.

Senator Feingold. Thank you, Judge.

Judge, you argued an important case before the Supreme Court concerning who is protected under the Americans With Disabilities Act. It was called Toyota v. Williams. Ms. Williams suffered from hand, wrist, and arm pain while working in an engine assembly line. She was diagnose with carpal tunnel syndrome, and her physician placed her on permanent work restrictions. Her pain continued and she did not think that her employer was addressing her physician-ordered work restrictions appropriately, so she sued under the ADA. You represented Toyota in the case before the Supreme Court, and this was a case of statutory interpretation, so I assume you are quite familiar with the legislative history of that Act.

Do you agree with the statement of one of the Justices during oral argument that the Act was primarily intended to protect people who are "wheelchair-bound"?

Judge Roberts. The Act contains a definition of disability, and that's what the issue was about, and that definition does not contain that type of restriction. So, you know, I don't want to comment on issues that might come before me, but the case was about the definition. The definition was not restricted in that way.

The only point I would make--and I'm sure you appreciate this--is that a lot of times the statements during oral argument are certainly not expressions of either the Justices' view--they're often playing a devil's advocate, and I don't even remember that question. I don't know if it was directed at me or the other counsel, but it may well have been intended to elicit a response to flesh out more fully what the definition was.

Senator Feingold. More generally, do you believe that the ADA or any other civil rights statute should be interpreted narrowly or broadly when it comes to the issue of who it protects?

Judge Roberts. Well, I have to say I think it should be interpreted consistent with Congress' intent, and you look at a lot of different factors in trying to flesh that out.

If you folks here in Congress had a particular--in any statute, a narrow focus, then to give that focus a broader impact I think would be wrong. If you had a broad focus, as, of course, you often do when you're dealing with statutes designed to address discrimination, giving that interpretation a narrow focus would be wrong.

The effort in every case is to try to give it the right focus, and that's the focus that you intended when you passed the law.

Senator Feingold. Thank you, Judge, and I appreciate all your answers.

Civil Rights – Fourteenth Amendment, Section 5

Senator DeWine. Judge, let me turn to the area of congressional power. It has been talked about before here, but I want to talk about it a little bit more. Really, this has to do with federalism cases. As you know, the Court has handed down a number of cases that have restricted the power of Congress to pass important legislation. The Court has struck down portions of the Violence Against Women Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, just to name a few.

In some of these cases the Court restricted Congress's power under the Commerce Clause. In some it relied on the 11th Amendment, and in some it cited Section 5 of the 14th Amendment. The particular provision is not that important for this discussion. Let me be perfectly frank. I think there are some problems with these decisions. I think it is wrong for judges to take on the role of policymaker. I realize that if a statute is blatantly unconstitutional, a judge has to do their duty. But I think for the reason I am going to discuss in a minute, that was not true in these cases.

I want to cite one example, and that is--because of time I can only go through one--and that is the Garrett case, a 5-4 decision, Board of Trustees v. Garrett. As you know, this case involved a woman who said that she had been discriminated against because she was disabled. She was employed by the State of Alabama. She sued the State under the Americans with Disabilities Act. The Supreme Court threw out the suit, holding that there was no evidence that the State discriminated against the disabled in employment decisions. I think the problem with Garrett is that the Court ignored findings by Congress.

There were other cases that have been decided, where we did not have findings, and you are familiar with those. I understand the Court's decisions. I might like them or not like them, but I understand them.

This case we made findings. While we were considering the Americans with Disabilities Act we held 13 hearings and we set up a task force, a task force that held hearings in every State. It was attended by more than 30,000 individuals. Based on these hearings we found 300 examples of disabled individuals being discriminated against in employment decisions. We found that two-thirds of all disabled Americans between the ages of 16 and 64 were not working at all, even though a large majority of them were capable of doing so. We found that this discrimination flowed from stereotypic assumptions about the disabled, as well as, quote, "purposeful, unequal treatment," all findings by this elected Congress of the United States.

In Garrett, however, the Court said this was not enough. They rejected our fact findings, holding that we had not pointed to any evidence that the States discriminated in employment decisions against the disabled.

Judge, you have stressed repeatedly in your writings and your opinions--and I have a great deal of respect for you and appreciate these writings and opinions--you stressed the limited role that judges must play in our system of Government. I applaud you for that approach. It is important for me to ensure that you still hold to this belief. In your opinion, what role should a judge play when reviewing congressional fact findings? In your view, how much deference do congressional fact findings deserve? I understand you are not going to talk about this case, or any of the cases I have just cited. I wanted to lay that kind of as a predicate. I wanted to tell you where I am coming from.

But just talk in general about when you see fact findings by Congress, when we have held hearings, when we have established a record, how do you approach? What are the tools that you use, Judge, based on the precedents and based on what you think the role of the judge is?

Judge Roberts. Again, and of course, without getting into the particulars, the reason that congressional fact finding and determination is important in these cases is because the courts recognize that they can't do that. Courts can't have, as you said, whatever it was, the 13 separate hearings before passing particular legislation. Courts--the Supreme Court can't sit and hear witness after witness after witness in a particular area and develop that kind of a record. Courts can't make the policy judgments about what type of legislation is necessary in light of the findings that are made. So the findings play an important role, and I think it is correct to say under the law in this area and others, they're neither necessary nor necessarily sufficient. But I know as a judge that they're extremely helpful when there are findings.

And judges know when they look at those, that they're the result of an exhaustive process of a sort that the Court cannot duplicate. We simply don't have the institutional expertise or the resources or the authority to engage in that type of a process. So that is sort of the basis for the deference to the fact finding that is made. It's institutional competence. The courts don't have it. Congress does. It's constitutional authority. It's not our job. It is your job. So the defence to congressional findings in this area has a solid basis.

Now, the particular area you're talking about under Section 5 of the 14th Amendment, the Garrett case, there are of course more recent cases that you know of, Tennessee v. Lane and the Hibbs case in Nevada v. Hibbs, where the Court did defer to the fact finding in those cases, and particularly in the Hibbs case focused on the legislative recognition based on its examination of the factual record developed at hearings about the statute that was at issue there, and the particular approach that they were taking to remedy discrimination under the 14th Amendment, which is the authority that Congress has.

Now, the legal requirement that the Court has articulated there came of course from the City of Boerne case, that the remedial approach has to be congruent and proportional. Justice Scalia signed on to that approach in the City of Boerne case. In the Lane case he said he had changed his mind and he no longer agreed with that. Any area of the law where Justice Scalia is changing his mind, has got to be one that is particularly difficult, and one that I think is appropriately regarded as still evolving and emerging. And so I don't know if the more recent cases in Lane and Hibbs represent a swinging of the pendulum away from cases like Garrett and Kimmel on the other side, or if it's simply part of the process of the Court trying to come to rest with an approach in this area.

But it is an area that the Court has found difficult, and just as a general matter, I think when you get to this point of reweighing congressional findings, that starts to look more like a legislative function, and the courts need to be very careful as they get into that area, to make sure that they're interpreting the law and not making it.

Chairman Specter. I am going to move now to the confrontation between Congress and the Court, and what I consider to be denigrating comments about the Congress. In the Morrison case, in the face of a overwhelming factual record, the Court, 5-4 decision, said that parts of the legislation to protect women against violence unconstitutional because of the congressional "method of reasoning." And then the dissent picked up the conclusion that the majority's view was "dependent upon a uniquely judicial competence" with the other side of the coin being congressional incompetence. And then in the dissent in Tennessee v. Lane Justice Scalia says that the Court engaged in ill-advised proceedings to make itself the "task master" to see if the Congress has done its homework. You commented a few minutes ago that you would be respectful of Congress. Do we have your commitment that you won't characterize your method of reasoning as superior to ours?

Judge Roberts. I don't think it's appropriate--

Chairman Specter. In your particular case, maybe yours is, but--

Judge Roberts. No, no.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. As a generalization--we have gone around this with other nominees, and after they have gone to the Court, they have not been mindful as to what they have said here. But I take umbrage at what the Court has said and so do my colleagues. There isn't a method of reasoning which changes when you move across the green from the Senate columns to the Supreme Court columns. And we do our homework, evidenced by what has gone on in this hearing, and we do not like being treated as schoolchildren, requiring, as Justice Scalia says, a task master.

Will you do better on this subject, Judge Roberts?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't think the Court should be the task master of Congress. I think the Constitution is the Court's task master, and it's Congress' task master as well. And we each have responsibilities under the Constitution. And I appreciate very much the differences in institutional competence between the judiciary and the Congress when it comes to basic questions of fact finding, development of a record, and also the authority to make the policy decisions about how to act on the basis of a particular record. It's not just disagreement over a record. It's a question of whose job it is to make a determination based on the record. Now--

Chairman Specter. On the record. In U.S. v. Morrison, the legislation to protect women against violence, the record showed that there were reporters on gender bias from the task force in 21 States and eight separate reports issued by Congress and its committees over a long course of time leading to the enactment and the characterization by the dissenters that there was a mountain of evidence.

What more does the Congress have to do to establish a record that will be respected by the Court? And this is where the five-person majority threw it over, not because of the record but because of the method of reasoning. Isn't that record palpably sufficient to sustain the constitutionality of the Act?

Judge Roberts. Well, Mr. Chairman, I don't want to comment on the correctness of incorrectness of a particular decision. What I will say--

Chairman Specter. Well, Judge Roberts, let me interrupt you there for a minute. Why not? The case is over. This isn't a case which is likely to come before you again.

These are the specific facts based on the rape of the woman--alleged rape by the three VMI students. I liked your answers yesterday. You were willing to answer more questions about cases on the differentiation that they are not likely to come before the Court. This is not likely to come before the Court again. Isn't this record sufficient in Morrison to--

Judge Roberts. Well, Mr. Chairman, I must respectfully disagree. I have been willing to comment on cases that I think are not likely to come before the Court again. I think the particular question you ask about the adequacy of findings, make a determination of the impact on interstate commerce, is likely to come before the Court again. And expressing an opinion on whether the Morrison case was correct or incorrect would be prejudging those cases that are likely to come before the Court again. And that is the line--it's not just a line that I'm drawing. It's a line that, as I've read the transcripts, every nominee who's sitting on the Court today drew. Some of them drew the line far more aggressively and wouldn't even comment on cases like Marbury v. Madison.

What I can tell you is that with respect to review of congressional findings, that my view of the appropriate role of a judge is a limited role and that you do not make the law, and that it seems to me that one of the warning flags that should suggest to you as a judge that you may be beginning to transgress into the area of making a law is when you are in a position of re-evaluating legislative findings, because that doesn't look like a judicial function. It's not an application of analysis under the Constitution. It's just another look at findings.

Now, again, I don't feel it's appropriate to comment on Morrison. I do feel it's appropriate to tell you that I appreciate the differences between Congress and the courts with respect to findings, both with respect to the issue of the capability and competence to undertake that enterprise, and also with respect to the issue of authority to make a decision based on the findings.

Chairman Specter. Judge Roberts, we will have to agree to disagree about that. I don't think the facts of Morrison are likely to come before the Court, but I ask the questions, you answer them.

Chairman Specter. . . . Let me come now to the Americans With Disabilities Act, and you have 5-4 decisions going opposite ways. Ms. Garrett had breast cancer. The Court in 2001 said that the title of the Disabilities Act was unconstitutional, 5-4, on employment discrimination. Then 3 years later, you have the case coming up of Lane, the paraplegic crawling up the steps, accommodations, 5-4, and the Act is upheld. The record in the case was very extensive--13 congressional hearings, a task force that held hearings in every State, attended by more than 30,000 people, including thousands who had experienced discrimination. And in the Garrett case, the Supreme Court of the United States used a doctrine which had been in vogue only since 1997 in the Boerne case. You and I discussed this in my office. They came up with a standard of what is congruent and proportionate. Congruence and proportionality.

I was interested in your statement when we talked informally that you did not find those in the 14th Amendment. I did not either. Now, they plucked congruence and proportionality right out of thin air, and when Scalia dissented, he said that the congruence and proportionality test was a "flabby test," which is a "invitation to judicial arbitrariness by policy-driven decisionmaking."

Now, you said yesterday that you did not think that there was judicial activism when the Court overruled an act of Congress. Isn't this congruence and proportionality test, which comes out of thin air, a classic example of judicial activism where the view of congruence--hard to find a definition for congruence. Proportionality, hard to find a definition for proportionality. I have searched and cannot find any.

Isn't that the very essence of what is in the eye of the beholder where the Court takes carte blanche to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional?

Judge Roberts. Well, these questions arise, of course, under, as you know, section 5 of the 14th Amendment, where the issue is Congress' power to address violations of the 14th Amendment. And it's an extraordinary grant of power, and the Court has always recognized it as such. And their decisions in recent years--it's not just, as you point out, the Garrett case on the one hand and the Lane case on the other. You have the Hibbs case recently, which upheld Congress' exercise of authority. The most recent cases--Lane and Hibbs--uphold Congress' exercise of authority to abrogate--

Chairman Specter. But, Judge Roberts, they uphold it at the pleasure of the Court. Congress can't figure that out. There is no way we can tell what is congruent and proportional in the eyes of the Court.

Judge Roberts. Well, and that was Justice Scalia's position in dissent. He had originally--

Chairman Specter. Do you agree with Scalia?

Judge Roberts. Well, again, the congruent and proportional test--

Chairman Specter. Do you disagree with Justice Scalia?

Judge Roberts. I don't think it's appropriate in an area--and there are cases coming up, as you know, Mr. Chairman. There's a case on the docket right now that considers the congruence and proportionality test.

Chairman Specter. That is why I am raising it with you. I would like to see a sensible interpretation of the Court in that case.

Judge Roberts. Well, and if I am confirmed and I do have to sit on that case, I would approach that with an open mind and consider the arguments. I can't give you a commitment here today about how I will approach an issue that is going to be on the docket within a matter of months.

Civil Rights – Gender Discrimination

Senator Biden. Okay. Judge, is gender discrimination, as you have written in a memo, a perceived problem or is it a real problem?

Judge Roberts. The memo you talked about, Senator, I've had a chance to look at it. It concerned a 50-State inventory of particular proposals to address it. "Perceived" was not being used in that case to suggest that there was any doubt that there is gender discrimination and that it should be addressed. What it was referring to was a vast inventory, and I was not sure if the particular proposals in each case were supported in every State of the 50-State survey that was involved.

Of course, gender discrimination is a serious problem. It's a particular concern of mine and always has been. I grew up with three sisters, all of whom work outside the home. I married a lawyer who works outside the home. I have a young daughter who I hope will have all of the opportunities available to her without regard to any gender discrimination.

There is no suggestion in anything that I've written of any resistance to the basic idea of full citizenship without regard to gender.

Senator Biden. Let me ask you a question then, Judge, and I am glad to hear that. Do you think that if a State law distinguishes between a right that your daughter may have and your son may have or your wife may have or your sister may have and your brother may have that the Supreme Court should engage in heightened scrutiny, not just look and see whether or not it makes any sense, but taken an extra special look? You and I know the terms, but the public listening here--the Supreme Court has said since 1971, you know, when a State passes a law that treats in any way a woman than a man, there may be a rationale for it, but the Supreme Court is going to take a very close look--not strict scrutiny, which means you can hardly ever get over that bar, like race, but can take a heightened look, they are going to look at it more closely. Do you think that that needs to be done, that the Constitution calls for that?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator, I do. And I, again, always have. The confusion is in the use of the term. There are those who use the term "heightened scrutiny" to refer to what you just called "strict scrutiny," which is generally limited to issues of race or similar issues. The discrimination on the basis of gender, distinctions on the basis of gender, is subject to what the Supreme Court has called "intermediate scrutiny." There has to be a substantial Government interest--an important Government interest and a substantial connection in the discrimination. But the Supreme Court's equal protection analysis has three tiers now--

Senator Biden. I understand. My time is running out. I would love to hear the explanation of the three tiers, but let's stick to this one for just a second. Then explain to me what you meant 10 years after the decision laying out this level of scrutiny when you wrote in a 1981 memo to your boss, you wrote that gender "is not a criterion calling for heightened judicial review." What did you mean by that?

Judge Roberts. Referring to what you called strict scrutiny.

Senator Biden. He didn't know the difference between heightened and strict?

Judge Roberts. Well, I was about to lay it out, and you said you didn't want to hear about it.

[Laughter.]

DOJ_NMG_0035706

Judge Roberts. Strict scrutiny is the-- Senator Biden. No, I know what that is. I wonder what you meant by-- Chairman Specter. Senator Biden, let him finish his answer.

Senator Biden. But I have no time left, Mr. Chairman. I understand the answer.

[Laughter.]

Senator Biden. I understand the Supreme Court has three levels of scrutiny. My point was, in the context of this memo, in the context of this memorandum, the question was whether or not the Court should, in fact, have a heightened scrutiny.

Judge Roberts. And, Senator, the memorandum is using "heightened scrutiny" the way you used "strict scrutiny," which is the scrutiny that's limited to the basis of race. The gender discrimination is, as you know, subject to what called "intermediate scrutiny," and that is not what the memo is referring to with respect to heightened scrutiny. It's referring to the strict scrutiny that's restricted to issues of race and ethnicity.

Senator Biden. Well, I will come back to that in the second round because that is not my reading of what you said. But let me get on another issue here, again, in the sex discrimination area.

The Attorney General for Civil Rights, a former Delawarean, not viewed as a darling of the left, Bradford Reynolds, decided that the Federal Government should take action against the State of Kentucky, and they said that there is a very strong record that the Kentucky prison system discriminates against female prisoners. And I am going to finish my whole question. And you wrote to the Attorney General, "I recommend you do not approve intervention in this case." And then you set out three reasons why you shouldn't approve of it--not that there wasn't discrimination. You said, one, that private plaintiffs are already bringing suit; secondly, the United States' argument would have been based upon giving higher scrutiny to claims of gender classification; and, thirdly, that we need to be concerned about tight prison budgets, you say, and you go on to explain that if, in fact, you hold them to the same standard, they may get rid of the program for the men.

Now, explain to me your thinking there. That seems to me--

Judge Roberts. I'm sorry. What was the date of the memo, Senator?

Senator Biden. The date of the memo was February 12, 1982. I will give you a copy, ask them to bring you down a copy of the memo.

Judge Roberts. I can't elaborate on--I can't elaborate beyond what's in the memo. I just--

Senator Biden. Well, I hope you don't still hold that view, man. I mean, if the idea that you're not going to--that a conservative civil rights--the head of the Civil Rights Division in the Reagan administration says it is pretty clear Kentucky is discriminating against women in their prison system, and you say, in effect, that may be but, look, we shouldn't move on it, I recommend we don't do anything about this, and the reason we shouldn't do anything this is three-fold: one, private citizens already went ahead and filed suit on this; number two, if, in fact, you go ahead and do this, they may do away with the system for the men because there's tight budgets--and I forget the third one. You now have the memo.

Judge Roberts. Well, I have the memo and see that one of the areas that you mentioned I say that--and this is to the Attorney General, and I say the reason we shouldn't do this is because "you have publicly opposed such approaches." So, again, it would have been--

Senator Biden. It was only his idea, then? I mean, you were just protecting him so he wouldn't be inconsistent?

Judge Roberts. I was a lawyer on his staff, and according to this memorandum--and, again, I don't remember anything independently of this 23 years ago. But the memorandum suggests, a staff lawyer to his boss, that this is inconsistent with what you have said. And, again, I guess I would regard that as good staff work rather than anything else.

Senator Biden. I regard it as very poor staff work, with all due respect, Judge, because it seems to me you insert your views very strongly in here. You don't say you said this. You say, And, by the way, there's other reasons why we shouldn't do this. Assume you're saying you wouldn't go this route before, but I want to give you more ammunition here, Brad. Private plaintiffs have done this; it is inconsistent with three themes in your judicial restraints effort: equal protection claim, relief of a well-involved judicial inference, et cetera; and, by the way, the end result may be with tight budgets they may do away with this.

My time is running out. I will come back to this. I hope you get a chance to study it between now and the time we get back to the second round.

Senator Feinstein. Thanks very much, Mr. Chairman.

Good afternoon, Judge Roberts. I want to follow up on something that Senator Kohl said in his last question, which was sort of asking you to do a look-back into some of the things you have written and said. And you have written--and this involves women--either in margin notes or in comments or in memos, and I want to list for you some of the comments and ask you what do you think of them, what do you think of them today.

In a memorandum to Fred Fielding, White House Counsel under President Reagan, about the nomination of a woman to be recognized for moving from homemaker to lawyer, and your response to nominating this woman for an award was this: "Some might question whether encouraging homemakers to become lawyers contributes to the common good, but I suppose that's for the judges to decide."

In a memo responding to a letter from three Republican Congresswomen that raised concerns about the pay gap that women experience, you said, and I quote, "Their slogan may as well be `From each according to his ability, to each according to her gender.'"

You also wrote that the Congresswomen's concerns "ignore the factors that explain that apparent disparity, such as seniority, the fact that many women frequently leave the workforce for extended periods of time," et cetera.

In another memo, you implied that it is a canard that women are discriminated against because they receive 59 cents, at that time, to every $1 earned by men.

In a September 26, 1983, memo to Fred Fielding, you rejected an alternative proposed constitutional amendment guaranteeing equal rights to women.

In 1982, you wrote a memo to the then-Attorney General in which you refer to the task force which was to conduct a governmentwide review to determine those laws which discrminate on the basis of gender as "the Ladies Task Force."

I mention these examples to highlight what appears to be either a very acerbic pen or else you really thought that way. Did you really think that way? And do you think that way today?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I have always supported and support today equal rights for women, particularly in the workplace. I was very pleased when I saw, for example, the report of the National Association of Women Lawyers who went out and talked and interviewed with women lawyers who've worked with me, who've appeared before me, and the conclusion was that I not only always treated women lawyers with respect and equal dignity, but that I had made special accommodations for life-work issues to ensure that women could continue to progress, for example, at my law firm, and had already treated women who appeared before me in a perfectly professional way.

Senator Feinstein. Then why say those things?

Judge Roberts. Well, let's take the first one you mentioned. It is to me obvious in the memo that I wrote to Fred Fielding that it was about whether or not it's good to have more lawyers. Whether they were from homemakers, from plumbers, from artists or truck drivers had nothing to do with it. The point was: Is it good to have more lawyers? That's the way I intended it, and I'm sure that's the way--

Senator Feinstein. And you don't think it was good to have more lawyers.

Judge Roberts. I think there were probably--the point that Mr. Fielding and I had commented on, on many occasions, was that in many areas there were too many lawyers, and that's a common joke that goes back to Shakespeare. It has nothing to do with homemakers. The notion that that was my view is totally inconsistent and rebutted by my life. I married a lawyer. I was raised with three sisters who worked outside the home. I have a daughter for whom I will insist at every turn that she has equal citizenship rights with her brother.

Senator Feinstein. Okay. I don't want to belabor it. I am just trying to understand how you think, because you appear--you know, you speak about modesty and humility, and yet none of these comments are modest or humble.

Judge Roberts. Well, those comments were in the nature of the tone that was encouraged in our office. It was a small office. They expected we turn projects around very quickly. We were expected to be candid, and if making a joke about lawyers would make for a more enjoyable day on the part of the people in the office, that's what we did.

Senator Feinstein. So it is fair to say you don't think that way; is that correct?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't think in any way that is based on anything other than full equal citizenship rights on the basis of gender. I might tell a lawyer's joke that there are too many lawyers today, but that's all it was back then.

On the memo you quoted with respect to the issue of comparable worth, the one thing the memorandum made clear is that the position of the administration was there must be equal pay for equal work. That wasn't the issue in that case. The issue there was whether there should be equal pay for different work and whether judges should determine what type of work was equal.

Senator Feinstein. I am not arguing that. I am just arguing what you said--or bringing to your attention what you said then. But I don't want to belabor it. I think you have answered the question.

Let me ask you a question on Canterino v. Wilson. This is about the same time, in 1982. And you pointed out in answers to prior questions that you were staff and you generally did what people asked you to do. In this case, William Bradford Reynolds, the top attorney in the Civil Rights Division, indicated that there had been substantial, he thought, discrimination in prisons in Kentucky and that the Justice Department had done an investigation and they found that male prisoners were given training for higher-paid jobs, for a greater variety of jobs, and were given training for longer periods of time. Your memo contradicted his recommendation to intervene.

Why would that be if you just follow the policy of the office?

Judge Roberts. My understanding there was that there was a question whether intervention in that case--the case was being pursued by private litigants already--a question whether intervention by the Federal Government in that case was consistent with the Attorney General's approach to institutional litigation. That was an approach that he had laid out in several speeches, memoranda, and as a staff member, it was my job to call to his attention areas where I thought there may be inconsistencies in areas where he wanted to set policy priorities.

Senator Sessions. … With regard to the question of comparable work, I think Senator Feinstein was clear about this, but I would like to make it a little bit clearer. You have consistently favored equal pay for equal work, have you not, and did not President Reagan also favor that explicitly and openly?

Judge Roberts. Absolutely.

Senator Sessions. It is the question of this comparable worth theory that apparently one District Court found in favor of, but that every Circuit Court and every other court that considered it, rejected it, that said that some body, some commission, I guess, would decide whether a secretary should be paid as much as a truck driver and make those kind of value judgment decisions. Is that not the difference between those two aspects?

Judge Roberts. That's right. Yeah, there is no question of equal pay for equal work. It's the idea that someone should decide that different jobs are of comparable worth and that therefore they should be paid the same. And the District Court adopted that approach, was reversed by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in an opinion by then-Judge Anthony Kennedy.

Senator Sessions. That is right. I know he did right on that, and I think that the Sixth, Seventh, Tenth and Ninth Circuits all rejected that idea, and frankly, it has not been heard from since. I am glad that you and President Reagan did not agree to that at the time. We would have commissions of incredible complexity trying to decide very important matters. The National Academy of Sciences, in fact, found and declared it did not believe that the value of worth of jobs could be determined by fair and scientific methods. So I think that is important.

Let me ask you one last question in the few minutes remaining here. I have listened to some of the questions asked about gender and sex discrimination. They have come up repeatedly during the course of this. And as you look at the standards that are applied to equal protection for a variety of different circumstances, there are different standards. I think you started to explain them at one point today. Maybe you got through the explanation. I am not sure. But under strict scrutiny, the suspect classifications include race and national origin, religion, alienage, and the like. Then there is, of course, the other standard of what is characterized as middle-tier scrutiny, which includes quasi-suspect classifications of gender and illegitimacy.

As you look back at the sweep of history that created these different standards, can you rationalize the difference between discrimination based on race and based on gender?

Judge Roberts. Well, I can tell you what the Court has done. There are Justices who aren't comfortable with the different tiers. They say there's one Equal Protection Clause. But the different tiers are fairly well establish as an approach to the different areas in discrimination. And the rationale for it is that there are areas in which you think it is almost never the case that distinctions that are drawn can be legitimate, distinctions based on race or ethnicity. And so they're subject to the most heightened scrutiny.

The rational relation test which applies across the board to any type of law, there it's quite often the case that distinctions drawn on whatever basis Congress wants are likely to reflect the different sorts of policy judgments.

Gender issues are in the middle tier because the Court thinks that there are situations where distinctions can be justified, and there are other situations--but it's more than just the rational relation, but not as suspect as the most heightened level because there may be other justifications. Cases throughout the Court's history where they have upheld distinctions under that analysis, like the all-male draft, for example, that was upheld.

Now, if you had applied strict scrutiny to that type of classification, perhaps the result would have been different and the all-male draft would have been struck down. It reflects the Court's determination that these are not sort of almost always inherently irrational and discrimination rather than legitimate governmental distinctions, but that it's entitled to a heightened degree of scrutiny beyond the rational relation test. Justice Ginsburg, I think, in her opinion in the VMI case said that the intermediate scrutiny had to be applied with--I forget the exact phrase--"exacting rigor" or something along those lines, to indicate that it is well beyond the rational relation test, but it's not as inherently suspect as racial classifications.

Senator Hatch. Well, thank you. Now, also yesterday the Democrat staff of the Committee released a press release stating that you failed to distance yourself from what it called your "earlier cramped positions on Title IX and women's rights." And after listening to you yesterday, I did not find your earlier positions cramped at all. In fact, as you explained here to the Committee, many of the documents that questioners relied upon reflected the positions of the Reagan administration for which you worked.

Now, what assurance can you give the Committee that you will fairly interpret the civil rights laws, including critical statutes such as Title IX, fully and fairly, consistent with the purposes Congress intended in passing these laws?

Judge Roberts. Well, I can give the commitment that I appreciate that my role as a judge is different than my role as a staff lawyer for an administration. As a judge, I have no agenda. I have a guide in the Constitution and the laws and the precedents of the Court, and those are what I would apply with an open mind, after fully and fairly considering the arguments and assessing the considered views of my colleagues on the bench. That's the way I would approach cases in that area, as in any other area.

The approach of someone who is obviously a staff lawyer in an administration is very different. The approach of someone who is an advocate for a client before the Court is obviously very different. Those are positions that I have held in the past. I am now a judge, and I have had the experience and I think my record will establish that that is how I approach cases across the spectrum of issues that are raised before the courts.

Senator Hatch. So I find it strange to criticize you because you won a case [Grove City] in the Supreme Court and have not advocated against women's rights in any way, shape, or form ever in your career, as far as I can understand. Is that correct?

Judge Roberts. That's correct, Senator.

Senator Hatch. And, in fact, you are a strong supporter of women's rights and gender equality?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator.

Senator Hatch. Okay.

Senator Kennedy. Now let me ask you about gender discrimination. We find out over the history of this country, as you are very familiar, how women have been discriminated against in all forms and all shapes, and now I want to ask you whether you believe that we have the power and the authority to pass legislation to free our Nation from discrimination against women in our society?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator, I do. I'm familiar with the various legislative enactments in the area that protect the right to work and so forth, free from discrimination.

Civil Rights – Generally (includes Plyler; EEOC memo)

Senator Kennedy. If we could move on now, the Brown decision was just the beginning of the historic march for progress towards equal rights for all of our citizens. In the 1960s and 1970s, we came together as a Congress, Republicans and Democrats alike, and passed the historic civil rights legislation that was signed by the President to guarantee equality for all of our citizens on the basis of race, then on gender, then on disability.

We passed legislation to eliminate the barriers to voting that so many minorities had faced in too many States in the country. We passed legislation that prevented racial discrimination in housing.

Those landmark laws were supported by Republicans and Democrats in Congress and they were signed into law by both Republican and Democratic Presidents. Intelligent and dedicated attorneys in the Justice Department and in the White House and on Capitol Hill devoted their extraordinary talents and imagination and perseverance to making these laws effective. Every one of the new laws was tested in court all the way to the Supreme Court, and I would like to find out, Judge Roberts, whether you would agree that the progress that we made in civil rights over the past 50 years is irreversible.

I would like to find out whether you think that these laws are constitutional or whether you have any concerns or questions about them. Do you have any concerns or reservations about the constitutionality of the 1964 Civil Rights Act that outlawed racial discrimination in public accommodations, employment, and other areas?

Judge Roberts. I don't think any issue has been raised concerning those. You know, I'm cautious, of course, about expressing an opinion on a matter that might come before the Court. I don't think that's one that's likely to come before the Court, so I'm not aware of any questions that have been raised concerning that, Senator.

Senator Kennedy. How about the constitutionality of the 1968 Fair Housing legislation that outlaws racial discrimination in housing?

Judge Roberts. Again, I think that my understanding is it's been upheld and I'm not aware of any issues that are arising under it. I suppose if there's a particular claim that's entered under that statute, litigants make all sorts of arguments and they may raise an argument that it's unconstitutional as applied in a particular case and the court would have to decide that question.

Senator Schumer. … The other thing that troubled me was the issue of civil rights. Many of us consider racism the Nation's poison. De Toqueville wrote about that since 1832. And we know you wrote these series of memos 20 to 25 years ago. Some of them are written in a tone that suggests you may have been insensitive to discrimination and hostile to equal rights. And I have talked to people who might have felt just that. People have said that.

So my question is not the substance, but do you regret the tone of some of these memos? Do you regret some of the inartful phrases you used in those memos or reference to illegal amigos in one memo?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, in that particular memo, for example, it was a play on the standard practice of many politicians, including President Reagan, when he was talking to a Hispanic audience, he would throw in some language in Spanish. Again, the memos were from me to Fred Fielding. I think Mr. Fielding always found the tone--

Senator Schumer. You don't regret using that term? Could you think that some people might find it offensive?

Judge Roberts. It was meant to convey the notion--again, as I've described--that when politicians speak to a particular audience in that language, is that offensive to the audience? It was meant to convey that. It was an issue concerning a particular radio interview.

You know, the tone was, I think, generally appropriate for a memo from me to Mr. Fielding, and I know that he never suggested that it was anything other than appropriate.

Senator Schumer. I would have to disagree with you, but we will leave it at that.

On a more substantive level, in light of where we are in 2005--admittedly we have progressed in civil rights since 1982--can you identify any policy or piece of legislation you argued for or supported in the Reagan era that you now believe went too far, that you now believe would not be good enough for America? I am not challenging that you were representing somebody else than, as you have said to us before, but I am asking in hindsight--it is now 2005, you are almost double the years on this Earth. Any of those policies that you think now, using hindsight, shouldn't have been done?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I think some 80,000 pages have been released of memoranda that I wrote--

Senator Schumer. You can just pick one or two.

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't--you know, I have not gone back and re-evaluated all those policies, no. I do know, though, for example, in the area of civil rights, people have talked about memos I wrote about the administration's policy against busing or the administration's policy against quotas. Being against busing and being against quotas is not the same as being against civil rights. President Reagan was against busing. President Reagan was against quotas. But he was in favor of civil rights, and that was the administration position that I was advancing in those memoranda.

Senator Schumer. I understand you were advancing someone else's position. I was asking your own view, if there were any regrets or changes in viewpoint of you personally. But we will leave it at that if you don't want to mention any.

Senator Durbin. Many of the organizations that oppose your nomination represent minorities in America. You have the distinction of being opposed by LULAC. This, of course, is the first time this Hispanic organization has ever opposed a Supreme Court nominee. You are also opposed by MALDEF. I personally think that their feelings go beyond the comment "illegal amigos" that you talked about yesterday. And I want to point you to one particular area that they find troubling, when I speak to them, and I find troubling. And it goes back to the case of Plyler v. Doe, a 1982 Supreme Court case, that held it unconstitutional to deny elementary education to children on the basis of their immigration status. It was a Texas case. The Court struck down the Texas law and allowed elementary schools, 23 years ago, to refuse entrance to undocumented children, struck down the law that allowed the schools to refuse entrance.

On the day the case was decided--and I think the timing is important here, because it appears to be kind of a gratuitous comment. It isn't as if you were asked for an opinion. On the day it was decided, you coauthored a memo that criticized the Solicitor General's office for failing to file a brief supporting the Texas law which would have refused education to these children. Your memo disagreed with the administration's position on the case, so it isn't as if you were arguing the Reagan administration's position. They had taken a different position on the case.

Can you describe your involvement in the case? And I guess more importantly, can you describe now how you feel about this today, 23 years later, when the largest--

Judge Roberts. Well--

Senator Durbin. I will just finish, and I will leave you the time you need to answer. When the largest, fastest-growing segment of America's population is Hispanic, when the major Hispanic organizations feel that this showed real insensitivity to who they were and what their children needed? Can you explain that memo that really wasn't part of the Reagan agenda? Why did you say this?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think, Senator, if I'm remembering the memo--and it was 23 years ago, and the case that was decided was, I believe, again, a divided decision by the Supreme Court. If I'm remembering the memo correctly, it was making the point that the position was inconsistent with the Attorney General's litigation policy approach, if that's the right memorandum.

Senator Durbin. It is.

Judge Roberts. Well, in that case, again, as a staff lawyer, I thought it was my obligation to call to the Attorney General's attention activities in the Department that I thought were inconsistent with what he had articulated as his approach. And that is what I would have been doing in that case. And, again, it would have been apparently supporting the State of Texas in its legislative determination in that area.

Senator Durbin. Well, did you agree with the decision now--or, pardon me, then? Or do you agree with it now?

Judge Roberts. I don't--I haven't looked at the decision in Plyler v. Doe in 23 years, Senator, and there is nothing gratuitous about the memorandum. It obviously came out because the decision came out. That would have been why I was advising the Attorney General with respect to it.

Obviously, the importance of the availability of education for all is vital. That's a different question than the legal issues involved and whether a State law should be struck down.

Senator Durbin. So let me say this: Twenty-three years later, millions of children have benefited from this decision. They have been educated in America. Many have gone on to become citizens. Some are business people. Some are professionals. Some are serving in our military today because Plyler was decided in a way that you apparently disagreed with 23 years ago. So my question to you: For the Hispanic groups that oppose your candidacy at this point, or your nomination, I should say, what is your feeling? Is this settled law as far as you are concerned about our commitment in education in this country?

Judge Roberts. Senator, as I said, I have not looked at the decision in Plyler v. Doe in 23 years. It's not an area that I've focused on. And the issue is not my policy view about what is a good idea for educational policy or national policy or whether what the Texas legislators determined was a good idea for Texas policy.

The question was a particular legal issue, and, again, the Supreme Court was divided on that, so it is not as if we are talking about a position outside the mainstream. And what I was explaining, this was viewed, as the memo states, if it were looked at in full, it was something that I thought was inconsistent with what I understood the Attorney General's approach to be, and it was my job to call that to his attention, which is what I did.

Senator Durbin. Okay. I think you have accurately taken refuge in the fact that you were working for someone. The fact that this memo came out the day after the decision I think is an important circumstance.

But let me go back to the beginning, the first question, the first day with Senator Specter. Wouldn't it be a jolt to the system in America if we decided that we would no longer offer education to these children?

Judge Roberts. Of course. Well, of course, Senator.

Senator Durbin. And so--

Judge Roberts. And then the decision in Plyler is a precedent of the Court. I don't think it--I'm not aware that it's been called into question in the intervening 23 years that have passed since the time I wrote those two paragraphs in the memo. And that is a precedent that is entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis. And it's something that is where I would begin if an issue arose in this area. I'm not aware that any is arising in this area, but if an issue were to arise, that's where I would begin, with the precedent that--

Senator Durbin. I just think that millions of Americans would like to have heard you say I think it is a good idea, I am glad we did it for America. But if you can't say it, you can't.

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, if I could just make the point that the issue is not whether or not I thought it was a good idea. That's not the job of a lawyer presenting legal advice and legal--the legal implications of an issue to his boss, the Attorney General. He wasn't interested in whether I thought it was a good idea or not. He was interested in the legal question of whether or not this was consistent with his policy and his approach.

That's not taking refuge. That's explaining the circumstances of a memorandum. And it's not avoiding an expression about whether it's a good idea or not. It's explaining that what we're dealing with--

Senator Durbin. But you have been unequivocal in your statements supporting Brown v. Board of Education. No one has suggested, in any respectful way, that we should return to the bad old days of separate but equal. I mean, you have accepted that is part of America. And the point I am trying to make to you is, whether we are talking about millions of uninsured people or millions of Hispanic children, I would think that it would be a basic value. You would say this is good for America, for people to have insurance, and bad for them to be denied. It is good for America to see children with education rather than to see them in the streets ignorant. It seems so fundamental.

Judge Roberts. Senator, do you--I don't think you want judges who will decide cases before them under the law on what they think is good, simply good policy for America. There are legal questions there. And I'm sure there are clients that I have represented in court that you would agree with. You would say that's the right side of the cause to be on, whether it's the environmental interests I represented in the Tahoe case, whether it's the welfare recipients I represented pro bono in the Bivens case, whether it's the cause of the inmate on death row that I assisted in in Florida, whether it's the environmental interests in Glacier Bay that I represented or in the Grand Canyon on a pro bono basis. I'm sure I could go down my list of clients and find clients that you would say that's the right side, that's the cause of justice, and there are others with whom you disagree.

My point is simply this, that in representing clients, in serving as a lawyer, it's not my job to decide whether that's a good idea or a bad idea. The job of the lawyer is to articulate the legal arguments on behalf of the client.

Senator Durbin. I am just trying to get to the bottom line about your values. If it is strictly a question about whether this is a legal and ethical--an ethical legal question that can be contested, then there are many positions you can take in the law. Some I wouldn't be comfortable with, some you may not be comfortable with.

Senator Feinstein. Do you see yourself mixing with people in some of the harder places in our country?

Judge Roberts. Well, it's hard to look ahead and see how that would work. I have as--I know, for example, when I was a lawyer and handling a case about native village rights in Alaska, I went to the native villages. I've always thought that was an important part about understanding the real-world consequences of any case--to get on the ground. When I handled a case involving people on the assembly line, I went to the assembly line and saw what it was like. I went to these villages that you could only reach by boat or by plane, where they make do with so little because of the remoteness. And I've always viewed that as an important part of understanding any case that I've been involved in.

Senator Feinstein. The reason I ask that is because I had a Plyler question I was going to ask you. And I got your memo, because I was really surprised by it as well. Let me ask you this question. It is signed by Carolyn Kuhl, and your name is second.

Judge Roberts. Oh.

Senator Feinstein. Does that mean you wrote the memo or did not write it?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I'd have to just say I don't know who wrote it. It obviously was submitted by both of us. I don't remember.

Senator Feinstein. You submitted it, right. But her name is on top. I was just curious if-- Because clearly the purpose of this memo is to try to get one Justice, namely Justice Powell, over on your side. But the kind of concluding part--and I just don't understand why you would say this, and, you know, perhaps you would believe today it was wrong. Let me quote: "As you will recall, the Solicitor General's Office had decided not to take a position before the Supreme Court on the Equal Protection issue in this case. The briefs for the State of Texas were quite poor. It is our belief that a brief filed by the Solicitor General's Office supporting the State of Texas and the values of judicial restraint could well have moved Justice Powell into the Chief Justice's camp and altered the outcome in the case. In sum, this is a case in which our supposed litigation program to encourage judicial restraint did not get off the ground, and should have."

Now, this concerns, regardless of what the briefs were, whether children should be educated in our country. I come from a huge immigrant State. We are 36 million people. We probably have 12 million, at least, immigrants. Maybe three to five million people here illegally, in our State. To say that this vast number of children shouldn't be allowed to be educated, I would be surprised you would write that kind of--

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I don't know if it was from both of us. I don't know who wrote it. If my name is on it, it's on it. But I agree, of course, that children should be educated. The example I just gave of my activities with the Street Law Program focuses on the importance of education for children. The legal issues presented in that case and the question of whether or not it was consistent with the Attorney General's litigation approach and program, those are different questions from the basic issue of whether children should be educated.

Senator Feinstein. Well, could I do this? Could I give this to you? Because I have 15 minutes tomorrow. Could I ask you to read it?

Judge Roberts. Certainly.

Senator Feinstein. I would really like to know whether you think this way today. And I will ask that question tomorrow. And attached to it is the Congressional Research Service analysis of this. If you wouldn't mind--

Judge Roberts. Not at all. Happy to.

Senator Kennedy. In response to a question that was asked by Senator Biden the other day, you appropriately pointed out that there were different responsibilities at the local level, State level and national level in dealing with the challenges our country faces in domestic policy. I want to talk about what you understand are the powers that we have at the national level.

And I want to start off with the issue on racial discrimination, discrimination on the basis of race in our society. We have talked about this in different ways over the past few days, and our Founding Father did not get it right in the Constitution. We have had the civil war, the struggles of Dr. King. Do you believe that we have the authority and the power to pass legislation to free ourselves from the stains of racial discrimination?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Kennedy. I have just got a short time left.

On the EEOC there is the quote that you have. This is the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission that was set up in 1964 as part of the 1964 Act. And I was basically set up at the strong suggestion and recommendation of Everett Dirksen, who played a key role in order to try and deal with the discrimination on women, on race, on ethnicity, national origin. And so they set up a Commission in order to be able to take the various complaints. They did not think they would have many complaints. The first year they had 9,000 complaints, and it has been doing extraordinary work ever since.

You mentioned in your memoranda that we should--you are familiar I think with these words; they have been written up in the journals and you can probably recognize them. "We should ignore the assertion that the EEOC is un-American, the truth of the matter notwithstanding."

Is there some reason that you would make a comment like that, the truth of the matter--

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, you have to read the memo I think in its entirety to put it in context. That was not my language. That was the language--the "un-American" reference was the language that was employed by an individual who had a case before the EEOC. He actually won his case before the EEOC, but he didn't like the difficulty and the time involved. He wrote to the President, and he said two things, one, that his treatment at the hands of the EEOC was un-American, and two, that the President has promised in the campaign to abolish the EEOC, and he wanted to hold the President to that promise. It was my responsibility to figure out how to respond to this complaint that had been received.

And how we responded was by protecting that EEOC from interference by the President in any political way, by protecting the EEOC from this sort of complaint. We did not go to the President and say, "You've got to do something about the EEOC." We didn't pass on the objection at all. And the point of the letter, when you read the whole memorandum, you see two points. The first is that I was unable to determine, in the short time I had to respond, whether or not the President had made such a pledge to abolish to EEOC. I simply didn't know, and I said that in the paragraph if you read it. And that's what "the truth of the matter notwithstanding" is referring to, the question of whether or not the President had promised to abolish the EEOC. I say right in the memo that we cannot determine that, and whether his treatment was un-American or not is beside the point. We don't interfere with the activities of the EEOC. That was the conclusion and that's what we did in that case.

Senator Kennedy. Well, Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the memo by included in there.

Chairman Specter. Without objection, it will be included.

Senator Kennedy. You say that the assertion that the EEOC is un-American--the "truth of the matter notwithstanding" was your comment though.

Judge Roberts. You do need to read the prior clause, prior sentence.

Senator Kennedy. I will include that but I want to--because I am in the final few minutes, and I will. I have read it a number of times and I will include it in the record and we will let the record stand.

Chairman Specter. When Senator Kennedy's line of questioning is finished and he has used his time, he will have the memo and you can respond.

Judge Roberts. Thank you.

[Senator Kennedy concludes questioning]

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Kennedy.

As I said when Senator Kennedy was questioning you about the EEOC, I did not want to take his time to have him present the memo to you, the limited time that he had, and it has been made a part of the record.

Senator Kennedy, if you would make the memo available now to--Senator Kennedy, if I could have your attention?

Senator Kennedy. Yes, excuse me.

DOJ_NMG_0035719

Chairman Specter. If you would make the memo available to Judge Roberts now so that he can comment on it now without having taken your time to do that.

Senator Kennedy. Mr. Chairman, we as-- Chairman Specter. Senator Kennedy?

Senator Kennedy. As you know, this has been redacted, and so I think in fairness to him and in fairness to the Committee, if we can get out the other redactions, it would be a more accurate kind of a way--a complete record.

Chairman Specter. Well, if it is possible for Judge Roberts to deal with the redactions, that would be fine.

Judge Roberts. I think the redactions simply identify the individual--the individual who was making the complaint, who had his case. The only thing I would emphasize is that the language that was quoted was part of a sentence, and the question of what "the truth of the matter" is referring to goes to the first part of the sentence that was not read, which is the assertion, the assertion that the President promised to abolish the EEOC. That was the matter that I could not determine in the time available whether that was correct or not, so I said, "The truth of that matter notwithstanding." And I also emphasized that any reference to the phrase "un-American" is always in quotes to make it clear that that's what the writer of the letter said, and certainly not what I said, and was certainly not my view then or now.

Chairman Specter. Senator Kennedy, do you want to follow up on that?

Senator Kennedy. Well, I think we have been over the--after all is said and done, about finding out what President Reagan wanted to abolish or not abolish, that really wasn't the issue or the question. And the question is about whether--the use of "un-American" is obviously unacceptable and they are dismissing that. But Judge Roberts said the assertion the EEOC is "un-American"--and he is quite right saying that they were dismissing that word. But then he adds, "The truth of the matter notwithstanding." I think it is not unreasonable to assume that he somehow was disparaging the EEOC. That is all. I am glad to let the record stand, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Any counter-reply?

Judge Roberts. Well, I am glad to let the record stand, just so long as the whole memorandum and the entire sentence that is being discussed is in the record.

Chairman Specter. We have finally come to one point of agreement.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I want to just say one thing. I don't really know what I am going to do with respect to voting for you or voting against you. I had one impression of you when we had our hour in private, and to a great extent, I think I came out of that meeting with a different sense of you. And, of course, the impression that I have today is of this very cautious, very precise man, young, obviously with staying power. I mean, you have gone through this in a remarkable way. I am convinced you will be there, God willing, for 40 years. And that even concerns me more because it means that my vote means more. And I come from a different side than the Republicans do, with different concerns, I think, different life experiences.

Last night, we gave you the Plyler memo. Senator Durbin asked a number of questions. I asked a few. And you read that memo, I hope, last night.

Judge Roberts. I did, Senator, yes.

Senator Feinstein. Do you believe you were wrong?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, on the underlying question--

Senator Feinstein. Could you say you were wrong if you believed you were wrong?

Judge Roberts. Well, I can say that the--the reason I'm hesitating--and this is what was brought out in the Congressional Research Service memo that you attached to it. These issues come up all the time in related questions. I have no quarrel with the Court's decision. As you know, it was a 5-4 decision on the legal question, not the question--I certainly believe every child should be educated.

Senator Feinstein. Regardless of immigration status?

Judge Roberts. My own view is that if you have a child, he or she should be educated, and you worry about status later.

Senator Feinstein. Just say yes, regardless of immigration status.

Judge Roberts. As a personal view, yes. It's a separate issue as a legal question, as you know. And the Court in Plyler split 5-4. Among the dissenters, the people who agreed with the position that the administration--or the position discussed in the memorandum were Justice White and Justice O'Connor. And I would not take their subscribing to the position of the dissent in Plyler v. Doe as suggesting that they in any way have less than fully developed and sensitive concerns about children and education. Justices White and O'Connor don't, and they're not subject to criticism on that score simply because their understanding of the law came out in the dissent in Plyler v. Doe.

So I would just try to make sure that people appreciate that saying that this is what you think the legal determination was--because the issue there was the Texas Legislature, the representative of the people of Texas, had reached a certain determination about funding and how they wanted to fund particular activities. And that was what the litigation was about. It's not a question about whether you believe in educating children or not. I don't think Justice O'Connor didn't believe that children should be educated, yet she was in the dissent in that case.

Senator Feinstein. I understand. Let me just give you two human dynamics. One of the people in public life that I most respect is a mayor in my State of a small immigrant community called Orange Cove. His name is Victor Lopez. I have known him for about 10 years. I have watched him--and I am a former mayor--try to build a town from nothing. I was there. There weren't sidewalks. There weren't schools. He has managed to do it. He has given his people a sense of pride--they are all agricultural workers--a sense of pride and dignity.

To me, that is the American dream. It is the Federal job to keep illegal immigrants out, but once they are here, it is our job to see that they have certain basic rights, I think, among them education.

Another interesting twist to this is in 1986, an amnesty was passed. Plyler was in 1982. If the decision had gone the other way, you could have seen the enormous problem that would have happened in 1986 when all these children, then legal absolutely, still would have been denied school. So I think that is an interesting twist.

Senator Sessions. . . . Judge Roberts, I commend you on your good humor, and even when they read a memo to suggest you said that the EEOC was un-American, when actually all you were doing was quoting a complaint, and that you defended the EEOC and its rights and independence aggressively in that memo.

But I wanted to ask you about this Texas case. As I understand it, Texas decided that they would not fund education for illegal aliens that are here in the country. And that was challenged as being unconstitutional and went to the Supreme Court. I know you have said that you as a parent and as a person who believes in education, you absolutely believe in education for all children in some way, form, or fashion. But you don't mean to suggest or prejudge, do you, the constitutionality of the right of the State of Texas to make that decision? That would be a matter of, I think, some importance, and perhaps again in the years to come.

Judge Roberts. Well, no, Senator, and I did try to be very careful in separating the personal views with respect to the importance of education from the legal question there. And the legal question, of course, was a close one. It divided the Court 5-4, and as I noted, among the dissenters were Justices White and O'Connor. And I don't think their legal position reflected any less than wholehearted view concerning the importance of education.

Senator Sessions. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Durbin. . . . If I could clear up a couple other things that have been raised, I read and reread the sentence which you and Senator Kennedy debated about the EEOC, and I want to read it again, conceding the fact that the word "un-American" is in quotes and clearly refers to something else. But the sentence in your memo reads in its entirety as follows: "We should ignore that assertion in any event, as well as the assertion that the EEOC is "un-American", the truth of the matter notwithstanding."

Now, those are your words but for the quotes "un-American." What did you mean when you say "the truth of the matter notwithstanding?" It suggest that you agree with that conclusion.

Judge Roberts. The first part of the sentence refers the that assertion, and that assertion was the assertion that President Reagan had promised to abolish the EEOC. That as the issue that I said in the memorandum I had been unable to determine whether that was accurate or not. It was the truth of that matter, of that assertion that I couldn't verify. The reference to "un-American" was not my language. It was the language of the person who complained and said, "You need to do something about the EEOC," and our response was what we're going to do is make sure that the EEOC is not interfered with because of your complaints.

Now, he may have felt that he was being treated in an "un-American" way and wanted something done about it. But it was not my view, and again, the language was in quotes to make clear that it wasn't my view.

Senator Durbin. I do not question the fact the language was in quotes, but I think there is at least some ambiguity in what was said. It might have been said more precisely if it did not truly--if the conclusion that we are suggesting does not reflect your views.

Senator Durbin. Well, if I might say, Judge, if you have made one point many times over during the course of the last 3 days, it is that as a judge you will be loyal and faithful to the process of law, to the rule of law. I think that is without question from what you have said. I accept that on its face.

But the questions which we continue to ask you really try to go beyond that, because I said at the outset that I thought one of the real measures as to whether or not you should be on the Supreme Court goes back to a point Senator Simon had made: Would you restrict freedom in America or would you expand it?

When you are defending gays and lesbians who are being restricted in their rights by the Colorado amendment, you are trying, from my point of view, to expand freedom in America. That to me is a positive thing. That is my personal philosophy and point of view.

But then when you say, "If the State would have walked in the door first to restrict freedoms, I would have taken them as a client, too," I wonder, Where are you? Beyond loyalty to the process of law, how do you view this law when it comes to expanding our personal freedom? Is it important enough for you to say in some instances, "I will not use my skills as a lawyer because I don't believe that that is a cause that is consistent with my values and belief"? That is what I have been asking.

Judge Roberts. Well, and the--I had someone ask me in this process--I don't remember who it was, but somebody asked me, you know, "Are you going to be on the side of the little guy?" And you obviously want to give an immediate answer, but as you reflect on it, if the Constitution says that the little guy should win, the little guy is going to win in court before me. But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well, then, the big guy is going to win, because my obligation is to the Constitution. That's the oath. The oath that a judge takes is not that I will look out for particular interests, I'll be on the side of particular interests. The oath is to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that's what I would do.

Senator Durbin. Would you at least concede that you would take into consideration that in our system of justice the race goes to the swift, and the swift are those with the resources, the money, the lawyers, the power in the system, and that many times the powerless, the person who has struggled and clawed their way to your courtroom, went through a wall of adversity which the powerful never had to face, is that part of your calculation?

Judge Roberts. Absolutely, and it is, again, what's carved above the doors to the Supreme Court: "Equal Justice Under Law." And the judicial oath talks about doing justice without regard to persons, to rich and to poor. And that, of course, is critically important. You do have to appreciate that there are going to be interests who, for one reason or another, don't have the same resources as people on the other side. The idea is not to give the case to the side with the best resources, the side with the best lawyers, the side with the most opportunity to prepare and present. It is to decide the case according to the law and according to the Constitution. And as case after case in the Supreme Court shows, that's often the prisoner who's sitting in his cell and writes his petition out longhand. Sometimes the Constitution is on that person's side and not on the side of the corporation with the fancy printed brief. But the judge's obligation is to appreciate that the rule of law requires that both of those be treated equally under the law.

Civil Rights – Sexual Orientation Discrimination

Chairman Specter. Let me move in the final two minutes here to your participation, pro bono, in Romer, where you gave some advice on the arguments to those who were upholding gay rights, and a quotation by Walter Smith, who was the lawyer at Hogan & Hartson in charge of pro bono work. He had this to say about your participation in that case supporting or trying to help the gay community in a case in the Supreme Court. Mr. Smith said, "Every good lawyer knows that if there is something in his client's cause that so personally offends you, morally, religiously, or if it so offends you that you think it would undermine your ability to do your duty as a lawyer, then you shouldn't take it on, and John"--referring to you--"wouldn't have. So at a minimum he had no concerns that would rise to that level."

Does that accurately express your own sentiments in taking on the aid to the gay community in that case?

Judge Roberts. I was asked frequently by other partners to help out particularly in my area of expertise, often involved moot courting, and I never turned down a request. I think it's right that if it had been something morally objectionable, I suppose I would have, but it was my view that lawyers don't stand in the shoes of their clients, and that good lawyers can give advice and argue any side of a case. And as I said, I was asked frequently to participate in that type of assistance for other partners at the firm, and I never turned anyone down.

Senator Feingold. I think it was pretty certain at that time what the medical view as, as indicated by the medical community of our Government, but I will leave it at that.

Do you believe that the Congress has the power under the Constitution to prohibit discrimination against gays and lesbians in employment?

Judge Roberts. I don't know if that's an issue that's going to come before the courts. I don't know if Congress has taken that step yet, and until it does, I think that's an issue that I have to maintain some silence on. I think personally I believe that everybody should be treated with dignity in this area, and respect. The legal question of Congress's authority to address that though is one that could come before the courts, and so I should be--

Senator Feingold. Can you imagine an argument that would be contrary to that view?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't know what arguments people would make. I just know that I shouldn't be expressing an opinion on an issue that could come before the Court.

Civil Rights – Voting Rights Act

Senator Kennedy. So I'll assume that you don't feel that there are any doubts on the constitutionality of the 1964 Act. Do you have any doubts as to the constitutionality of the 1965 Voting Rights Act?

Judge Roberts. That's an issue, of course, as you know, it's up for renewal and that is a question that could come before the Court. The question of Congress's power, again, without expressing any views on it, I do know that it's going to be--

Senator Kennedy. That's gone up and down the Supreme Court, the 1965 Act and again the 1982 Act extension.

Judge Roberts. Yes, and the issue would be--

Senator Kennedy. I am just trying to find out, on the Voting Rights Act, whether you have any problem at all and trouble at all in terms of the constitutionality of the existing Voting Rights Act that was extended by the Congress--

Judge Roberts. Oh, well, the existing Voting Rights Act, the constitutionality has been upheld--

Senator Kennedy. Okay.

Judge Roberts. --and I don't have any issue with that. There is a separate question that would be raised if the Voting Rights Act were extended, as I know Congress is considering, and those arguments have been raised about whether or not particular provisions should be extended or should not be extended, and since those questions might well come before the Court, I do need to exercise caution on that.

Senator Kennedy. But with regards to the Act that we passed, the bipartisan Act--I am going to come back to it--and about your position on the 1982 Act, I know you had concerns, and I am going to come back to those, but you are not suggesting that there is any constitutional issue with that?

Judge Roberts. Well, I'm not aware of any constitutional issue that's been raised about it.

Senator Kennedy. All right.

Judge Roberts. But again, I don't want to express conclusions on hypothetical questions, whether as applied in a particular case, whether there would be a challenge in that respect. Those cases come up all the time--

Senator Kennedy. All right.

Judge Roberts. --and I do need to keep--avoid expressing an opinion on those issues.

Senator Kennedy. Well, it seems that on voting rights, with all of its importance and significance, and with the extraordinary bipartisan balance that came together on that Act, I am going to come back to it. I know you had some reservations about it, which we will come to. But that, I am wondering whether you are hesitant at all in saying that you believe that it is constitutional.

Judge Roberts. My hesitancy, Senator, is simply this, that cases do come up--I had one in the D.C. Circuit--concerning issues under the Voting Rights Act--

Senator Kennedy. All right.

Judge Roberts. --and I don't know what arguments parties will be raising in those cases. So an abstract question, you need to know obviously what is the claim, what is the issue, and decide it according to the rule of law.

Senator Kennedy. Well, I was sort of inhaling your answer to my friend, Orrin Hatch, about the power of the legislature and the deference that you are going to give when the legislature makes judgments and findings, particularly in the areas of voting, that we spend such an extraordinary amount of time, the Chairman was so involved in that legislation.

Let us go to the Voting Rights Act. As you know, we have had a chance to go through many of the documents that you authored during the early and mid-1980s when you worked in the Department of Justice and in the White House. I am deeply troubled-- I am interested in your views today, let me point out, but because we don't have all the documents that we would like to have, I am working with the documents that we do, and I want to go through those, get your reactions, and ask your views today.

I am deeply troubled by the narrow and cramped and perhaps even a mean-spirited view of the law that appears in some of your writings. In the only documents that have been made available to us, it appears that you did not fully appreciate the problem of discrimination in our society. It also seems that you were trying to undo the progress that so many people had fought for and died for in this country.

At the outset, I want to be clear that I do not think, nor am I suggesting, that you are a person who is in favor of discrimination. I don't believe that. I am concerned, however, that at the time you were writing these laws and memoranda and notes, you simply did not grasp the seriousness of the impact of discrimination on our country as a whole.

Let's start with the Voting Rights Act. Most Americans think that the right to vote is among the most important tools that they have to participate in our democracy. You do agree, don't you, Judge Roberts, that the right to vote is a fundamental constitutional right?

Judge Roberts. It is preservative, I think, of all the other rights. Without access to the ballot box, people are not in the position to protect any other rights that are important to them. And so I think it's one of, as you said, the most precious rights we have as Americans.

Senator Kennedy. And you will recall that in the 1960s, millions of our fellow citizens were denied access to the voting booth because of race, and to remedy that injustice, Congress passed the Voting Rights Act of 1965 that outlawed discrimination in voting. Section 2 of that Act is widely believed to be the most effective civil rights statute enacted by Congress.

In 1982, Congress took action to extend the Voting Rights Act and to make it clear that discriminatory voting practices and procedures are illegal if they are intended to be racially discriminatory or if they are shown to have a racially discriminatory impact. It was this latter prohibition, the prohibition against voting practices that have a discriminatory impact, that provoked your heated opposition, Judge Roberts.

In our earlier discussion of Brown v. Board of Education, you agreed that the actual impact of racial segregation on public education and school children was perfectly valid for the Court to consider, but when it came to voting rights, you rejected the consideration of actual impact. You wrote that violations of Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, and I quote, "should not be made too easy to prove since they provide a basis for the most intrusive interference imaginable by Federal courts into State and local processes."

You also wrote, and I quote, "it would be difficult to conceive of a more drastic alteration of local government affairs, and under our Federal system such an intrusion should not be too readily permitted."

And you didn't stop there. You concluded that Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act was, quote, "constitutionally suspect and contrary to the most fundamental tenets of the legislating process on which the laws of this country are based."

So I am deeply troubled by another statement that you made at the time, and I quote, "there is no evidence of voting abuses nationwide supporting the need for such a change." No evidence? I was there, Judge Roberts, in both the House and the Senate, had the extensive hearings. We considered detail-specific testimony from affected voters throughout the country.

But you dismissed the work of Congress out of hand. "Don't be fooled," you wrote, "by the House vote or the 61 Senate sponsors of the bill. Many members of the House did not know that they were doing more than simply extending the Act, and several of the 61 Senators have already indicated they only intended to support a simple extension."

Judge Roberts, Republicans and Democrats overwhelmingly supported this legislation, but you thought we didn't really know what we were doing. Newt Gingrich and James Sensenbrenner voted for the House bill. Dan Quayle was an original Senate cosponsor of the bill. We held extensive hearings, created a lengthy record, yet you thought there was no evidence of voting abuses that would justify the legislation.

Your comment? Do you believe today that we need the Federal laws to assure that all our citizens have the equal access to the voting booth, and do you basically support the 1982 Voting Rights Act--

Judge Roberts. Senator, you will recall--

Senator Kennedy. --signed by President--

Judge Roberts. You will recall at the time of the--this was 23 years ago. I was a staff lawyer in the Justice Department. It was the position of the Reagan administration for whom I worked, the position of the Attorney General for whom I worked, that the Voting Rights Act should be extended for the longest period of its extension in history without change. The Supreme Court had interpreted in the Mobile v. Bolden case, Section 2 to have an intent test, not an effects test.

Keep in mind, of course, as you know very well, Section 5, the pre-clearance provision, had always had an effects test, and that would be continued. The reference to discrimination nationwide was addressing the particular point that the effects test had been applied in particular jurisdictions that had a history of discrimination and the question is whether or not there was a similar history of discrimination that supported extending the effects test in Section 2.

It was the position of the administration for which I worked that the proposal was to extend the Voting Rights Act without change. Your position at the time was that the intent test that the Supreme Court had determined was in Section 2 should be changed to the effects test, and that was the position that eventually prevailed.

There was no disagreement--

DOJ_NMG_0035727

Senator Kennedy. Judge Roberts, the effects test was the law of the land from the Zimmer case to the Mobile case. It was the law of the land.

Judge Roberts. Senator--

Senator Kennedy. That was the law of the land. Court after court decided about the impact of the effects test. The Mobile case changed the Zimmer case.

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, you disagree--

Chairman Specter. Senator, let him finish his answer.

Senator Kennedy. Okay. Well, I would just like to get his--the Zimmer case was not the holding and the rule of the law of the land prior to the Mobile case.

Judge Roberts. Well, this is the same debate that took place 23 years ago on this very same issue, and the administration's position--you think the Supreme Court got it wrong in Mobile v. Bolden.

Senator Kennedy. No, that's not what--I think it was wrong, but I also think the law of the land decided by the Supreme Court in the Zimmer case upheld in court after court after court after court was the effects test.

Judge Roberts. Well, and the Supreme Court--

Senator Kennedy. And that is all--

Chairman Specter. Let him finish his answer, Senator Kennedy.

Judge Roberts. The point is, and again, this is revisiting a debate that took place 23 years ago--

Senator Kennedy. Well, I am interested today in your view. Do you support the law that Ronald Reagan signed into law and that was cosponsored overwhelmingly by the-- Judge Roberts. Certainly. And the only point I would make, this is the same disagreement and the same debate that took place then over whether the Court was right or wrong in Mobile v. Bolden, and the point I would make is two-fold, that those like President Reagan, like Attorney General Smith, who were advocating extension of the Voting Rights Act without change, were as fully committed to protecting the right to vote as anyone.

Senator Kennedy. Could I--

Chairman Specter. Let him finish his answer, Senator Kennedy.

Judge Roberts. And the articulation of views that you read from represented my effort to articulate the views of the administration and the position of the administration for whom I worked, for which I worked, 23 years ago.

Senator Kennedy. Well, after President Reagan signed it into law, did you agree with that position--

Judge Roberts. I certainly--

Senator Kennedy. --of the administration?

Judge Roberts. I certainly agreed that the Voting Rights Act should be extended. I certainly agreed that the effects test in Section 5 should be extended. We had argued that the intent test--that the Supreme Court recognized in Mobile v. Bolden--I know you think it was wrong, but that was the Supreme Court's interpretation--should have been extended. Again, as you said, the compromise that you and Senator Dole worked out was enacted into law and signed into law by President Reagan and the Voting Rights Act has continued to be an important legislative tool to ensure that most precious of rights which is preservative of all other rights. There was never any dispute about that basic proposition.

Senator Kennedy. Well, what I am getting to is after it was signed into law overwhelmingly, overwhelmingly by the House and the Senate, we have the memoranda that you said the fact we were burned last year--this is the following year--we did not--the fact we were burned last year because we did not sail in with the new voting rights legislation does not mean we will be hurt this year if we go slowly on housing legislation. What did you mean when you said that we were burned last year by not getting the Voting Rights Act?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think the legislative debate between those who favored extending the Voting Rights Act as is and those who favored changing the Act because they disagreed with the Supreme Court decisions, the legislative judgment was that the administration's proposal didn't succeed because they had waited--rather than coming out in favor of an extension right away, they waited for the Congress to come up with its proposals which turned out to be different than the administration proposals.

On the housing discrimination, I would note that the administration did get its ducks in a row, and in a matter of months after the date of the memo that you just read from had its housing proposal there and submitted to Congress and it was enacted.

Senator Kennedy. Nineteen-eighty-eight Housing Act, Fair Housing Act.

Judge Roberts. The administration's proposal was submitted, I believe, months after the date of the memo that you read from.

Senator Grassley. Some outside groups have claimed that you are hostile to civil rights. Others have suggested, in my view incorrectly, that you have an off-the-mark view of the Voting Rights Act. I believe these allegations to be inaccurate, and I would like for you to set the record straight. As you may know, I have long been a supporter of the Voting Rights Act. I appeared at a news conference with Senator Dole and Kennedy and some others in 1982 with that compromise that you have referred to. The Voting Rights Act has had a very significant impact on racial discrimination, probably more than anything else that Congress has done since the adoption of the Civil War Amendments.

Your critics take issue with some of your memos which outline the arguments in the debate over whether Section 2 should have an effects test or an intent test. Specifically, there was a debate in Congress over concerns that the effects test could lead to legal requirements that racial quotas be mandated for legislatures and other elected bodies. Ultimately, the Voting Rights Act was reauthorized with a provision expressly prohibiting parts from requiring racial quotas. We were able to craft a good compromise that gave greater protection to minority voters while not requiring quotas.

Judge Roberts, could you tell us what your role was as an assistant to Attorney General Smith in developing the Reagan policy on the Voting Rights Act?

Judge Roberts. Well, President Reagan's policy and the Attorney General's policy was to support the longest extension of the Voting Rights Act in history without change. Some in the Congress wanted to amend the Voting Rights Act Section 2 to overturn the Supreme Court's decision in Mobile v. Bolden. And that's what the debate was about, whether it should be an intent test under Section 2 or an effects test. Everybody agreed that Section 5, the pre-clearance provision, which applied to jurisdictions with a history of discrimination, had an effects test and should continue to have an effects test.

The debate was about Section 2 an whether it should be an intent test or an effects test. But there was no disagreement among President Reagan, Attorney General Smith. Those of us on Attorney General Smith's staff, like myself, that the protection of the right to vote was critical, that the Voting Rights Act had been extraordinarily effective in preserving that right and should be extended. The debate was solely over whether or not Section 2 should be changed. And Senator Dole, working with other members of the Senate, crafted a compromise that resolved that dispute. As you said, it put an effects test in Section 2, put in additional language to guard against the sort of proportional representation that was certainly the concern of Attorney General Smith and President Reagan, and that was enacted into law with the President's support.

But there was no disagreement about the critical nature of the right to vote, the notion that it was preservative of all other rights, and the question was simply about how it should be extended, whether extended as-is or extended with the change that was enacted under the compromise.

Senator Grassley. My time is just about out so I will ask a very short question. During your tenure at the Solicitor General's office, didn't you sign on to a number of briefs that urged the Supreme Court to adopt a broad interpretation of the Voting Rights Act, its new requirements, and to require expansive remedies when States violate the act? And didn't some of those briefs take the same side as the ACLU, the Mexican-American Legal Defense and Education Fund, and the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law?

Judge Roberts. Yes. It was the responsibility of the Justice Department and, before the Supreme Court, of course, the Office of the Solicitor General to enforce the civil rights laws, in particular the Voting Rights Act, as vigorously as possible. And that's what we did.

Senator Sessions. . . . With regard to Bolden v. City of Mobile, you and Senator Kennedy had an exchange. Well, I am from Mobile. I was not involved in the litigation, but know something about that litigation. When the exchange ended, as I recall, Senator Kennedy was insisting that the Zimmer case was the established law, and there are a number of cases had said that effects tests applied, whereas you were contending that at the time you took the position you did, that the Supreme Court had ruled that it an intent standard was required, and that Bolden set the decision on that. I guess the question for us today, who was right, you or Senator Kennedy?

Judge Roberts. Well--

Senator Sessions. I did not want to ask you, but go ahead.

Judge Roberts. No. I don't--

Senator Sessions. If I say the--

Judge Roberts. It was a renewal of a debate that was had between the administration and Senator Kennedy 20 plus years ago, and certainly the issue of whether the Supreme Court had interpreted Section 2 and what it had said and whether or not it was correct, was mooted. Senator Kennedy's position eventually prevailed as a matter of legislation. Through the good offices of Senator Dole and others, the compromise was worked out, and the totality of the circumstances test enacted under Section 2.

Senator Sessions. But the truth is, is it not, that Bolden v. City of Mobile had been decided by the Supreme Court, and the Bolden v. City of Mobile said that you had to show, when you consider a form of a local government, that before you could throw it out, create a new government for that city, you had to show that it was designed in a way to intentionally deny equal rights to the minority citizens.

Judge Roberts. That was my understanding of, and certainly the administration's understanding of Mobile and its interpretation of Section 2. And as I said, the debate was largely mooted by the legislative change that was enacted.

Senator Sessions. I am just trying to get this thing straight because I do not want anybody to be misinterpreted. Bolden v. City of Mobile quoted Zimmer. It was the final word on the matter, and it ruled that before the Federal Government could throw out a government of a city and require a new government to be established, there had to be an intent to discriminate, and that was consistent with the Voting Rights Act. And then when the Voting Rights Act came up for reauthorization, the legislature, the Congress passed a law and changed the law that in effect said the effects test, if it had the effect of discriminating or keeping African-American citizens from being elected to office, that that could justify the removal of the existing form of government and establish a new government.

Judge Roberts. That's right, and it is in many areas--well, certainly every area involving interpretation of the statute--the final say is not with the Supreme Court. The final say on a statute is with Congress, and if they don't like the Supreme Court's interpretation of it, they can change it, and that's what happened in this case.

Senator Sessions. Well, the Voting Rights Act, let me say, is a tremendous critical, historical event. It transformed the South. I think Senator Kennedy or others said that grandchildren and children today are being able to vote because of this right, and that is true. Not only are they being able to vote, they are being able to be judges who supervise elections, sheriffs, mayors, city councilmen, county commissioners. Alabama has more elected African-American officeholders than any other State in America, and we are proud of that. But this was a powerful Act, and it did change the makeup of county commissions, city commissions, statewide boards, all over Alabama, all over America, and it was a big step. But the Congress made that, and you were correct when you said that your position was consistent with what the Supreme Court ruled at that time.

Senator Feingold. I guess I will have to move on. Let's go to voting rights. I want to follow up to Senator Kennedy's questions about the Voting Rights Act and, in particular, about your opposition to amendments to the Act in 1982 when you were an adviser to the Attorney General in the Reagan administration's Justice Department.

In 1982, Congress voted overwhelmingly to amend Section 2 to reinstate the test for vote dilution that many lower courts had used prior to the City of Mobile case, one that looked, as we talked about earlier, at the effects of an electoral scheme on the ability of minorities to elect candidates of their choice rather than on the intent behind this scheme.

While you were in the Reagan Justice Department, you seemed to have done almost everything in your power to thwart that congressional effort. Your view was that the intent test should stand. This was the policy position of the Justice Department, as you have indicated, and you wholeheartedly supported it at the time. Your memos make that very clear.

In one memo, you lamented that the House bill then under consideration would make it much easier to attack "such widely accepted practices as at-large voting." Now, those practices, of course, were among the most commonly used systems to prevent the election of any minorities to local government bodies. We know that the effects test put into place in the 1982 amendments to the Voting Rights Act has been very successful in improving minority representation in Congress and at all levels of Government.

Do you believe today that those gains have been good for the country?

Judge Roberts. I think the gains under the Voting Rights Act have been very beneficial in promoting the right to vote, which is preservative of all other rights. The issue about how to extend the Voting Rights Act, again, my position was a member of the staff in the Justice Department. The administration position of extending the Voting Rights Act for the longest period in history, as is, without change, was in no sense reflective of any disagreement with the proposition that the Voting Rights Act was extremely valuable in securing not just the right to vote but all other rights--

Senator Feingold. Well, what I am trying to get at here, Judge, obviously, is this distinction between effects and intent. Let's follow up on the fact that you said that these gains have been good for the country. Do you believe that these gains we have seen in minority representation would have occurred if your view supporting the intent approach had prevailed in 1982?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think some of them would have. I don't know if all of them would have. It's obviously impossible to tell, to go back and determine whether a particular application of a different approach would have had the same results or different results. I think that's very hard to tell.

Senator Feingold. Do you still believe that the intent test was the more appropriate standard by which to evaluate vote dilution claims?

Judge Roberts. Senator, my personal view of the Voting Rights Act was not something somebody was interested in. You have people who serve on your staff, and their job is to help you implement your views as a Senator. I am just--

Senator Feingold. I am not questioning what your view was then. I am asking what you think now having--and this is pretty settled area, I think you would agree. Having seen all this, having been intimately involved in it, knowing it as well as you do, do you believe that the intent test is still the more appropriate standard by which to evaluate vote dilution claims?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I haven't studied the Voting Rights Act to determine whether the intent test or the effects test would have different results in different cases under Section 2. I'm in no position to make a judgment on that.

Senator Feingold. It would be my sense that you would be a person who would--with your enormous abilities and background, to have some sense about that. Obviously, you understand that requiring a voter to prove any additional factor makes it harder for the voter to win the case and that to prove the intent of an entire legislative body can be very difficult, especially when a voting system was put in place many years ago. Requiring African Americans and Latino voters, many of whom have had limited financial resources, to find evidence of intent was adding an enormous hurdle for them to overcome. And the Mobile v. Bolden case itself, which was pursued after the Supreme Court's decision in 1980 and before Congress amended the law in 1982, makes it very clear, I think clear to all of us over the years, how difficult that standard was. African Americans from Mobile, Alabama, have been unable to elect any candidates to the position of city commissioner for every election cycle for something like seven decades. They challenge the method of electing city commissioners that allowed the same majority to choose all the commissioners all the time in at-large elections. And the evidence was very clear that, as a practical matter, although African Americans could register and vote, they couldn't elect anyone. But to get relief under the Supreme Court standard which you appear to have supported, they had to go to enormous effort and financial expense to prove discriminatory intent, including hiring a historian who could piece together the motivations of city officials who had designed the electoral system almost a hundred years earlier.

In this situation, the administration was not bound by a Supreme Court decision in deciding what position to take under the proposed Voting Rights Act amendments. So why at that point did you want to make Section 2 cases so difficult to prove?

Judge Roberts. Senator, you keep referring to what I supported and what I wanted to do. I was a 26-year-old staff lawyer. It was my first job as a lawyer after my clerkships. I was not shaping administration policy. The administration policy was shaped by the Attorney General on whose staff I served. It was the policy of President Reagan. It was to extend the Voting Rights Act without change for the longest period in history at that point, and it was my job to promote the Attorney General's view and the President's view on that issue. And that's what I was doing.

Senator Feingold. I recognize that. What I am trying to figure out is given the fact that you have followed this issue for such a long time, I would think you would have a view at this point about whether you were right about--or the Department, let's say, since you were working for them, whether the Department was right on seeking to keep the intent test or whether time has shown that the effects tests is really the more appropriate test.

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I haven't followed the issue or the particular litigation. I had involvement in some litigation when I was in the Solicitor General's office, in which we were effective in proving violations under the Voting Rights Act. Many of those cases arose under issues under Section 5, pre-clearance issues, and not under Section 2.

I as a judge had a case, a three-judge district court case, again, arising under the pre-clearance provisions, but I'm certainly not an expert in the area and haven't followed and have no way of evaluating the relative effectiveness of the law as amended or the last as it was prior to 1982.

Senator Feingold. Well, with all respect, I realize I should move on to another topic, but it just seems given how strongly you stated some of these memos--and I understand you were doing your job--I would think you would have a view today whether or not those strong statements still make sense. But let me move on.

Senator Graham. When it comes to voting rights, as I understand--and we have talked a lot about it, and we probably know more than all of us ever dreamed we would know about the Voting Rights Act--the you were implementing a policy of President Reagan that wanted to pass the Voting Rights Act in its form that you received it; is that correct?

Judge Roberts. The proposal was to extend it for the longest period in history without change.

Senator Graham. And we have been through a long discourse about the effect and intent test. I think you have explained yourself very well, that the Supreme Court in the Mobile case said the intent test applies to Section 2; is that right?

Judge Roberts. Section 2.

Senator Graham. Politics took over after that, did it not? Because the effect test no longer--that is not the test. Is it not some compromise between Senator Kennedy and Senator Dole?

Judge Roberts. There was a compromise in the test under Section 2, which is articulated in a paragraph describing what the criteria are and including a caution that this should not be read to promote proportional representation which was some of the concern that the Attorney General and President Reagan had.

Senator Graham. So between Dole, Senator Kennedy and President Reagan, a new test was called the "Totality of the Circumstances?"

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Hatch. Okay. Now, let me just ask you a question that relates to some of the answers you gave yesterday regarding the voting rights. Even as the hearing was unfolding, again, Democratic staffers of the Committee issued a press release that said that you had missed an opportunity to distance yourself from what the release called your "earlier narrow positions on the reach of the Voting Rights Act." Now, that is not what I heard you say, nor do I believe that is what the public heard. A Democratic press release said that you had resorted to vague generalities about the importance of voting.

Now, as I heard you, I heard you explain the vigorous debate that took place regarding reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act in the 1980s. By the way, I was part of that debate. I felt very deeply that the effects test should apply to section 5 to those States that had a history of discrimination. But I also felt very deeply at the time that the intent test should apply to all the other States in section 2, which was the position I think the administration took that you had to do some research on and within the administration.

Now, I lost in Committee. I was arguing that all of the States that did not have a history of discrimination should not have--be burdened by the effects test, which basically says that the effects of what happens looks like discrimination, it therefore is, even if there was never an intent to commit discrimination. Now, I lost, but I fell that the Voting Rights Act is the most important civil rights bill in history, and I felt it then. I voted for the amended bill with the effects test language in section 2, and have been a strong supporter ever since.

Would that be fair to describe your feelings about that?

Judge Roberts. Well, yes, Senator. The debate as you remember was over whether or not Section 2 should be extended without change as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Mobile v. Bolden, or whether it should be changed to incorporate the effects test and later the totality of the circumstances test. The administration position at the time was to extend the Voting Rights Act for the longest period in history without change, and that was the position that I was working on at the time, and Congress eventually decided, with--Senator Dole and some of the other Senators developed a compromise position on Section 2, and that was enacted with the support of the administration.

The one thing that was clear to me throughout those extended debates was that the people on both side of the issue, in good faith, supported extension of the Voting Rights Act, and recognized the importance of the Voting Rights Act in securing civil liberties for all Americans. It wasn't a dispute about the goal. It wasn't a dispute about the objective. It wasn't a dispute about the importance. It was a dispute about whether to extend the Act without change or whether to make changes in the Act, and that was what the debate was about.

Senator Hatch. And the difference was, is that the administration vehemently wanted to pass the Voting Rights Act as it existed that was somewhat difficult to pass originally when it was originally passed, and that was a decent, honorable position. But when it was changed through our democratic process up here on Capitol Hill, I felt for the worse at the time, but I feel like I was wrong at the time. Then we voted for it. In fact, it was my friend, Senator Kennedy, who insisted that I come down to the White House as part of the bill signing team because he knew how deeply I felt about this. But there was a legitimate reason to take the administration's position, and the administration, once the compromise was reached with Senators Dole and Kennedy, the administration accepted that as well, and so did you.

That was a point I just kind of wanted to make because I think it is important to realize that we can sometimes get to a point where we misconstrue the intentions of decent, honorable people, and I count myself one of those. Even though I lost in Committee, I voted for this bill because to me it is the most important civil rights bill in history, albeit, others are very important as well.

Now, I just want to tell you that, like I say, I have been here for 29 years, and I have been through 10 of these. I think 10 if I recall correctly. And in all of that time we have seen some really sterling, brilliant, wonderful people before this Committee, but I have never seen anybody who has done a better job of explaining himself than you have. If people cannot vote for you, then I doubt that they can vote for any Republican nominee. You have made a very, very strong presentation here, and I hope the American people realize that, and I hope my colleagues on both sides of the aisle realize that, and I look forward to seeing you as Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, and will do everything in my power to see that you are confirmed.

Senator Kennedy. I would like to, if we could, come back in the time that I have now, and perhaps in a follow-up round, to the issue on civil rights, because as been mentioned here by others, it is the overarching issue, I think, for our country and our society. I think our Founders did not get it right at the time of the drafting of the Constitution. We have had a civil war. This country went through an extraordinary period of time led by Dr. King in the 1950s, and then we had that extraordinary moment of Dr. King here at the Lincoln Memorial, which I think touched the conscience of the Nation, people from all over the country. We were stuck for months on the 1964 Act, as you probably remember, and then with the action that was taken by Everett Dirksen, it opened up the possibility for reaching a compromise on the public accommodations provision. So we spent 8 hours, a number of us in the Judiciary Committee, with Nick Katzenbach over in the Capitol Office, and had an agreement at that time there would be no amendments on the public accommodations; we could amend other provisions. And the legislation went forward, and was monumental in its importance and consequence.

Then we came back and realized after that that the most important legislation that we could probably address--we still had a way to go on housing and employment, but although employment was included in the '64 Act but not to a great extent--was in the Voting Rights Act. And we had extensive hearings. During the course of those hearings by this Committee, other Committees as well, we listened to Attorney General Katzenbach, who had been working with Senator Dirksen, really the architect, leadership of President Johnson, certainly, but the architect of the '64 Act. And he testified before this Committee about the Section 2 provisions, and in his testimony on the Section 2 provisions, he said, Section 2 applies to any voting practice or procedure if its purpose or effect was to deny or abridge the right to vote on account of race or color.

So many of us, including the civil rights community, believed that the effects test was operative at that time. That bill passed the House by 333-85, 77-19.

The next thing that happened is we had the series of tests, as you recall, and the overarching test case was the Zimmer case, but we had a number of other cases, Zimmer v. McKeithen, and it was the Fifth Circuit en banc, Fifth Circuit that dealt for the most part, the whole range of States where many of these challenges had existed, although I certainly recognize we have a long way to go in my own State of Massachusetts. But this court en banc, effectively in the Zimmer case--it was the lead case on the effects test--and that was followed by a series of cases, U.S. v. Post, Kendrick v. Walter, for a long period of time.

You are aware of this history?

Judge Roberts. I am remembering it from when we addressed this debate 23 years ago, yes.

Senator Kennedy. But it sounds familiar. Then we went up to 1980 and we had the Mobile case, which effectively put the intent test in. And after the Mobile case, as you well remember, the Justice Department dropped a whole series of cases that had been prepared under the effects test because they did not believe that they could make the case on the intent test, whole series.

This sent a very powerful message to individuals across the South, other parts of the country, that the additional kind of a burden to demonstrate intention was going to be so substantial it was going to make, in terms of resources and to try and determine the intent of individuals that lived many years ago, to virtually be prohibitive. That happened. The Justice Department dropped scores of cases.

It was one of the important reasons that the civil rights community and many of us believed that it was so important at the time of the extension of the Voting Rights case in 1982, that we put the effects test in.

You believed, as I remember, and as we have gone over, that it should have been a restatement of the existing law, as you correctly stated yesterday, which was the intent test. Am I correct so far?

Judge Roberts. That was the administration position.

Senator Kennedy. Administration's position. I remember French Smith testifying before this Committee to that effect at that particular time.

Every civil rights group in 1982 included the effects test. This is the NAACP Legal Defense, National Urban League, Lawyers Committee on Civil Rights Under Law, Conference on Civil Rights, Mexican American Legal, National Council of La Raza, League of United Latin American Voters, League of Women Voters, the list goes on, Congressional Black Caucus.

And the House went ahead and passed the legislation with the effects test by 389-24, 389-24. And in that legislation, the legislation included language which reflected the concern of the administration about whether the intent test was going to lead to either proportional representation or to quotas. That language was included in the House legislation that passed, and it included the fact that members of a minority group have not been elected in numbers equal to the group's proportion of the population, should not in and of itself constitute a violation of this section. This addressed, for all intents and purposes, the concerns that the administration, I thought and most of in the civil rights community thought that they had with regard to the issue of proportional representation.

You roughly remember that or are aware--

Judge Roberts. I certainly remember the provision in the House bill at the time.

Senator Kennedy. So we also now included that language in the Senate bill. Now, the House bill passed. The Senate bill had 61 cosponsors prior to the time that we adopted the Dole amendment. That legislation was on its way. That legislation was good as done, quite frankly. The Dole amendment was effectively a restatement of what was in the House bill, and it had been included. But the administration after that said, "Well, if they are going to include that as the Dole amendment, we will let up in our opposition and we will eventually support it."

Now, during the time after the passage of the House bill and prior to the passage of the Senate bill, even though the House had passed it, you still strongly maintained the administration's position, did you not?

Judge Roberts. Well, I was still working for the administration, Senator. President Reagan's position was to extend the Act without change. As you mentioned, that was the Attorney General's position. I was a Special Assistant to the Attorney General, and I was doing my best to implement their views and support their views.

Senator Kennedy. In your memoranda that was to the Attorney General, Brad Reynolds--now, the administration after the House bill, I think the history will show it--thought that the administration should alter its position. Your memoranda said, "Brad Reynolds has expressed some reservation about circulating any written statement on the question to the Hill. My own view is that something must be done." Maybe that is a staffer, but it is separating yourself from Brad Reynolds, who was the leader on this issue at the time. Then you--

Judge Roberts. Well, with respect, Senator, my understanding--and I looked at that memorandum recently--is that the issue was whether or not to circulate something explaining the administration position, and I didn't think Mr. Reynolds's view was, you shouldn't do that because you didn't support the position. It was a question whether or not to circulate something at that time.

And my view was whether or not--I thought if the administration was advocating its position, it ought to get the position out.

Senator Kennedy. Well, I think that is good. You are a good advocate and a strong believer in this.

The reason in this memoranda that you circle--and I have it right here, and I make parts of it to the Committee, I mean to the record--in this in the last paragraph you said: On the issue of the effects standard nationwide on the strength of the record will be constitutionally suspect, but also contrary to the most fundamental tenets of the legislative process which the laws of this country are based, constitutionally suspect, effects test.

The reason that I bring this up is to find out what you believed then and what you believe today, because you have a phrase in your memoranda that this provision, the effects test, is constitutionally suspect. Is that still your position? Because if it is your position on an issue as important as the Voting Rights Act that resulted in the elections of hundreds and thousands of local leaders of color in all parts of the country, Representatives in the House of Representatives, and moved the whole democratic process forward, then I think the American people are entitled to know.

So specifically, specifically, do you believe that the effects test in the Voting Rights Act, which is currently the law, is constitutional?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I don't know what the analysis--you read a clause of a sentence and I would have to look at the whole memorandum to see exactly what the suggestion or the issue was in that case.

Chairman Specter. Senator Kennedy, would you make the memo available to him, please?

Senator Kennedy. Sure. What I am interested in doing is asking now whether you believe that the effects test is constitutionally suspect. I am interested in today, quite frankly, more than what we had--

Judge Roberts. Certainly.

Senator Kennedy. --written before, whether you believe that it is suspect today or whether you find that it is settled law. It is fine if you want to, obviously, refer to it, but I am interested in what is your view today, whether you--

Judge Roberts. What we're referring to--what I'm referring to in this paragraph is the Court's determination, if I'm looking at this correctly, under Section 5, its determination--the language you read notes the Supreme Court's conclusion under Section 5, which is the pre-clearance provision that applies to jurisdictions with a history of discrimination, and what the Court had said in that case was that requirement of pre-clearance was acceptable given the record that the Congress had established in the Voting Rights Act of 1965 of the practices in those jurisdictions. And the concern was that if you extend the effects test nationwide, that the record which had been established only with respect to particular jurisdictions in the South wouldn't apply nationwide, and that would be the basis for a constitutional challenge.

The application of the test under Section 2, which is, as you know, if we use the shorthand effects test, it's actually the totality of the circumstances test and it lays forth a number of considerations. I think there is some argument about how it closely attracts the effects test under Section 5 or if it's a different totality of the circumstances approach.

I'm not aware of any case that has questioned the constitutionality of the application of the totality of the circumstances case under Section 2 and if an issue on that were to be presented to me on the Supreme Court, which it may be, given the pending extension of the Voting Rights Act, I would, of course, confront that issue as a judge and not as a staff attorney for an administration with a position, and as a judge, I would come to the issue with an open mind and I would fully and fairly consider any arguments that might be presented.

I don't know if an argument is going to be presented about the application of the totality of the circumstances test nationwide. Again, I'm not aware of any challenges that have been presented to it since it was enacted. I don't know if any will be if or when the Voting Rights Act is extended again, but if it is, I would confront that as a judge and not as a staff attorney for an administration with a particular position on that issue.

Senator Kennedy. Well, Judge, there hasn't been, at least that I know, in the legal circles suspicion about the unconstitutionality of the effects test as it applies to Section 5. That is as grounded as it can be. I am asking the specific issue that was the really issue at attention with the extension, and really the most important part historically about the Voting Rights Act, whether you think that that provision is constitutionally suspect today.

This is the backbone of effective voting in our country and our society and I think the American people are entitled to know whether you believe or suspect that that particular provision, which has passed just overwhelmingly by the House and the Senate, signed by President Reagan, and has resulted in this historic march to progress, is constitutionally sound. That is what I am interested in.

Judge Roberts. I have no basis. I am not aware of any constitutional challenge that has been brought to Section 2 since it was enacted. I've not--I have no basis for viewing it as constitutionally suspect and I don't. If an issue were to arise before the Supreme Court or before the Court of Appeals, if I head back there, I would consider that issue with an open mind in light of the arguments. I've got no basis for viewing it as constitutionally suspect today and I'm not aware that it's been challenged in that respect since it was enacted. It may have been, but as I say, I'm not aware of it.

Senator Kennedy. I gather--you've had an extensive answer--that from that answer, I did hear that it is not constitutionally suspect as far as your view today.

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Grassley. . . . Judge Roberts, do you believe that every citizen who meets the qualifications set forth in the Constitution and our laws should have the opportunity to cast a free and unfettered vote? And as a follow-up, will you on the Court fairly apply the Voting Rights Act?

Judge Roberts. Well, I certainly agree that every citizen who meets the qualifications not only has the right to vote but should vote. I think it's a problem that we don't have more people voting. And any issues that come before me under the Voting Rights Act, I will confront those with an open mind and decide them after full and fair consideration of the arguments, in light of the precedents of the Court, and in light of a recognition of the critical role that the right to vote plays as preservative of all other rights.

Senator Grassley. Thank you.

Senator Graham. . . . Some big themes here. Were you proud to work for Ronald Reagan?

Judge Roberts. Very much, Senator, yes.

Senator Graham. During your time of working with Ronald Reagan, were you ever asked to take a legal position that you thought was unethical or not solid?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator, I was not.

Senator Graham. We talked about the Voting Rights Act. The proportionality test in the Reagan administration's view was changing the Voting Rights Act to create its own harm. Is that correct?

Judge Roberts. The concern that the Attorney General had, and the President, was that changing section 2 to the so-called effects test would cause courts to adopt a proportionality requirement, that if elected representatives were not elected in proportion to the racial composition in a particular jurisdiction, that there would be a violation shown that would have to be redressed.

Senator Graham. Do you think it would be fair to try to suggest that because you supported that position that you are somehow racially insensitive?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator, and I would resist the suggestion that I am racially insensitive. I know why the phrase "Equal Justice Under Law" is carved in marble above the Supreme Court entrance. It is because of the fundamental commitment of the rule of law to ensure equal justice for all people without regard to race or ethnic background or gender. The courts are a place where people need to be able to go to secure a determination of their rights under the law in a totally unbiased way. That's a commitment all judges make when they take a judicial oath.

Senator Graham. Knowing this will not end this line of inquiry, but at least trying to put my stamp on what I think we have found from this long discussion, basically the Supreme Court decided in section 2 that the intent test was constitutionally sound. Is that correct?

Judge Roberts. That was its determination in Mobile v. Bolden.

Senator Graham. And Senator Kennedy disagreed because he wanted a different test. And I respect him. He is one of the great--first, he is not part of the Reagan Revolution. I think we all can agree with that, so I don't expect him to buy into it. But I respect him greatly for his passion about his causes. He took it upon himself to try to change a Supreme Court ruling, to go away from the intent test to the effects test. And he was able to reach a political compromise with the administration. And I just want that to be part of the record. To say that Ronald Reagan or Judge Roberts by embracing a concept approved by the Court equates to that administration or this person being insensitive to people of color in this country I think is very unfair and off base.

Commerce Clause

Senator Hatch. Do you believe that Congress is just as bound by constitutional limits as state legislatures?

Judge Roberts. There are different limits, of course, but, yes, the limits in the Constitution on Congress are as important as limitations on state legislatures in the Constitution.

Senator Hatch. I ask that question because some seem to argue that overturning a statute that we pass here in the national legislature is almost presumptively an example of judicial activism. I have disagree with the Court on some of these statutes. The Morrison case is a perfect illustration to me. I am, along with Senator Biden, the author of the Violence Against Women Act, and I felt that they overreached in that particular case.

But in any event, some believe that it is judicial activism, while turning a blind eye to the much more common practice of striking down State legislation is just an afterthought.

This argument gets even more complicated when the Supreme Court uses a provision actually in the Constitution, to strike down a congressional statute, but provisions not in the Constitution to strike down State statutes. America's Founders were clear that the Constitution established a Federal Government of few and defined powers. It cannot regulate any activity it choose, but may only regulate in those areas which the Constitution grants it power to regulate.

One familiar area is found in Article I, Section 8, which gives the Congress to regulate, "to regulate commerce among the various States." Now, do not get me wrong, I do not necessarily agree with the Supreme Court, as I mentioned in the Morrison case. I do not think they always get it right when saying that Congress has overstepped its bounds with respect to regulating interstate commerce.

At the same time some have learned that we are sliding into a constitutional abyss because the Court has found just twice in more than 60 years that there is something, anything that it says the Constitution does not allow Congress to do regarding Congress and State legislatures and their enactments.

Judge Roberts. Well, the obligation to say what the law is, including determining that particular legislation is unconstitutional, is, as Chief Justice Marshall said, emphatically the duty and province of the Judicial Branch. You and I can agree or disagree on whether the Court is right in a particular case, but if the Court strikes down an Act of Congress and it's wrong, the Court shouldn't have done that, that's not an act of judicial activism, it's just being wrong.

The obligation to strike down legislation is with the Judicial Branch. They need--I think as Justice Holmes said, it's the gravest and most delicate duty that the Court performs, and the reason is obvious. All judges are acutely aware of the fact that millions and millions of people have voted for you and not one has voted for any of us. That means that you have the responsibility of representing the policy preferences of the people making the determination about when legislation is necessary and appropriate and what form that legislation should take.

Our job is a very different one. We have to consider cases that raise the question from time to time whether particular legislation is constitutional, and we have to limit ourselves in doing that to applying the law and not in any way substituting ourselves for the policy choices you've made. But it is not, as I would say, it's not judicial activism when the courts do that. They may be right or they're wrong, and if they're wrong, they're wrong, but it's not activism.

Senator Biden. Let me go on to my next question. Violence Against Women--and I realize it is a bit of a hobby horse for me since I wrote the legislation, and I know people say they wrote things. I mean, I actually did write that my little old self, with my staff. And no one liked it, I might add, at first--women's groups or anybody else.

But in 1999, you said, in response to a question--you were on a show. It was 1999. You were talking about a number of things, and you said, and I quote, "You know, we've gotten to a point these days where we think the only way we can show we're serious about a problem is if we pass a Federal law, whether it's the Violence Against Women Act or anything else. The fact of the matter is conditions are different in different States, and State laws are more relevant. It is, I think, exactly the right term. More in tune to different situations in New York as opposed to Minnesota, and that's what the Federal system is based upon."

Judge, tell me how a guy beating up his wife in Minnesota is in any different condition in New York.

Judge Roberts. Senator, I was not speaking specifically to any piece of legislation there. That was making a very--

Senator Biden. Well, you mention Violence Against Women, don't you?

Judge Roberts. That was the issue that had come up on the show, and the general issue that was being addressed is a question of federalism. I think it was part of the genius of the Founding Fathers to establish a Federal system with a national government to address issues of national concern; State and local government more close to the people to address issues of State and local concern; obviously, issues of overlap as well. I was not expressing a view on any particular piece of legislation. And I think the statement you read--

Senator Biden. Well, let me ask you--

Judge Roberts. --confirms that.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you. I would like to move to another subject because my time is moving on, and that is what has been happening in the Court in the last ten years. As I mentioned, for 60 years, the Court didn't strike down a single Federal law for exceeding Congressional power under the Commerce Clause. Yet in the last decade, the Court's reinterpretation of the Commerce Clause has been used to strike down more than three dozen cases. The Court's future decisions will determine whether the Congress will be able to take necessary action to stop child pornography, combat violent crime, ensure child support payments, prevent discrimination, improve our schools, and protect our environment.

My question is, do you agree with the direction in which the Supreme Court has moved in more narrowly interpreting Congressional authority to enact laws under the Commerce Clause?

Judge Roberts. Well, of course, I tried to avoid saying whether I agree or disagree with particular cases. But I would point out in this area, in particular, I think it's very important to look at the most recent case, which is the Raich case, the medical marijuana case, because the argument there was that these two decisions that you're talking about that were the first in the 60 years, Lopez and Morrison, the argument there was based on Lopez and Morrison, Congress lacks the power in this area.

And what the Supreme Court said in the Raich case, which I think is very important, it said there are a lot more precedents on the Commerce Clause besides Lopez and Morrison, and the appropriate way to regard those is two decisions in the more than 200-year sweep of decisions in which the Supreme Court has given extremely broad--it's recognized extremely broad authority on Congress's part, going all the way back to Gibbons v. Ogden and Chief Justice John Marshall, when those Commerce Clause decisions were important in binding the nation together as a single commercial unit.

So again, without commenting on whether particular decisions are correct or not, I do think it's important to recognize that the Court itself in its most recent decision has said we need to focus on the broad sweep and not just on those two decisions.

Senator Feinstein. Let me move to the case of the hapless toad, known more commonly as Rancho Viejo v. Norton. Do you believe there is a basis for sustaining the Endangered Species Act other than the Commerce Clause?

Judge Roberts. Well, the opinion I wrote there noted that the panel decision that I thought should be reheard en banc looked at one ground for under the Commerce Clause and the concluding paragraph in my opinion said that we ought to rehear the case to look at other grounds that were also under the Commerce Clause, but they were not the particular prong of the Commerce Clause analysis that the panel opinion had relied on, and the reason was that, as I explained in the opinion, another circuit court has suggested pointedly that the approach in the panel opinion was inconsistent with the Supreme Court.

And I thought if there was another basis for sustaining the Endangered Species Act that was not inconsistent in the view of another circuit court, that we ought to look at that and try to do it. It really reflects a restrained and minimalist approach. If there's a ground that doesn't cause another circuit court to say, you're violating the Supreme Court precedents, we ought to look at that and see if we could rest the decision there.

Senator Feinstein. I guess the point I am trying to get at is you are saying that the fact that the toad was almost only found in California means that it was an impermissible use of the Endangered Species Act. Well, then that raises a question. What if the toad strays across the border, or what if the toad, this is the last remaining toad, and--

Judge Roberts. Right, but the one point I would emphasize is my opinion did not conclude that there was no authority under the Commerce Clause in just that situation. There was another dissenting opinion that was filed by another judge who said this violates the Commerce Clause. I did not join that opinion. I wrote separately to say that we should hear this en banc with all the judges because there are other ways of sustaining this Act that don't implicate the concern that has caused the other circuit to question our approach that had caused the dissenting judge to conclude there was no authority, and I thought we ought to look at those other grounds because if we could sustain it without implicating that objection, that would be better all around.

I did not take the position that it was outside the scope of the Commerce Clause. It was a question of which ground under the Commerce Clause we ought to look at.

Senator Feinstein. There is a great deal of concern as what this then means for the implication for all environmental law--the Clean Water Act, the Clean Air Act. But if I understand you correctly, what you are saying is that you do not believe that the Commerce Clause should prohibit legislation in this area, is that correct?

Judge Roberts. I have not had occasion to decide that. I did not decide it in the Rancho Viejo case. One of the other judges did and I did not join that opinion. What I said is we should consider these other grounds. Now, I didn't have the opportunity, because there was a dissent from rehearing, to consider those other grounds.

Those other grounds were what other courts, the Fifth Circuit in the GDF case, had used to sustain application of the Endangered Species Act in the cases that came before them. They didn't get into the question of whether you look at the regulated activity, the building or the actual what was prohibited, the taking of the toad. They analyzed the protection of the endangered species as implicating a commercial activity, and that allowed them to sustain the Act without regard to whether it had an interstate effect itself.

Senator Schumer. . . . Okay. I would like to go to the third leg of protection now and probably spend the rest of my time on this, constitutional rights, the Commerce Clause. Now, just to briefly encapsulate--you have said this--you agree that the Constitution gives the Supreme Court the power to review and invalidate acts of Congress as was held two centuries ago in Marbury v. Madison.

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Schumer. And you also said in questions, I guess, with Senator Kennedy that you agree with the Court's conclusion that segregation of children in public schools solely on the basis of race was unconstitutional, as in Brown.

There is a third case that I would like to bring up, and it is the third leg of the framework in a lot of ways, and that is Wickard v. Filburn. Do you agree with the principle that the Congress has the power under the Commerce Clause to regulate activities that are purely local so long as Congress finds that the activities "exert a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce"? In other words, can Congress regulate commerce that does not involve an article traveling across State lines?

Judge Roberts. Well, that's obviously the Court's holding in Wickard v. Filburn, and reaffirmed recently to a large extent in the Raich case. But I would say that because it has come up again so recently in the Raich case that it's an area where I think it's inappropriate for me to comment on my personal view about whether it's correct or not. That's unlike an issue under Marbury v. Madison or Brown v. Board of Education, which I don't think is likely to come up again before the Court. This was just before the Court last year, and so I should, I think, avoid commenting on whether I think it's correct or not.

Senator Schumer. This is not a recent case. This is Wickard v. Filburn. It is from 1942, I guess it was. It is a basic bedrock of our constitutional law, law after law, the civil rights laws of 1982 and 1965 and 1964 that you talked about previously, are based on the Commerce Clause, not necessarily on Wickard.

Judge Roberts. No, not on Wickard.

Senator Schumer. And I understand, but so much of what we do is based on the Commerce Clause, and you know that there is a movement to greatly cut back on the Commerce Clause, led by Professor Epstein. One of the Justices that the President said he wanted to appoint more Justices like, Justice Thomas, doesn't really believe in the holding of Wickard.

And at a time with Hurricane Katrina, in the midst of the war on terror, where we need a strong national government, I find it--I am not asking you--there has been a holding that has been accepted, and it was accepted in Raich, as well, but just about everybody with a few exceptions I mentioned that says you don't need the article to cross State lines to be regulatable under the Commerce Clause by the Federal Government. That seems to me to be as little in dispute as Griswold, as Brown, in terms of its broad acceptance, in terms of a term that you have used, in terms of the stability of our government.

I am really surprised that you are unwilling to simply say--I am not asking you for all the variations on the theme, but a fundamental bedrock, which is that Congress can regulate under the Commerce Clause things that don't cross State lines is something that is in some doubt.

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator--

Senator Schumer. You know, you said that--excuse me. You said that there would be unanimity, just about, or close to it, on issue after issue. Obviously, there are dissents. I think Learned Hand in 1958 said he didn't agree with Marbury, but you said you had no problems going along with Marbury. In Brown, I suppose there are still some people who don't believe in Brown here and there.

And here is a bedrock principle, admittedly under attack by what I would call an extreme few, that if we didn't unequivocally back it, not the variations on the theme but the fundamental, the fundamental principle that Congress can regulate if it doesn't actually--the article doesn't actually cross, the Congress can regulate manufacturing because of its dramatic effect on interstate commerce. And you are unwilling to give Wickard the same status that you give Griswold, which was decided 22 years later, or Brown, which was decided 12 years later. I mean, I know that Morrison and Lopez--but they don't challenge the fundamental precept.

I didn't ask you if you fully support Wickard. I asked you if you support the proposition that under the Commerce Clause, you don't need the actual article crossing the State line, and you are not willing to say that is settled law, that that is a part of our established way of law?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, all you have to do is look at the arguments, the briefs in the Raich case where that was the issue that was argued, whether or not Wickard v. Filburn was still good law, whether or not Wickard v. Filburn should be applied in that situation.

Nobody in recent years has been arguing whether Marbury v. Madison is good law. Nobody has been arguing whether Brown v. Board of Education was good law. They have been arguing whether Wickard v. Filburn is good law. Now, it was reaffirmed in the Raich case and that is a precedent of the court, just like Wickard, that I would apply like any other precedent. I have no agenda to overturn it. I have no agenda to revisit it. It's a precedent of the Court.

But I do think it's a bit much to say it's on the same plane as a precedent as Marbury v. Madison and Brown v. Board of Education--

Senator Schumer. Or Griswold?

Judge Roberts. Or Griswold. The fact that it was just reconsidered and reargued last year in the Raich case suggests that it's not that same type of case, and that's why I'm uncomfortable commenting on it. I have gone farther than many other nominees in talking about cases like Marbury, like Brown, like Griswold, because I thought it was appropriate given the fact that those issues are not, in my view, likely to come before the Court again.

Here's an issue that was just before the Court last year, so I can't say that it's unlikely to come before the Court again and, therefore, I think it falls in the category of cases in which I should tell you I recognize it as a precedent of the Court. I have no agenda to overturn it or revisit it. But beyond that, I think it's inappropriate to comment.

Senator Schumer. Well, I would say that--well, let us go to a few more Commerce Clause issues. Again, I think Wickard is as accepted, is as part--not Wickard per se, but the idea that crossing State lines is not the only thing that you need for the Commerce Clause, that you don't have to have the article cross State lines to be able to regulate it is a bedrock of law after law after law that the Federal Government has passed. Your inability to concede that--

Judge Roberts. And I'm not expressing--

Senator Schumer. I understand, but--

Judge Roberts. I'm not expressing any hostility to the proposition at all. All I'm telling you is that this is a case that was challenged, the application, in the Raich case last year. And to say that it's in the same category as Marbury or Brown, I think is inaccurate.

Senator Schumer. But sir, Griswold came up in Lawrence. I don't known how many years ago that was. You can make the argument that even, somehow or other, somebody challenged precepts that flow from Marbury. I certainly--

Judge Roberts. And so perhaps I should have taken the approach Justice Scalia took. He wouldn't tell this committee whether Marbury was correctly decided.

Senator Schumer. I am glad you didn't do that.

Judge Roberts. Well, and then the reward for not doing that is to have additional cases that are very current in terms of the litigation before the Court, and the idea, as well, you said what you thought about Marbury. What do you think about the Raich case, which just reaffirmed Wickard v. Filburn? There are two very different parameters.

My approach has been a practical one, not an ideological one, but a practical one, but saying--

Senator Schumer. I am sorry. Just explain to me why you can say it about Griswold, which I am glad you did, but not about Wickard. Both of them have been litigated, tangentially, at least, in the last five or six years.

Judge Roberts. Well, Wickard was litigated directly in the Raich case. I don't think the issue in Griswold is likely to come before the Court. It was unlikely--

Senator Schumer. Wasn't Lawrence an outgrowth of Griswold in terms of what the right of privacy is to consenting adults in their bedroom?

Judge Roberts. Well, that's one of the issues, but the difference between the issue that was presented in Griswold and its ramifications of the analysis, those are two very different issues.

Senator Schumer. Okay. Let me ask you just a little bit about--a little more on the Commerce Clause. We have all talked about the hapless toad and the need--the fact that the toad didn't cross State lines didn't lead you to reject the Endangered Species Act under the Commerce Clause but to go seek another possibility. So let me give you a couple of hypotheticals.

Let us say we figured out that somebody could make botulism, or a lot of people could make botulism, a deadly, deadly poison--I think it is one of the seven poisons that the FBI looks for in terms of doing danger to us--that they could make it with materials completely within the State. There was no material that crossed State lines. It is a little bit like the toad. Would you think that the Federal Government, if Congress ordained, would have the ability to regulate that activity?

Judge Roberts. I think that sounds a lot like the Raich case, where the Court determined the medical marijuana issue even though the regulation of marijuana as an illicit drug--it had interstate impact even if the medical provision of it did not, and so they were willing to look beyond and apply the Wickard case, which they reaffirmed the suitability, and conclude that that had a significant effect on commerce, the regulation in general. You didn't have to look at the specific regulation.

It would seem to me that that--

Senator Schumer. Would you different that from Viejo?

Judge Roberts. Well, in Viejo, you're dealing with particular species, and the difficulty--and again, it was what another court had looked at, not the activity that was regulated, the interference with the species, but the activity that was taking place and having that impact, the building of a housing development.

Other courts, the Fifth Circuit in the GDF case, had argued that the approach of looking at the housing development rather than the particular activity was inconsistent with the Supreme Court's decisions, and what I said is that if there's another basis on which to evaluate it, and there was, and the panel opinion noted, we don't have to reach these other grounds because of our conclusion, that we should focus on those other alternative grounds and see if we could base and uphold the Act on those.

Senator Schumer. I understand, and my time is getting close to the end, so--I'm not sure I agree with the large difference between Raich, Viejo, and the hypothetical that I gave. I think the Viejo case and the hypothetical I gave were limited, but let me just conclude with this.

You know, people wonder, what is all the fuss about? The answer is very simple, and that is that we could see, if certain viewpoints became majority viewpoints on the Supreme Court, the dismantling of the entire apparatus to protect our rights through the narrowing of the Commerce Clause, which I said Justice Thomas already agrees should be narrow, and we have a President who may have--he at least has one more nomination--who said he wants to appoint people in the mold of Thomas.

Not only would the Endangered Species Act go, Title VII would go. OSHA would be gone. The Controlled Substances Act and prohibitions against personal possessions of biological weapons could all be unconstitutional.

Justice Thomas's views on this issue are similar to others. He is against any substantive due process right under the 14th Amendment. He believes that the Establishment Clause would allow the establishment of State religions--of religions in the States. And so this is a--these are serious, serious things. He would invalidate campaign finance laws. He would eliminate affirmative action.

Now, he is just one Justice, but I think it is our job here in the Senate on both sides of the aisle, if we feel that that kind of judicial philosophy, that kind of legal reasoning does not belong in the Court, to find out if nominees ascribe to it, and if they do, look at them warily.

I am not saying you do. As I said, some of the things you have said, I found pleasantly surprising today. But I do think it is our job and I think we are going to continue to do it.

Senator Schumer asked about the Commerce Clause, and I have just been fascinated by this debate about the Commerce Clause. Of course, you know, when this Nation got started, of course first we had the Articles of Confederation, where the States were supreme and they could not--the Nation could not function unless all States agreed. And so the Federal Government was essentially impotent, which led of course to the Constitutional Convention and a Federal form of government, where States and the Federal Government shared powers.

And now it is interesting to hear--of course we have seen a growth of national power over the years through a series of court decisions, and Congress, frankly, has pushed the envelope and tried to argue that Congress has virtually unlimited power to legislate, and can crowd out State Governments completely out of any field it wants to.

Isn't it true that there are specific jurisdictional bases upon which the Congress can legislate? In other words, under the 14th Amendment, Section 5, under the Commerce Clause? In other words, the Constitution of the United States was supposed to be a Constitution of delegated or enumerated powers, and interstate commerce being one of those enumerated powers. Of course, there are other provisions like the Necessary and Proper Clause. There have been a lot of decisions over the years about whether it is only powers expressed or implied and the like.

But isn't it true that the Supreme Court in the last decade has finally said, in Lopez and in Morrison, for example, that Federal power is not unlimited, that there is some limit and the fight is really over where those limits are? Would you agree with that?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator, and I do think that a proper consideration of Lopez and Morrison has to take into account the more recent Supreme Court decision in Raich, where the Court made the point that, yes, we have these decisions in Lopez and Morrison, but they are part of a 218-year history of decisions applying the Commerce Clause, and they need to be taken into account in the broad scope. It's an appreciation, again, the first one in 65, 70 years that recognized a limitation on what was within the Congress' power. But they're not sort of--they didn't junk all the cases that came before. They didn't set a new standard. That's what the Court said in Raich. It said, yes, we have those two cases, don't over-read them. Put them in the context and, you know, move on from there. And as the Court in Raich concluded, they upheld the exercise of Congress' authority.

Chairman Specter. I am going to move now to the confrontation between Congress and the Court, and what I consider to be denigrating comments about the Congress. In the Morrison case, in the face of a overwhelming factual record, the Court, 5-4 decision, said that parts of the legislation to protect women against violence unconstitutional because of the congressional "method of reasoning." And then the dissent picked up the conclusion that the majority's view was "dependent upon a uniquely judicial competence" with the other side of the coin being congressional incompetence. And then in the dissent in Tennessee v. Lane Justice Scalia says that the Court engaged in ill-advised proceedings to make itself the "task master" to see if the Congress has done its homework. You commented a few minutes ago that you would be respectful of Congress. Do we have your commitment that you won't characterize your method of reasoning as superior to ours?

Judge Roberts. I don't think it's appropriate--

Chairman Specter. In your particular case, maybe yours is, but--

Judge Roberts. No, no.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. As a generalization--we have gone around this with other nominees, and after they have gone to the Court, they have not been mindful as to what they have said here. But I take umbrage at what the Court has said and so do my colleagues. There isn't a method of reasoning which changes when you move across the green from the Senate columns to the Supreme Court columns. And we do our homework, evidenced by what has gone on in this hearing, and we do not like being treated as schoolchildren, requiring, as Justice Scalia says, a task master.

Will you do better on this subject, Judge Roberts?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't think the Court should be the task master of Congress. I think the Constitution is the Court's task master, and it's Congress' task master as well. And we each have responsibilities under the Constitution. And I appreciate very much the differences in institutional competence between the judiciary and the Congress when it comes to basic questions of fact finding, development of a record, and also the authority to make the policy decisions about how to act on the basis of a particular record. It's not just disagreement over a record. It's a question of whose job it is to make a determination based on the record. Now--

Chairman Specter. On the record. In U.S. v. Morrison, the legislation to protect women against violence, the record showed that there were reporters on gender bias from the task force in 21 States and eight separate reports issued by Congress and its committees over a long course of time leading to the enactment and the characterization by the dissenters that there was a mountain of evidence.

What more does the Congress have to do to establish a record that will be respected by the Court? And this is where the five-person majority threw it over, not because of the record but because of the method of reasoning. Isn't that record palpably sufficient to sustain the constitutionality of the Act?

Judge Roberts. Well, Mr. Chairman, I don't want to comment on the correctness of incorrectness of a particular decision. What I will say--

Chairman Specter. Well, Judge Roberts, let me interrupt you there for a minute. Why not? The case is over. This isn't a case which is likely to come before you again. These are the specific facts based on the rape of the woman--alleged rape by the three

VMI students. I liked your answers yesterday. You were willing to answer more questions about cases on the differentiation that they are not likely to come before the Court. This is not likely to come before the Court again. Isn't this record sufficient in Morrison to--

Judge Roberts. Well, Mr. Chairman, I must respectfully disagree. I have been willing to comment on cases that I think are not likely to come before the Court again. I think the particular question you ask about the adequacy of findings, make a determination of the impact on interstate commerce, is likely to come before the Court again. And expressing an opinion on whether the Morrison case was correct or incorrect would be prejudging those cases that are likely to come before the Court again. And that is the line--it's not just a line that I'm drawing. It's a line that, as I've read the transcripts, every nominee who's sitting on the Court today drew. Some of them drew the line far more aggressively and wouldn't even comment on cases like Marbury v. Madison.

What I can tell you is that with respect to review of congressional findings, that my view of the appropriate role of a judge is a limited role and that you do not make the law, and that it seems to me that one of the warning flags that should suggest to you as a judge that you may be beginning to transgress into the area of making a law is when you are in a position of re-evaluating legislative findings, because that doesn't look like a judicial function. It's not an application of analysis under the Constitution. It's just another look at findings.

Now, again, I don't feel it's appropriate to comment on Morrison. I do feel it's appropriate to tell you that I appreciate the differences between Congress and the courts with respect to findings, both with respect to the issue of the capability and competence to undertake that enterprise, and also with respect to the issue of authority to make a decision based on the findings.

Chairman Specter. Judge Roberts, we will have to agree to disagree about that. I don't think the facts of Morrison are likely to come before the Court, but I ask the questions, you answer them.

Senator Feinstein. Okay. I won't go there. Let me go somewhere else.

The Commerce Clause, the 14th Amendment, Lopez, which began a chain of about 36 cases striking down major pieces of legislation. It is not easy to get a bill passed here. I mean, there are hearings, there are discussions, there are markups. There is one House, there is another House, there is a President. It goes through most of the time scrubbed pretty good before it gets to the President.

Gun-free schools, struck down in 1995, an impermissible use of the Commerce Clause. In 1996, Moses Lake, Washington, a shooting in a school. In 1997, Bethel, Alaska, principal and one student killed. In 1997, Pearl, Mississippi, two students killed and seven wounded by a 16-year-old. In 1997, West Paducah, three students killed, five wounded. Stamps, Arkansas, two students wounded. Jonesboro, 1998, four students, one teacher killed, ten others wounded outside Westside Middle School. Edinborough, Pennsylvania, one teacher killed, two students, and on and on and on. An impermissible use of the Commerce Clause to prohibit possession of a weapon in schools. Now, at what point does crime influence commerce?

Judge Roberts. I think it does, and one of the things that's important to understand about the Lopez decision as the Court analyzed it, and again, I'm not taking a position on whether it was correctly decided or not--

Senator Feinstein. Right.

Judge Roberts. --but as the Court analyzed it, one of the things about the Act is that it did not have what's known as a jurisdictional requirement. It didn't have a requirement that the firearm be transported in interstate commerce, a requirement that I would think it would be easy to meet in most cases because--

Senator Feinstein. But the firearm is transported in interstate commerce, maybe not when that student had it, but to get to the student, the firearm has been transported in interstate commerce.

Judge Roberts. My point is that the fix in Lopez, all that the Court was saying was missing in there, or what was different about Lopez than many of the other cases was that lack of a jurisdictional requirement. And if the Act had been, as I understand the Court's analysis, if the Act had required that, which I think, again, it's fairly easy to show in almost every case--as you say, these guns are transported in interstate commerce--then that would have been within the Congress's power under the Commerce Clause.

I think it was an unusual feature of the legislation that it didn't have that requirement as so many laws do. As you know, it often says, you know, in interstate commerce, and that's, at least as I understand the Lopez decision, what made it unusual.

Senator Feinstein. That is very helpful. You might get it back again someday with that fix.

Senator Sessions. . . . We have talked about the Commerce Clause, and there has been a lot of criticism of some of the cases. I think there have only been two significant Commerce Clause cases maybe in the last 40 years: Lopez and Morrison. Senator Feinstein and you had a nice exchange about Lopez. I would certainly agree with your analysis. Had the Congress placed in there a requirement that the firearm had been traveled in interstate commerce, I believe that statute would have been upheld. We could pass it again with that simple requirement, and virtually every firearm will have traveled in interstate commerce. A few States have manufacturers. When I was a Federal prosecutor, I prosecuted a lot of those cases. As a young prosecutor, I was sort of an expert at it in the 1970s, and I proved sometimes the interstate commerce by simply putting an agent on saying there was no gun manufacturer in Alabama, or it said "Made in Italy" on it. I remember I got that affirmed one time as proof beyond a reasonable doubt that it was not made in Alabama. So Lopez, I believe, is a good decision.

Also with regard to crime, I would note that we have always had that nexus with interstate commerce. As a Federal prosecutor, it is not prosecution for theft. It is prosecution for interstate transportation of stolen property. That is the Federal crime. Theft is prosecuted only by the State courts, unless it is theft from an interstate shipment. That is a Federal crime. It is not stealing an automobile. It is interstate transportation of a stolen motor vehicle. ITSMV is the Federal crime.

The Hobbs Act, the Extortion Act to use against politicians, you have to have an interstate nexus.

And I have had cases where bribery was proven but we were not able to prosecute it federally because it did not have an interstate nexus. RICO, even arson cases have to have it there. So I just want to make sure that if--

Let me ask you this. In general, would you not agree that if someone in Pennsylvania picks up a rock and murders their neighbor, that is a crime unreachable by Federal prosecution under traditional interpretations of Commerce Clause and the reach of the Federal Government?

Judge Roberts. Well, again, barring special circumstances of the sort you were talking about, that's generally something addressed by State authorities.

Senator Sessions. But we need to get this thing straight. We have some people complaining we are federalizing too many crimes and then complain that we are striking down some that go too far. States should prosecute these cases locally and effectively and should do that, schools and guns and that kind of thing. And in the Violence Against Women Act, there was a Commerce Clause case where a woman was raped and then sued the people who assaulted her and raped her. She wanted to sue in Federal court under the Violence Against Women Act. And what the Court held there was, as I read it, that the Court limited Congress's power to provide for civil damages, money damages. She could sue that rapist in State court, but not for money damages in Federal court. Is that the holding of that case?

Judge Roberts. That's my understanding of what the Court held in the Morrison case, yes.

Senator Sessions. And I don't think it is an utterly extreme position. It certainly did not gut the Violence Against Women Act. It has so many more provisions than just that. If the action had been against a private business, could the damages have been rendered in that case?

Judge Roberts. I'm not sure I know the answer to that, Senator.

Senator Sessions. I will take the follow-up on the Garrett case that several people have mentioned. It involved the University of Alabama in a lawsuit against the State institution, claiming violation of the disabilities act. The State defended on the grounds that you could sue the State of Alabama for backpay; you could sue the State of Alabama to get your job back; you could sue the State of Alabama and get an injunction against the State to not discriminate again in the future; but under the Sovereign Immunity doctrine that protects a State from lawsuits, you couldn't sue them for money damages.

Now-Senator Cornyn as attorney general of his State and attorney generals like Attorney General now-Judge Bill Pryor, who defended Alabama, raised that defense. And I do not think it is a bogus defense. I think it is a legitimate concern.

Judge, do you recall where the doctrine that is so famous in the law--that the power to sue is the power to destroy--do you remember where that came from in legal our legal history?

Judge Roberts. I remember tax opinions talking about it, the power to tax being the power to destroy, but--

Senator Sessions. I think the doctrine has been applied to the States, so we attorney generals are familiar with it under the sovereign immunity that the States have. If you are empowered to sue the State of Alabama in Federal court, then you have virtually the power to destroy that State financially, if there is no real limit on it. And so we have always provided and the States have provided a sovereign immunity that the States will only allow themselves to be sued under certain circumstances and you cannot just sue them unnecessarily.

I know Senator Mark Pryor, our Democratic colleague, signed on the brief for the State of Alabama in the Garrett case taking this position, and the Supreme Court ruled with it. I also would note that it did not in any way destroy the disabilities act. It applied to only--State employees only make up about 3.7 percent of the employees in the Nation that might be covered by that.

So I think that there have been some healthy trends in reestablishing that there is some limit to reach of the Commerce Clause. Would not you agree?

Judge Roberts. Well, the interesting thing, the Court's most recent decision is the medical marijuana decision in the Raich case. And the Court there looked at the Lopez and Morrison decisions and tried to put them in context and said--because the argument there was based on Lopez and Morrison, saying this is beyond Congress's power, and the Court said those are only two of our cases and they need to be put in the broad sweep of Commerce Clause precedents for over 200 years. Yes, they are two cases and it had been, I think, 65, 70 years since the Court had focused on limitation under the Commerce Clause and concluded that it was beyond Congress's power. But the Raich case concluded this was within Congress's power. They said don't--it's not as if Lopez and Morrison are junking all that came before. They just need to be considered in a broad context.

And of course there's decision after decision, going back to Gibbons v. Ogden, one of Chief Justice John Marshall's early opinions, about the scope of Congress's power and the recognition under the constitutional scheme that it is a broad grant of power, and the recognition that this body has the authority to determine when issues affecting interstate commerce merit legislative response at the Federal level. I think that's--

Senator Sessions. Well, I think you are--just to go on to another subject, but I think you are correct. These are some difficult areas and the courts need to give a lot of attention to. But some recognition that there are limits to Federal reach is, I think, legitimate for a court.

Senator Feinstein. I want to go back to "hapless toad." It still bothers me. I asked you some questions about it yesterday. Let me ask you instead, because I am trying to get at it one way or another, the factors you would consider in making determinations on the scope of congressional power under the Commerce Clause. In Viejo, you addressed whether the survival of the endangered toad substantially affects interstate commerce, rather than looking at whether the cumulative impact of the survival of all endangered species substantially affects interstate commerce.

In National Association of Home Builders v. Babbitt, a case you call into question in Rancho Viejo, the D.C. Circuit followed the Wickard cumulative test and looked at whether the protection of all endangered species substantially impacts interstate commerce. The D.C. Circuit noted that although it is difficult to know the commercial impact of an individual species, in the aggregate we can be certain that the extinction of species and the attendant decline in biodiversity will have a real and predictable effect on interstate commerce.

In order to determine whether the Endangered Species Act regulates activity that substantially affects interstate commerce, should the courts look at the impact on interstate commerce of each individual species, or the cumulative impact of all species that are protected?

Judge Roberts. Senator, first of all--

Senator Feinstein. Do you think you can answer that?

Judge Roberts. I can, Senator. But I do need to clarify. At the beginning you said something that, what I did in the Rancho Viejo case, and that was not what I did. The only thing that I did in my opinion--and again, there was another opinion that analyzed it and made a determination of whether it was constitutional. I did not join that opinion determining that it was unconstitutional. I simply said that we need to look at these other grounds on which to sustain the Endangered Species Act. We should consider it en banc.

There was another court suggesting that our approach was inconsistent with the Supreme Court opinions. When I was confirmed for the Court of Appeals, everybody wanted to know will you follow the Supreme Court opinions? And I told you I would. And here we have a court of appeals suggesting you're not following them, and I said, well, let's take the case en banc. I did not state an opinion on whether the Commerce Clause requirement was satisfied or not. I said let's take it en banc and consider these other grounds.

The other grounds went to precisely the issue and the question that you asked.

If we had looked at it under the other grounds, which was the commercial activity surrounding the endangered species, in other words, the issue that one other court of appeals had said, for example, there is commercial activity surrounding endangered species that takes place nationwide, not limited to where the particular species is, and that would satisfy the commercial activity requirement and allow the Court to apply Wickard under the Supreme Court's precedents--

Senator Feinstein. Which is tough duty when you get down to, let's say, a really endangered species where you have very few of the species remaining. Perhaps they had been in a number of different States.

Judge Roberts. That was the problem that was presented--as my opinion tried to set forth, that's the problem that was presented with the approach that the panel took, and I thought we ought to re-hear it and look at these other grounds where you don't have to ask whether there is impact on interstate commerce from the particular species, the very point you--

Senator Feinstein. Let me tell you what is bothering me, is that it sets a prelude for the Clean Water Act and the Clean Air Act.

Judge Roberts. Well, in those areas, again, the commercial impact of pollution, those are things that I think are not going to present as difficult an issue remotely as if you look at each individual species. The whole point of my argument in the dissent was there was another way to look at this that would allow you to not have to look at the interstate impact of the one particular species. They were grounds that the Court in a panel opinion said they did not have to reach because they had taken this other approach that the Fifth Circuit was suggesting was inconsistent with our approach. And all I said--and, again, it is important to recognize, I did not say that even in this case the decision was wrong, that it was unconstitutional. Another judge dissenting did say that. I did not join that opinion. I simply said let's look at these other grounds for decision because that doesn't present this problem.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you for clearing that up. I appreciate it.

Senator Schumer. Let me, if I might. I want to go back to the Commerce Clause, which bothers me, as you know. Again, apart from anybody's view, do you agree that the Congress has the power under the Commerce Clause to regulate activities that are purely local, so long as Congress finds that the activities exert a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce?

Judge Roberts. If the question--and this is where the issue comes up--is whether or not as the Court has addressed it, the activities are commercial. If the activities are commercial in nature, you get to aggregate them under Wickard v. Filburn that we have talked about. You do not have to look at just that particular activity. You look at the activity in general. Where the dispute and issues come in is whether the activities are commercial. That is where the disagreement--the point I was trying to make in the infamous or famous toad case. If you should look at this as commercial activity, then you can--

Senator Schumer. Do you believe Congress deserves a great--this is in reference to some of the things Senator Specter talked about--that Congress deserves a great deal of deference when it decides something is commercial and has findings to that effect?

Judge Roberts. I do, Senator, and I think that is the basic theme that runs through the Court's Commerce Clause jurisprudence. There is again of course the Lopez and Morrison decisions, but there is also the Raiche decision, and again I think it is very important to--and what the Raiche decision said is you've got to consider Lopez and Morrison in the context of this broad sweep, not just as sort of the only decisions.

Senator Schumer. Okay. Let me ask you then this hypothetical, and that is: that it came to our attention, Congress's, through a relatively and inexpensive simple process individuals were now able to clone certain species of animals, maybe an arroyo toad; did not pass over State lines, you could somehow do it without doing any of that. Under the Commerce Clause can Congress pass a law banning even non-commercial cloning?

Judge Roberts. I appreciate it's a hypothetical and you will as well, so I don't mean to be giving binding opinions. But it would seem to me that Congress can make a determination that this is an activity, if allowed to be pursued, that is going to have effects on interstate commerce. Obviously, if you were successful in cloning an animal, that's not going to be simply a local phenomenon, that's going to be something people are going to--

Senator Schumer. You can leave it at that. That is a good answer as far as I am concerned.

Death Penalty and Habeas

Durbin. . . . Tell me in that context, as you look at this and talk about this, what appeared to be a very sterile and bloodless process as you answered Senator Grassley, tell me what goes through your mind and your heart when you think about addressing the death penalty, what happened in the Herrera case and what we should look to from the Court in the future when it comes to the Eighth Amendment and to the death penalty.

Judge Roberts. Well, I think it's important, first of all, to appreciate that the issue in the Herrera case I think was misportrayed as an issue of actual innocence. The issue in the Herrera case is at what point should new claims--in this case, the claim after his brother died, well, guess what, I didn't do it, my brother did it, and he's dead now. That is to some extent a claim of innocence, but it's the sort of claim that did not have, as the courts determined there, sufficient factual support to be taken seriously. That's quite different from a claim, for example, of DNA evidence. Now, that's an issue that's working its way up, and I don't want to comment on it, other than to say that it seems to me that that type of claim--that somebody who just died was the actual murderer is different from the scientific issue. They're just different cases. So I don't think that one should be taken as suggesting a view on the other.

Obviously, any case involving the death penalty is different. The Court has recognized that. The irrevocability calls for the most careful scrutiny. It is not an area in which I've had to consider cases as a judge up to this point, and I certainly know the magnitude of the concern and the scrutiny that all the Justices bring to that question. It's just different than other cases. There's no doubt about that. And DNA evidence obviously I think is a very important and critical issue. No one wants an innocent person executed, period. And the availability of that type of evidence, that opportunity in some cases, I think is something that's a very significant development in the law.

Now, as I said, there are cases coming up in there, so I don't want to say anything further.

Senator Durbin. I understand that. It is unfortunate that the decision was made by the White House not to provide the memos and writings on the 16 cases when you served as Deputy Solicitor General. This was one of the cases, Herrera. And so we might have learned a little more about the thinking at that time that led to your conclusion.

Senator Leahy. . . . Let me go to an issue we discussed yesterday, or others did, the issue of capital punishment. We have held in this committee a number of hearings that show some real flaws in the administration of capital punishment, you know, sleeping lawyers, drunk lawyers, lawyers who didn't bother even to investigate or didn't have the funds to do it. More than 100 death row inmates have been exonerated, some, though, who spent years on death row in the most horrible conditions for a crime they never committed.

I think Senator Durbin mentioned the situation out in Illinois where a Republican Governor had to, and did, courageously, I thought, extend clemency to a whole lot of people who had been on death row. Some say, and I think you have even said this, when they are exonerated, it shows the system works. Well, let me tell you about the system in that case.

One of the people was Anthony Porter. He spent 16 years on death row. He was within two days of being executed. The system didn't work on behalf of the government doing it. A bunch of kids from Northwestern University who had taken as an elective course a course on journalism, and the teacher said, why don't you look into a couple of these, and these kids went out and did it. The kids dug up the information that was there, available to the police, available to the prosecutor, available to the Feds. Nobody dug it up. They found it, and within two days of his execution, the State's Attorney dropped the case. They got somebody else to confess.

You said two years ago, and I remember being at that hearing, you said that on the startling number of innocent men sentenced to death who were later exonerated, you responded it somehow showed the system worked in exonerating them.

I worry about that statement. I really do. It has bothered me--and, you know, I voted for you for the circuit court and it was a split vote in our party. But that one really bothered me, that statement. I found it almost mechanical, and I will tell you why.

When we have people say innocent people who have been freed after years on death row shows the system is working, it doesn't. I think Sandra Day O'Connor said a few years ago, if statistics are any indication, the system may well be allowing some innocent defendants to be executed. If that is the case, the system is not working.

Herrera, we discussed that. The court grappled with it, didn't ultimately decide, does the Constitution permit the execution of a person who is innocent. As principal Deputy Solicitor General, you co-authored the amicus brief for the U.S. in the Herrera case. You said the claim of innocence does not state a ground for Federal habeas. Actually, you said, quote, "Does the Constitution require that a prisoner have the right to seek judicial review of a claim of newly-discovered evidence instead of being required to seek relief in the clemency process? In our view, the Constitution does not guarantee the prisoner such a right."

So let me ask you this. Without going into the facts of Herrera, is it your current personal view that the death row inmate who can prove his innocence has no constitutional right to do so before a court before he is executed?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, and this is the basis of the disagreement in Herrera. Herrera was not a case about actual innocence. It's a question of whether you're entitled to bring a new claim--

Senator Leahy. But listen to my question. Is a death row inmate who can prove his innocence, they have no constitutional right to do so in a court of law before they are executed?

Judge Roberts. Well, prove his innocence. The issue arrives before you get to the question of proof and the question is, do you allow someone who has raised several claims over the years to suddenly say at the last minute, somebody who just died was the person who committed the murder, and does that mean you start the trial all over again simply on the basis of that last-minute claim, or do you require more of a showing at that stage? That's what Herrera was about.

Now, I don't think, of course, that anybody who is innocent should be--suffer as a result of a false conviction. If they've been falsely convicted and they're innocent, they shouldn't be--

Senator Leahy. Well, does the-- Judge Roberts. --in prison, let alone executed.

Senator Leahy. But does the Constitution permit the execution of an innocent person?

Judge Roberts. I would think not, but the question is never do you allow the execution of an innocent person. The question is, do you allow particular claimants to raise different claims a fourth or fifth or sixth time, to say at the last minute, somebody who just died was actually the person who committed the murder. Let's have a new trial. Or do you take into account the proceedings that have already gone on.

Senator Leahy. I am looking for broad principles here. You said--let me read it again--"does the Constitution require that a prisoner have the right to seek judicial review of a claim of newly-discovered evidence instead of being required to seek relief in the clemency process? In our view, the Constitution does not guarantee the prisoner such a right." Is that your view today?

Judge Roberts. Well, that's what the Court held in Herrera--

Senator Leahy. Is that your view today?

Judge Roberts. Well, I'm not in a position to comment on the correctness or incorrectness of particular Court decisions. That's the Court's precedent in Herrera. It agreed with the administration position, which was not that innocent people should be subject to imprisonment or execution--

Senator Leahy. That is the position you took. The Supreme Court is going to revisit this issue in House v. Bell. Because you stated a position on that, does that require you to recuse yourself in House v. Bell?

Judge Roberts. No, because the position was stated in a brief filed on behalf of the administration and we talked yesterday about the established principle that lawyers do not subscribe as a personal matter to the views they present on behalf of clients.

Senator Leahy. Well, in this case, the client is the United States. I mean, you are stating the position as sort of the, what do they call it, the Tenth Justice.

Judge Roberts. Well, I was the Deputy Solicitor General on the brief. I didn't argue the case. The Solicitor General was the counsel of record in the case. But the position presented in the brief as an advocate is not necessarily the position of every lawyer on the brief.

Senator Leahy. I think you were more than just a lawyer on a brief. You were one of the most sought-after jobs, picked because of your position. I was very impressed when I talked with you about your use of Latin, for example, and French, and I am always impressed by somebody with that facility. There is a Latin phrase--and this is not a "gotcha." I will translate it: "Qui facit per alium facit per se." He who acts through another acts for himself. And that is not the case in Herrera?

Judge Roberts. He who acts for another acts for himself? Well, it's the client acting through the lawyer. And it's the client who's acting for themselves.

Senator Leahy. You are the client in this case when you--the Solicitor General is the client, in effect.

Judge Roberts. No, Senator, I disagree with that.

Senator Leahy. Okay.

Judge Roberts. The Solicitor General represents the interests of the United States, and those positions represent that client's position.

In the Herrera case, again, it was the Solicitor General who was responsible for the position that was advanced. I'm not suggesting in any way that I disagree with it or agree with it. I'm just saying that it is a basic principle in our system that lawyers represent clients, and you do not ascribe the position of the client to the lawyer. It's a position that goes back to John Adams and the Revolution.

Senator Leahy. Let me ask you this, then. Let me ask you something that can be ascribed to a Justice of the Supreme Court, and it is something that both the Chairman and I have talked a lot about, and that goes to some of the mechanics. If you will let me take a moment--you understand these, but for the audience, the so-called rule of four. It takes only four Justices to grant cert, but it takes five to grant a stay of execution. Usually the courtesy is that if you get four, a fifth one will sign on. That has not always been followed of late. Of course, we are dealing with the life or death, which Senator Specter called it bizarre and unacceptable, and it needs legislation to change it.

How do you feel, if you were Chief, you had four--four of the Justices now voted for a stay of execution, do you feel as Chief you should do the courtesy of the rule of five and kick in the fifth one?

Judge Roberts. It's an issue that I'm familiar with. I do know it arose. And I thought the common practice, the current practice was that if there are four votes to grant cert that the Court would grant the stay, even though that does require the fifth vote, so that you don't have a situation--

Senator Leahy. Yes, but that is because one more says, okay, we got four--

Judge Roberts. Right.

Senator Leahy. --we will put somebody else's name on here. But that hasn't been followed all the time recently. It usually was, and that is why both Senator Specter and I have raised concern. Do you feel the earlier practice of once you have four--

Judge Roberts. I think that practice makes a lot of sense. I don't want to commit to pursue a particular practice in an area that I'll obviously have to look at in the future, but it obviously makes great sense that if you have four to grant and that's the rule that you will consider an issue if there are four to grant. You don't want to moot the case by not staying the sentence.

Senator Leahy. And I appreciate that because I know we find a lot of cases where they are perfectly willing to grant cert on monetary damages, but here you can't get it right, it doesn't make much difference on appeal after the execution.

Senator Leahy. . . . You wrote a memo regarding--back in 1983, as a White House lawyer, you wrote a memo regarding proposals by then-Chief Justice Warren Burger to reduce the Supreme Court's caseload. In that memo, you volunteered the following: "If the Justices truly think they are overworked, the cure lies close at hand. For example, giving coherence to Fourth Amendment jurisprudence by adopting the good-faith standard and advocating the role of fourth or fifth guesser in death penalty cases would eliminate about a half dozen argued cases from the Court's docket each term."

Are you saying that judges are just too busy to pay attention to death cases?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator.

Senator Leahy. What are you saying? How do you feel today? That was 1983. How do you feel now 22 years later?

Judge Roberts. Well, in 1983, of course, they were hearing about 150 cases a year. They hear about half that now. Again, I don't want to prejudge questions or even be presumptuous to look down the road, but it seems to me that there's the capability there to hear more cases today, not fewer. And I'm sure there are reasons for the reduction in the caseload that I'm not familiar with that I might become more familiar with, but they handled twice as many cases 20 years ago than they do today. And I think the capability to address more issues is there in the Court.

Senator Leahy. My time is up, but I think you will find both the Chairman and the Ranking Member of this Committee believe they could handle more. Thank you, Judge.

Senator Kyl. . . . Let me just conclude with kind of a general comment, but before I do, just try to correct the record on--not necessarily correct, but add to the record on one very narrow point. You were discussing, I believe with Senator Kennedy, the Herrera v. Collins case, and he talked about innocence claims being heard by the Court, that a prisoner should have the right to present innocence claims.

I just wanted to ask you: Is it not the case that in that Herrera v. Collins case it did not address the proper route for bringing claims based on newly discovered forensic evidence such as DNA testing? Which is, of course, a relatively new phenomenon now, but that was not the issue presented in that case.

Judge Roberts. That's right. There wasn't--I don't know if they had as much access to that type of evidence back then when it was argued, but it was certainly not that type of evidence. It was a new claim that somebody else did it, somebody who had just died. That was the new claim that they sought to raise at the last stage there. And I do think any issue arising with respect to DNA evidence--and those issues are working their way up through the Court. Those cases would have to be addressed on their own terms.

Senator Kyl. Thank you.

Senator Feingold. . . . I will only be able to get to some of my questions on the next subject, and hopefully in the next round can continue. But, Judge Roberts, as Senator Leahy mentioned earlier, when you came before the Committee a couple of years ago, we discussed the fact that more than 100 people on death row have been exonerated and released, and, in fact, I believe the number is now 121 people who we know were sentenced to die for crimes they did not commit.

I want to follow up on work that Senators Durbin and Leahy have done in discussing with you the Herrera case. I do differ with your characterization of the case. The Solicitor General brief that you signed presented the issue as whether the Constitution "requires that a prisoner have the right to seek judicial review of a claim of newly discovered evidence." That is, the question was not how strong the evidence of innocence must be, as you seemed to be suggesting earlier, but whether the Constitution requires that there be some avenue presenting evidence of innocence in Federal court. Your brief argued that it does not.

Now, that brief also, as you know, contained a footnote that I am going to ask you to comment on. It said, "There is no reason to fear that there is a significant risk that an innocent person will be executed under procedures that the States have in place. The direct review and collateral procedures that the Federal Government and the States have in place are more than ample to separate the guilty from the innocent." And yesterday you talked about the possible effect of DNA evidence on the legal framework in this type of case.

In light of the many cases of innocent people ending up on death row that have come to light in the past decade, and aside from what was the ultimate issue at stake in that case, do you still agree with your statement from the Government's Herrera brief?

Judge Roberts. Well, that was the administration position at the time. It was one that the Supreme Court agreed with; 6-3 I think was the ruling. I know Justice O'Connor was in the majority.

The issue--and, again, there was obviously argument a the time about what the issue really was in Herrera. And I thought it was quite inaccurate to view it as a case involving the question of whether actual innocence could be presented, because there was--it was a claim of newly discovered evidence, and it was a claim that somebody who had just died was actually the murderer. At the end of exhaustive appeals through the State system, exhaustive collateral review through the State system, exhaustive collateral review through the Federal system, is there an obligation to decide at that point that a new claim that somebody else committed the crime--

Senator Feingold. I am running out of time, and I just wonder if you still stand by the statement, if you can just say yes or no.

Judge Roberts. Well, that was the administration position.

Senator Feingold. All right. Well, let me cut to the quick. I would like to know whether you think there is a risk that innocent people may be sentenced to death in today's criminal justice system. And I must say, Judge, Supreme Court Justices do have the power of life and death in these matters.

Judge Roberts. Senator, I think there is always a risk in any enterprise that is a human enterprise like the legal system. Obviously, the objective of the provision of the rights to a criminal defendant and trial, the provision of collateral review at the State level, the provision of collateral review at the Federal level, the availability of, as you suggested, clemency--all of that is designed to ensure that the risk is as low as possible.

There are issues that are going to be presented about the availability of DNA evidence which may or may not help reduce the risk even further. There is always a risk. And, obviously, when you're dealing with something like capital punishment, the risk is something that has to be taken extremely seriously at every stage of the process.

As we talked about more than 2 years ago at the prior hearing, I think the most effective way of minimizing that risk is to ensure that people facing that sanction have the best counsel available at every stage. As you know from looking at this problem, the issue that comes up are questions that weren't raised that should have been raised if the person had a more capable lawyer, avenues that weren't pursued that should have been pursued if that lawyer had the resources. And that's where I think the risk of wrongful conviction is going to be most effectively addressed, ensuring the availability of competent counsel at every stage of the proceeding.

Senator Feingold. Thank you, Judge.

Judge Roberts. Thank you, Senator Feingold.

Senator Feingold. Turning again to the death penalty, when you worked in the Reagan administration, you expressed strong opposition to Federal courts reviewing criminal convictions and State courts reviewing writs of habeas corpus. As you know, prisoners who believe they were wrongly or unfairly convicted in State court can seek to have the Federal courts hear their claims via a writ of habeas corpus.

Habeas corpus is a fundamental part of our legal system that has long protected individual freedom. In a 1981 memo, you argued that the availability of Federal habeas relief to State prisoners "goes far to making a mockery of the entire criminal justice system." In that same memo, you said, "The question would seem to be not what tinkering is necessary in the system but, rather, why have Federal habeas corpus at all?"

Then in 1983, as Senator Leahy brought up yesterday, you suggested that if the Supreme Court wanted to reduce its caseload, it should "abdicate the role of fourth or fifth guesser in death penalty cases." Not in First Amendment cases or antitrust cases, but death penalty cases.

I know that you've said that your memos in the Reagan administration reflected the views of the administration a nd not your own. But in this area, at least, your memos clearly indicate, I think, that these were your views. With the 1981 memo, for example, there is a cover note in your handwriting directing that the memo be sent to Jon Rose, an Assistant Attorney General at the time, with a cover note that reads, "The attached memorandum contains some thoughts on habeas corpus reform for whatever you think they're worth. Judge Friendly and Justice Rehnquist would never have forgiven me if I had remained mute." That sounds a lot like a memo advocating your views, not those of the Department.

With regard to the memo from 1983 that I mentioned, you were analyzing the Chief Justice's proposal to create another intermediate appellate court to take the pressure off the Supreme Court's docket, and you said, and I quote, "My own view"--"My own view is that it is a terrible idea." And you went on to say that the fault lies with the Justices themselves who take too many cases, including death penalty cases.

And you sent a personal letter to Judge Friendly in 1981 that said, "This is an exciting time to be at the Justice Department when so much that has been taken for granted for so long is being seriously reconsidered. To cite just one example, serious thought is being given to reform of habeas corpus. I do not know what will eventuate. As you noted, what has come to pass as the Great Writ is regarded by many lawmakers with no idea of the problems as unalterable perfection."

Now, that discussion in a personal letter sounds like your own opinion as well. A decade later, when you were at the Solicitor General's office during the first Bush administration, you signed several briefs that sought to strictly limit Federal habeas review. And in 1993, while in private practice, you testified before the House Republican Task Force on Crime in favor of further habeas restrictions.

The comments in your memos from the 1980s, I am sorry to say, don't even show the slightest concern about innocent lives possibly being lost if Federal habeas were eliminated. Does the possible hostility toward the habeas process that was expressed in those memos, particularly in death penalty cases, reflect your current view on Federal habeas? Or have your views changed or evolved?

Judge Roberts. Well, as you know, the law has changed and evolved dramatically since the early 1980s, and at least with respect to my personal letter to Judge Friendly--I guess I thought it was a personal letter--

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. But the situation has changed dramatically, as you know. What I was referring to in the early 1980s was a situation where there were no limits on repetitive habeas corpus petitions, four, five, six, dozens of different petitions could be filed repetitively. Congress saw that as a problem. Congress acted to address the very concerns that I was raising there in past legislation. The Supreme Court saw it as a problem. The Supreme Court acted in a number of cases, the Teague case and others, in limiting the availability of successive and repetitive habeas petitions.

Actually, what happened is the Supreme Court, I think, started down that path, and Congress made the decision that this is something they should look at in a more comprehensive way. So Congress passed laws that restrict when people can file repetitive and successive petitions. Those are the very concerns that I was talking about. They were concerns that had motivated the first person I worked for as a lawyer, Judge Henry Friendly, to write on the subject. He wrote a famous article on habeas reform entitled "Is Innocence Irrelevant?" because he thought these successive petitions had made sort of a game out of the whole process in which the question of innocence was totally lost in these successive petitions.

And the references to the Great Writ, yes, of course, the writ of habeas corpus has an established heritage as a basis for complaining about illegal confinement. But all the stuff we are talking about there--the fourth and fifth successive petitions, raising new issues that should have been raised in the first petition--and as you know, that's what Congress' legislation focused on.

Senator Feingold. But, Judge, did you not at the time, as I read in your statement, advocate the abolition of Federal habeas review?

Judge Roberts. No. The purpose of what I was saying was to certainly reform and abolish the system as it existed then, where people could file repetitive and successive petitions, and I'll tell you why. The main problem--and I think it's a particular concern in death cases--is that nobody along the way feels that they're making the responsible decision. If people get in a situation where they know, okay, if you're on a jury and you sentence someone to death, if you think, well, he's going to file habeas petitions in State court, and they're going to look at it then, after that--and the person who considers the State habeas petition says, "I know there are going to be successive Federal habeas petitions, they'll look at the issue then," everybody is pointing fingers in opposite directions.

When Congress reformed this system, I think it helped to make clear that the decisions that are going to be made on the first habeas petition are going to be critical, and so hopefully it's looked at a lot more carefully than in the prior system when you knew, well, that wasn't the end of the process, it wasn't even the beginning of the end; the conviction was just the end of the beginning.

Senator Feingold. Well, would you agree that had the view that you advocated in your memos prevailed in the early 1980s, the abolition of the writ, and Federal habeas review of State court convictions was removed entirely, had that happened, innocent people would have been executed and serious constitutional errors would have gone unaddressed?

Judge Roberts. Well, that wasn't my position.

Senator Feingold. No, but I am asking--

Judge Roberts. No, my--

Senator Feingold. Had that view prevailed, not necessarily your personal view, but the abolition of the writ, isn't it the case that innocent people would have been--

Judge Roberts. Oh, I'm not in favor now and was not in favor then of not allowing any Federal habeas review.

Senator Feingold. I am asking you whether you wouldn't agree that as a matter of fact--

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Feingold. --had the writ been eliminated, that some innocent people would have been executed?

Judge Roberts. Well, they certainly wouldn't have been able to assert their claim of innocence in Federal habeas--

Senator Feingold. Would not have--

Judge Roberts. --and people do succeed at that stage. I certainly think it serves a valuable purpose. But that, again, was not--you know, the situation with respect to habeas 23 years ago was quite different than it is today, and the reason it's changed, I think, is because Congress responded to those sorts of concerns.

Senator Feingold. I take those comments as very important, and I know you can't comment on this, but there are further efforts now to further limit this right that could come before you. And I know you can't comment on it, but I think it is of great significance that you have acknowledged that some of those changes that were made in the 1990s have significantly affected your view about the propriety of the habeas process.

Environmental Law

Senator Leahy. I hope you feel that way. I know the people who spoke of the First Amendment, it is not there to protect popular speech, that is easy, it is unpopular speech. And as I mentioned yesterday, our State really wanted to make sure the Bill of Rights was going to be there before we joined the union.

Let me switch gears a bit. In the area of environmental protection, I feel that you have narrowly construed laws in the Constitution in a way that closed the courthouse doors to millions of parents who want to protect their children from dangerous air pollution or unsafe drinking water, fish contaminated with mercury, foods covered with pesticides. We all know that often the President, no matter who is President, and the local governments do not do enough to protect people in environmental areas, from environmental dangers, and we have given them protection, the Congress has.

I thought your Duke Law Journal, which many have commented about in the press and otherwise, was somewhat dismissive regarding these citizen suits to protect the environment. You wrote that Congress may not ask the courts in effect to exercise oversight of responsibility at the behest of any John Q. Public who happens to be interested in the issue. You discount the interests that many citizens and Congress have in preserving our environment. A few years ago--you sound very much like Justice Scalia--I know a few years ago, the Supreme Court, over the dissent of Justice Scalia, ruled that a citizen living near a stream that had been polluted by many illegal discharges of mercury from an upstream company did have the right to go to court over these illegal mercury discharges. The Government was not enforcing the laws.

So I ask you this. People, if their President or their Governor fails to enforce these laws, why should not individuals have access to courts where polluting companies could be made to pay for their wrongdoing? What can you tell us to assure us, parents or children who are worried about this from birth defects and all, all of us, what can you do to assure us that they as individuals who under Chief Justice Roberts find the courthouse door slammed shut in their face?

Judge Roberts. Well, one thing I would tell them to do is read the rest of the Duke Law Journal article, because one thing it makes--point it makes is that environmental interests, it goes on to say aesthetic interests, those are all protected under the law, and that one reason courts should insist that those who bring suit have standing--that's the issue--that are actually injured, is because standing can encompass certainly environmental harms. The issue that was being addressed in the Duke Law Journal article was whether anyone could bring a lawsuit just because they are interested in the issue, or whether the plaintiffs had to show that they had been injured. In other words, in your hypothetical, the people who are downstream from the mercury pollution, they will be able to show that they are injured and can bring suit.

The question is whether somebody halfway across the country who's not injured by that act should be able to bring suit. That was the issue in the—

Equal Protection Clause

Senator Kennedy. [After long discussion of civil rights and Hurricane Katrina:] To start my inquiry, I want to discuss with you the Brown v. Board of Education, which you have already mentioned this morning, which I believe is the most important civil rights decision in our lifetime. In Brown, decided in 1954, the year before you were born, the Supreme Court concluded unequivocally that black children have the constitutional right to be educated in the same classrooms as white students. The Court rejected the old doctrine of separate but equal, finding that it violated the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment.

In considering the issues raised by Brown, the Court took a broad and real-life view of the question before it. It asked, does segregation of children in public school solely on the basis of race, even though physical facilities and other tangible factors may be equal, deprive the children of the minority group of equal educational opportunities? So do you agree with the Court's conclusion that the segregation of children in public school solely on the basis of race is unconstitutional?

Judge Roberts. I do.

Senator Kennedy. And do you believe that the Court had the power to address segregation of public schools on the basis of the Equal Protection Clause of the Constitution?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Kennedy. And you are aware that Brown was a unanimous decision?

Judge Roberts. Yes. That was the--represented a lot of work by Chief Justice Earl Warren, because my understanding of the history is that it initially was not and he spent--it was reargued. He spent a considerable amount of time talking to his colleagues and bringing them around to the point where they ended up with a unanimous Court.

Senator Kennedy. And a lot of work by the plaintiffs, as well.

Judge Roberts. I'm sure.

Senator Kennedy. First, in reaching its decision, the Court concluded that it must consider public education in the light of its full development and its present place in American life throughout the nation, that is that it must consider the conditions and impact of its decision in the real present-day world. The Court specifically declined to rely on the legislative history of the 14th Amendment. It looked instead to the facts and situation as they exist in the case and in the world at the time of the decision.

Judge Roberts, do you agree that the Court was correct in basing its decision on real world consideration of the role of public education at the time of its decision rather than the role of public education in 1868, when the 14th Amendment was adopted?

Judge Roberts. Certainly, Senator. The importance of the Court's approach in Brown is, of course, to recognize that the issue was whether or not the discrimination violated equal protection, and you have to look at the discrimination in the context in which it is occurring. I know there has been a lot of recent academic research into this, the original intent of the drafters of the 14th Amendment. Professor McConnell's piece suggests that it's perfectly consistent with the conclusion in Brown, and it also, for the very point you mentioned, was an important one, that the nature of the institution of public education wasn't formed to the same extent at the time of the drafting--

Senator Kennedy. In 1868, that is right.

Judge Roberts. --yes, as it was at the time of the decision.

Senator Kennedy. The Brown Court also held that it was important to look at the effects of segregation on public education. The court determined that education was so vital to a child's development and opportunity for advancement in society, where the State had undertaken to provide public education, it must be available to all on equal terms. Thus, it found that the separate education was inherently unequal. So it is fair for me to conclude you accept both the holding and the reasoning in the Brown case?

Judge Roberts. Well, the reasoning, though, I think it's important, is focused on the effects, yes, but the conclusion was that they didn't care if the effects were equal. In other words, the genius of the decision was the recognition that the act of separating the students was where the violation was and it rejected the defense, certainly just a theoretical one given the actual record, that you could have equal facilities and equal treatment.

I think the conclusion, if the record had shown--which it did not--if it had shown perfectly equal treatment in the African American school and in the white school, then Chief Justice Warren's analysis would be the same because the act of separation is what constituted the discrimination.

Senator Kohl. … Judge Roberts, yesterday you describe your role as a judge as just an umpire, as you called it, calling balls and strikes. That is an interesting analogy for me as I have more than most some personal experience with umpires and referees. But as all of us with any involvement in sports know, no two umpires or no two referees have the same strike zone or call the same kind of a basketball game, and ballplayers and basketball players understand that, depending upon who the umpire is and who the referee is, the game can be called entirely differently.

When we look at real legal cases, I wonder whether or not your analogy works. For example, in our private conversation, I asked you whether the words of the Constitution must always be interpreted in the same way as the authors originally intended. For example, the 14th Amendment, which guarantees equal protection under the laws to all citizens, was written at a time when schools were, in fact, segregated based on race. And yet in Brown v. Board of Education, the Equal Protection Clause was interpreted to find segregation schools unconstitutional, and you, of course, have endorsed that decision.

No one disagrees with that conclusion today, but would a neutral umpire, as you described yourself yesterday, have decided back in 1954 to expand the words of the Constitution outside of the strike zone? Would a neutral umpire have overturned a 58-year-old Supreme Court precedent and gone against the understanding of the authors of the 14th Amendment and also the views of almost half of the State legislatures at that time in making the decision that they made?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I think the answer to your question is yes. The research into the original understanding of the drafters of the 14th Amendment has expanded and changed quite a bit, and I think a very good case can be made about their views. But, more importantly, the issue was the institution of public education wasn't as established at the time as it was in 1954, the time of the crafting of the amendment. And, you know, the Framers spoke in broad language, and whether they specifically addressed the question of public education or not isn't the limitation. Their intent was not limited to the particular problem. They chose broad language, and they should be held to their word. And I think it is perfectly consistent with an original understanding to argue and to conclude that their original understanding meant that segregated schools were unconstitutional, not just in 1954 but at the time they enacted the amendment. I think a strong case can be made there.

And what was interesting about the Brown case--maybe it's my own perspective, but if you look at the arguments in that case, yes, John W. Davis arguing for the Board was arguing on the basis of precedent in Plessy v. Ferguson, saying this is the established law. But so was Thurgood Marshall. He went in and he was arguing on the basis of more recent precedent, Sweatt v Painter, a more recent decision of the Court about law school separate but equal. And he was saying you need to build on that more recent precedent in addressing this case.

So the Court was not changing the strike zone. That wasn't the way Marshall presented his argument. And it wasn't necessary for them to say we're changing the rules of the game. What was necessary for them to do and what Marshall was urging them to do was to get it right when they had gotten it wrong in Plessy.

Senator Kohl. Judge, back in 1954, clearly the Supreme Court Justices were willing to step outside the box, to break new ground, to do something that no one, no Court, no legislature, no President had done before, and strike out in an entirely new and positive direction for this country. They were not umpires simply calling balls and strikes. They were breaking new ground, and they did so in the best interest of our country, didn't they?

Judge Roberts. Well, of course, it was a dramatic shift, and the overruling of Plessy v. Ferguson was exactly that. My point is simply that if you look at the Brown decision, it is more consistent with the 14th Amendment and the original understanding of the 14th Amendment than Plessy v. Ferguson, and it's based on the conclusion that the separation of the races in the schools was itself a violation of equal protection. In other words, it's not a departure from the 14th Amendment. It was a departure from the--

Senator Kohl. But it was ground-breaking.

Judge Roberts. Certainly.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you. I would like to move on. In Bray, you argued on behalf of the government as Deputy Solicitor General that the right to have an abortion is not specific to one gender. Specifically, your brief stated, quote, "unlike the condition of being pregnant, the right to have an abortion is not a fact that is specific to one gender," end quote. In your oral argument, you went on to make this point by comparing Operation Rescue's attempts to prevent a woman from exercising her privacy right to make decisions about her pregnancy to an ecologist's efforts to block an Indian tribe from using their exclusive fishing rights. Do you think that is an appropriate analogy?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, it was a position and an argument that the administration made that was accepted by the Supreme Court by a vote of six to three. The point, underlying point was that under the statute at issue in Bray, the Ku Klux Klan

Act required under the Supreme Court's precedents that people engaged in the challenged activity must be motivated by a discriminatory animus. Obviously, under the Ku Klux Klan Act, the classic case, racial hostility.

And the issue was, are people opposed, in the Bray case, opposed to abortion opposed to women, and the determination of the Court was that, no, that there are people who are opposed to abortion and that does not constitute opposition or discriminatory animus against women and, therefore, that the Ku Klux Klan Act didn't apply. Many other provisions obviously apply in the case of abortion protestor violence, including State law and other provisions of Federal law. But the Supreme Court concluded six to three that there is no discriminatory animus based on opposition to abortion.

False Claims Act

Senator Grassley. In regard to how you view and use legislative history, I would like to discuss your opinion in the Totten v. Bombardier Corporation case interpreting the False Claims Act. The issue on appeal was whether Bombardier had met the presentment requirements of the False Claims Act. To violate the statute according to Section 3729(a)(1), a company must have presented its false claim to an officer or employee of the Federal Government. Importantly, Section 3729(c) explicitly provide that the term "claim" includes demands for payment submitted to Government contractors whether or not they are resubmitted to the Federal Government.

In your opinion, you wrote that those facts of that case did not consist of a false claims under the False Claims Act because there can only be a false claim if it is literally presented to somebody that is a Federal Government employee, I assume.

It seems to me that to reach this result, you inserted a resubmission requirement into the law in a place where it doesn't, in fact, appear, Section 3729(a)(1), and, in fact, gave short shrift to the legislative history, which spelled out what Congress intended when it amended the Act in 1986. The legislative history of the Act and the Senate Committee report--and I didn't refer to my authorship of the legislation, but, anyway, in our Senate Committee report explaining that liability under the False Claims Act attaches to a submission of, and I quote, "a false claim to the recipient of a grant from the United States or to a state under a program financed in part by the United States."

The legislative history also states that Congress sought to ensure that "a false claim was actionable although the claim or false statements were made to a party other than the Government if the payment thereon would ultimately result in a loss to the United States."

So my question is whether, on reflection, that is a fair way to deal with the express wishes of Congress and whether it is possible that you misunderstood the statute when you decided the Totten case, and why did you reject legislative history if you referred to it--and maybe you didn't refer to it. But why did you reject legislative history regarding the resubmission requirement in the False Claims Act when you wrote the opinion in Totten?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, the answer to your question is it's certainly possible that the majority in that case didn't get it right and that the dissent that was a very strong dissent did get it right. I think the majority got it right. There we focused on particular language. The issue in the case involved, as you know, a subcontractor claim. You have the United States giving money to--in this case, it was Amtrak, and then Amtrak using that money to hire a subcontractor--I think it was Bombardier--to do a particular part of the job. Everybody agreed that under the precedents that are applied, Amtrak is not the Government, can't be considered part of the Government. And the statute, as you noted, required--it was triggered by the presentment of a false claim to an officer or employee of the United States. And the majority's reasoning was that when--the false claim was one made by Bombardier to Amtrak, and the claim was submitted to Amtrak. And since Amtrak was not the Government, what Judge Rogers and I concluded was that that wasn't presentment of a false claim to an officer or employee of the United States.

There was an extensive discussion between the majority and the dissent. The view that you have articulated was certainly presented in a compelling way by Judge Garland, my colleague on the court of appeals, and we spent a great deal of time on the case, and I think it's reflected in the opinions. And that view was laid out. Judge Rogers and I thought that the statutory language that said the claim had to be presented to an officer or employee presented too high a hurdle for us to get over in looking at the legislative history.

But I'm happy to concede that it was among the more difficult cases I've had over the past 2 years. Anytime judge Garland disagrees, you know you're in a difficult area. And the function of his dissent to make us focus on what we were deciding and to make sure that we felt we were doing the right thing I think was well served. But Judge Garland disagreed, and so it's obviously to me a case on which reasonable judges can disagree. And I just have to rest on the analysis in the majority opinion.

Senator Grassley. Let me tell you something you might not be aware of, and that is that the Bush administration has filed an amicus brief in the Eleventh Circuit arguing that you had misread the False Claims Act in the Totten case, and in Atkins v. McIntyre, the administration has argued that there's no presentment requirement in Section 3738(a)(2) of the False Claims Act, and that "the Totten majority misconstrued the language and purpose of the False Claims Act in concluding that the Act does not encompass false claim records statements submitted to recipients of Federal funds absent resubmission to a United States officer or employee." And I assume if I ask you if you have an opinion on that you can't answer it.

Judge Roberts. Well, not on that one. I do know the Bush administration filed an amicus brief in our case as well. I guess this would be one of those cases I would cite in response to the question of whether I'm capable of ruling against the administration. We did in that case. Again, the arguments, I think, were well presented on both sides, and Judge Rogers and I gave it our best shot, and the opinion will stand or fall on its own.

Senator Grassley. Well, I hope sitting in the marble palace you will remember that I have great pride in the success of the False Claims Act--$8 billion coming back to the Federal Treasury.

Judge Roberts, you filed an amicus brief in the case of United States v. Halper, a case which raised the question of whether a civil False Claims Act case could implicate the double jeopardy clause. The Supreme Court agreed with your arguments and held that the double jeopardy clause protects a convicted criminal defendant from a second punishment in the form of a civil sanction that "may not fairly be characterized as remedial" because it is "overwhelmingly disproportionate to the damage the defendant has caused." As you know, the Halper decision was later overturned by Hudson.

Judge Roberts, do you consider the False Claims Act treble damages provisions to be excessive, in the words of the Court, "overwhelmingly disproportionate," and also in the words of the Court, "not fairly characterized as remedial"?

Judge Roberts. Well, you've touched on a case that's very close to my heart, Senator. It was the first case I argued before the Supreme Court. I was appointed by the Court to argue it on behalf of Mr. Halper.

It was an unusual case. It arose--the conspiracy at issue was a slight inflation of--I believe it was Medicare or Medicaid claims that this individual was submitting. I think he added $1 or $2 to every claim. And yet under the law at that time, there was a minimum penalty for each false claim. These numbers won't be right, but he had something like 300 false claims for a grand total of maybe $700, but under the statute, he was assessed a civil penalty of several million dollars because each of the false claims was a separate penalty.

And the issue was, after having been sentenced criminally, would a civil penalty of several--and, again, I'm not sure of the numbers, but several million dollars for $700 or so of fraud, was that remedial and civil or was it punishment? And the Court agreed with my submission at the time that that was punishment. It led to some difficulty, I think, in administering civil and criminal laws down the line, and as you said, 8 years later they reversed course and overruled the Halper precedent.

But the provision that you specifically mentioned, treble damages, that is a little different. There it's a much closer connection, obviously just 3 times whatever the damages are. In the Halper case, it was a much more disproportionate impact, and that's what led the Court, I think, to conclude that that looks like punishment. Treble damages is something that's familiar in the law in a number of areas and is not regarded as impermissible punishment in this context.

Senator Grassley. Are you familiar with the legal arguments that some opponents of the False Claims Act have made to the effect that its qui tam provisions are unconstitutional under Articles II and III, and if so, do you have an opinion on these arguments, and before you answer, I would like to remind you that at least since the first Congress was involved in this, I would like to assume that the Framers of the Constitution, because the First Congress enacted several qui tam statutes, that if that be any deference to you in giving--whether this factor would make any difference to you when assessing the constitutionality of qui tam statutes today.

Judge Roberts. I think, if my memory serves, that the Article III objections, and just so we're on the same page, the qui tam statutes, of course, are when a private individual brings suit on behalf of the government for fraud on the government and in return gets a percentage of the recovery. And as you noted, it's been under the False Claims Act very successful in securing recovery of funds on behalf of the government.

The Vermont case--and I'm not remembering it any more than that, it was a case from Vermont--I think addressed most of the Article III issues. The objection was that individual has no standing, I think, because he doesn't necessarily have an interest, and what the Court said was that the individual has standing as a result of the bounty, if you will, the percentage he gets. That satisfies the standing requirement, so those objections are out of the way.

I do know that some have raised additional objections under Article II, which goes to the fact that this might interfere with the executive's authority to execute the law. In other words, you have private individuals bringing suit. I'm not sure that those issues have been finally resolved, and obviously, if those cases do come up, I'll want to keep an open mind.

The fact that you mentioned, obviously, about historic practice, that is something that the Court does look to in assessing constitutionality. If it's something that the Founders were familiar with or a practice that they engaged in and showed no disagreement with, that, while not determinative, that is a factor that the Court would look at. I don't know if any of those cases are going to come before the Court, but if they do, it's one of the considerations that'll have to be taken into account.

Senator Grassley. Other than the Totten case and the Halper case, have you ever written or spoken publicly about the issue of the constitutionality of qui tams or any other provisions of the False Claims Act, to your memory?

Judge Roberts. I don't remember any, no, Senator.

Senator Grassley. Okay. Judge Roberts, in 1986, while serving as an Associate White House Counsel, you approved Reagan administration testimony regarding the Whistleblower Protection Act of 1986. You probably recall that the Reagan administration opposed that legislation, which is now law. Could you explain what role, if any, you had in formulating the administration's position on the Whistleblower Protection Act?

Judge Roberts. I don't recall any role, Senator. Our office--the Counsel's office would routinely review testimony that was about to be given. We were just looking out for particular constitutional concerns or issues. We generally did not get into the substance. The substance of that would have been shaped over in the Justice Department and we would have really been looking out for anything that we thought infringed on the constitutional authorities of the President or presented other consistency issues. But the substance of the testimony is not something I was involved in.

Senator Grassley. Do you feel that you have any bias against the False Claims Act or Whistleblower Protection Act that would impact on your ability to fairly decide cases on those statutes?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator. I have had some whistleblower cases, different aspects I do recall coming up in the Court of Appeals and I think in some cases, we ruled in favor and in some cases, we ruled against. So I have seen those cases and had no difficulty fairly and objectively deciding them.

Federal Jurisdiction – Implied Rights of Action

Senator Leahy. [After questioning on standing article:] But I read it also in conjunction with your brief that you wrote in 1991, when you were Kenneth Starr's political deputy.

This was in Franklin County v. Gwinnett Public Schools. Now, in that case, a girl, Christine Franklin, had been sexually harassed. She had been abused from the time she was in the 10th grade by a teacher and a sports coach. The school was aware of the sexual harassment but took no action, in fact they even encouraged her not to complain. The Office for Civil Rights at Department of Education investigated and found her rights were violated under Title IX of our Civil Rights Law; she had been physically abused; her right to complain about gender discrimination had been interfered with. You argued that she had no right to damages for this abuse. Now, your view was rejected by the Supreme Court. Justice White, in an opinion joined by Justice O'Connor and others wrote that you fundamentally misunderstood the law and history of the Court's role in providing appropriate remedy for such abuse, and that you had invited them to abdicate their historical judicial authority to award appropriate relief.

So do you now personally agree with and accept as binding law the reasoning of Justice White's opinion in Franklin?

Judge Roberts. well, it certainly is a precedent of the Court that I would apply under principles of stare decisis. The Government's position in that case, of course, in no way condoned the activities involved. The issue was an open one. The Courts of Appeals had ruled the same way that the Government had argued before the Supreme Court, and it arose because we were dealing with an implied right of action, in other words, right of action under the statute that courts had implied. The reason that there was difficulty in determining exactly what remedies were available is because Congress had not addressed that question. The remedies that were available, as we explained, included issues such as restitution, back pay, injunctive relief, and the open issue, again, was whether damages were available. The Supreme Court issued its ruling and cleared that up.

Senator Leahy. But here in a case, I mean it is a pretty egregious case, you have--and I am sure that you in no way condone what happened to this young girl, but I mean it was awful. She would be taken out of class by this teacher, brought to another room, basically raped. And Justice White made it very clear, contrary to what you and Kenneth Starr had said, that she had a right for actions because of that abuse.

Now, do you feel that they were acting, even though it went different than what you had argued, do you feel the Court's opinion is based on sound reasoning?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't want to say--

Senator Leahy. Do you think it is a solid precedent?

Judge Roberts. It is a solid--it's a precedent of the Court. It was, as you say, a unanimous precedent. It concerned an issue of statutory interpretation because it was unclear whether Congress had intended a particular remedy to be available or not. That was the question before the Court. The Court of Appeals had ruled one way. The Supreme Court ruled the other way.

The administration's position was based on the principle that the decision about the remedy of back pay was a decision that should be made by Congress and not the Court. The Court saw the case the other, and that issue is now settled, and those damages actions are brought in courts around the country.

Senator Leahy. But I wonder if we are balancing angels on the head of a pin. What kind of back pay was this teenage student going to be seeking? What kind of--

Judge Roberts. Senator, there--

Senator Leahy. What kind of injunction? Is she going to do it after she graduated? Would she seek that kind of injunction? I mean I--you know, as a parent, and you are a parent, I mean I just wonder are we saying that we will put up a block for people who have really justiciable reasons to be in court?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator. Again, there was no issue in the case about condoning the behavior. I found it abhorrent then. I find it abhorrent now. That's not the issue. The issue in the case is did Congress intend for this particular remedy to be available? Other remedies were available under the provision at issue, and the question is, was this remedy available?

Senator Leahy. The back pay.

Judge Roberts. Restitution and injunction to prohibit the harmful activity. Again, the issue arose because Congress had not spelled out whether there was a right of action in the first place or what the components of that right of action should be. The issue—

Senator Sessions. … On the Gwinnett case, the Title IX, the women's education case, the position you took that would deny the right to sue a State entity, a Government entity for money damages, was that not a position consistent with the position of the Court of Appeals that had written the only opinion on that subject?

Judge Roberts. Yes, that was the Court of Appeals position.

Senator Sessions. So you, in advocating that position, were expressing a view that was the view of the highest Federal Court in the land at that time?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Feingold. . . . As you know, 42 U.S.C. 1983 is a Federal law that allows Americans to sue those who deprive them of their rights under the Constitution or Federal statutes. Section 1983 is a very important law because it has enabled individuals who are deprived of their rights to such things as Medicaid, public housing, child support enforcement, and public assistance to enforce those rights in Federal court. And I am a little concerned that you seem to have consistently argued for making it harder to bring Section 1983 lawsuits. In briefs you have filed, you advanced a series of arguments to effectively reverse decades of Supreme Court decisions and restrict Americans' ability to enforce Federal statutory rights under Section 1983.

As Deputy Solicitor General, you co-authored an amicus brief and argued in front of the Supreme Court in a case called Wilder v. Virginia Hospital Association. You said that individual Medicaid providers should not be able to sue under Section 1983 to enforce a provision of the Medicaid statute which requires States to reimburse them for services at reasonable rates. One of the arguments you made is that in order for a statutory right to be enforceable under Section 1983, the Court must find that the Congress clearly intended "to authorize private enforcement of that right in Federal court." You repeated this argument in another case you later argued when you were in private practice, Gonzaga University v. Doe.

The Supreme Court rejected your arguments in Wilder and found that the Medicaid providers could sue. In the later Gonzaga case, the Supreme Court specifically rejected your argument and found that it was not necessary for plaintiffs in a 1983 case to show that Congress intended to create a private right of action to bring a lawsuit and Section 1983 already supplies a cause of action.

What role did you play in deciding that the Government would participate as amicus in the Wilder case? And what role did you play in developing the argument that it made? And did you agree with the position that the Government took in the case?

Judge Roberts. Well, I'll answer that question, but before I do so, the position I advanced in the Gonzaga case prevailed. The argument that we made on behalf of the university--I was obviously representing the university's position, and they prevailed before the Supreme Court.

In the Wilder case, the determination to participate as an amicus was made by the Solicitor General, and I don't recall a particular role in that case. I worked on the brief. I presented the argument. We lost that case 5-4. It was a close issue. All of these issues go to the question of what Congress intended to do. If Congress had spelled out whether or not a right should be enforceable in Court, that is what the determination would be in Court. These issues arise only because of confusion over whether or not Congress has spelled out that a right should be enforceable in Federal court for damages or not. And in the Wilder case, the Court determined 5-4 that the right should be enforceable in Federal court. We were as an amicus supporting one of the States. I don't remember which one it was. And the State was making the argument that there is--the right is--the issue in all of these cases is whether the right should be enforceable administratively as opposed to--

Senator Feingold. Excuse me. I am just about to run out of time. Let me point out the Supreme Court did not accept the argument that the plaintiffs had to show that Congress intended to create a private right of action. And I am wondering now, Do you now agree with the argument that you have consistently made, both as a Government lawyer in Wilder and while in private practice in Gonzaga, that individuals should not be able to sue under Section 1983 to enforce a right unless the Supreme Court finds that Congress clearly intended to authorize private enforcement of that particular right in Federal court?

Judge Roberts. Well, the Gonzaga decision, which resulted--there were various arguments made in the brief. The ruling of the Court was in favor of the university that I was representing. And the determination in the Gonzaga case about what should be shown and what has to be shown is one of the precedents of the Court that I would follow, as any other, consistent with rules of stare decisis. That's not an area in which I have any particular view. I've argued both sides of that issue. On behalf of plaintiffs, I argued in favor of it, and on behalf of defendants, against it.

Again, the issue is not the enforceability, as in Gonzaga. The issue was should individuals be allowed to bring suit as opposed to action by, in that case, the Department of Education.

Senator Coburn. The other thing, yesterday, you had an exchange with Senator Feingold on a case, and I think it was the Gonzaga case. You talked about Congressional intent. I would like you for a moment to spend a minute giving us your opinion, and you may refuse to do so if you care to, that would be your privilege, but one of my observations is that oftentimes, we don't do a very good job with the laws that we write because we are not very clear. Sometimes we are lazy. Sometimes we are politically expedient. But oftentimes, the very problems that you as a Court make controversial decisions over are because we have not done a good job.

I would just like your thoughts as to if you were to critique things that we could do better to make your job easier and clearer, what would you have to say to that?

Judge Roberts. Well, sitting where I am, I am not terribly inclined to be critical of the Congress--

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. --and wouldn't be in any event. But a lot of what judges spend their time doing, not always in the momentous constitutional cases that we've been talking about, but sometimes in very mundane cases, is the effort to discern Congressional intent, trying to figure out what Congress meant when it used specific words that were passed by both Houses and signed by the President into law.

Now, some of that is entirely unavoidable. The complexity of human endeavor is such that situations are going to arise that are not clearly answered by even the most specific language, and that's to be expected and judges have to address those situations.

But as you suggest yourself in your question, there are situations where sometimes Congress punts the issue to the courts. They can't come to an agreement about how a particular provision should be applied, and so folks who wanted to go one way and folks who wanted to go the other way just sort of leave it ambiguous or leave it out and take their chances in court.

Obviously, that's a different situation. I think all judges would tell you that to the extent Congress can address the issues and resolve the issues that are the policy questions entrusted to them, it makes it a lot easier for the courts to decide the cases that do come up because then it's just a question of looking at the facts and the law is clear and you apply the facts to the law. If the law is unclear, that makes it that much more difficult.

As I said, obviously, a lot of these situations are unavoidable, but there are certainly--and the Supreme Court has addressed many of these, the issue of implied rights of action in the past, and they were doing case after case after case and they finally adopted an approach in the early 1980s that said, look, we're not going to imply rights of action anymore. Congress, if you want somebody to have a right of action, just say so. But this is not a good thing for the courts to be doing, deciding whether a particular right of action should be implied or not.

And after the Court developed that jurisprudence in the early 1980s, the hope was, and I think it has been realized to a large extent, that there will be more addressing of that question in Congress, which is where it should be addressed.

Senator Coburn. And you would agree, we could do a better job?

Judge Roberts. Well, I'm sure everyone is doing as good a job as they can--

DOJ_NMG_0035777

Senator Coburn. That is the first answer I worry about that you given through the whole testimony.

[Laughter.]

Senator Leahy. When we left off the other day, you and I were discussing the Supreme Court's decision in the Christine Franklin Title IX case. This, for those who may have forgotten, is the case of very, very serious sexual abuse of a young girl by her teacher. It makes your skin crawl just to hear the facts of it.

Now, Justice White's opinion for the Supreme Court rejected your arguments, your technical legal arguments. You had argued she should not be allowed to sue for damages. He wrote, "From the earliest years of the Republic, the Court has recognized the power of the judiciary to award appropriate remedies to redress injuries actionable in Federal court." He went on to note that, "To disallow a damages remedy in this case would be to abdicate our historic judicial authority to aware appropriate relief in cases brought in our court system."

And then, most tellingly, Justice White wrote that your argument that Christine Franklin's remedy should be limited to back pay and injunction, a position you had reiterated a couple days ago, he said that conflicts with sound logic. He went on to say it is clearly inadequate. And he wrote that back pay does nothing for her and that prospective relief accords her no remedies at all.

Now, the reason I raise this case is not that it is one of those rare ones where you were on the losing side, but I raise it because I felt it was a case about what our courts should do, including doing justice and remedying rights and protecting Americans.

So my question to you is this: Do you now recognize that the Supreme Court's view in the case as set forth in Justice White's opinion was the right one and the positions of the United States in your brief were the wrong ones?

Judge Roberts. Well, as a judge looking at it, obviously when you lose a case, as you point out, 9-0, it's a pretty clear signal that the legal position you were advocating was the wrong one. The position the administration took in that case was the same position that the court of appeals had taken. In other words, what the Supreme Court did was reverse the lower court, so--

Senator Leahy. Well, I--

Judge Roberts. I'm just explaining why the position we took prior to the decision may have looked different than it did after the decision.

Senator Leahy. And I understand that. I thought I sort of laid that out earlier. But my question is: Do you now accept that Justice White's position was right and that the Government's position was wrong?

Judge Roberts. Well, I certainly accept the decision of the Court, the 9-0 decision, as you say, as a binding precedent of the Court and, again, have no cause or agenda to revisit it or any quarrel with it. The issue, of course, was the one of what remedies are available for an implied cause of action. The reason I think that the lower courts came out the other way and the Supreme Court came out one way is that you're dealing with an implied cause of action. In other words, it hasn't been spelled out and--

Senator Leahy. But I think the Supreme Court was looking and acting, as they felt, within the law for an area that would actually bring justice. That was basically my point. It may have been implied, but they looked within the case, they looked within the law, and they found an area to bring justice. And I realize hard cases sometimes make not the best law, but I think this case is a hard case but it made good law. Would you agree?

Judge Roberts. I have no quarrel with the Court's decision, Senator.

Senator Leahy. You have been involved a great deal in the development of the Supreme Court authority limiting the ability of individual Americans to ensure they actually receive the rights and protections that Congress has mandated under Spending Clauses. In the Reagan administration, you advocated legislative responses to Maine v. Thiboutot. That is how the Supreme Court tells me it is pronounced. It is not how those of us who live with those of French-Canadian descent might say it. But you strongly criticize--that was a case that recognized broad access to courts to vindicate your rights under Federal law. You criticized the damage supposedly caused by that case in a 1982 memo. And then you wrote briefs and argued before the Supreme Court in the 1980s and the 1990s. We talked about some of these--South Dakota v. Dole, Wilder v. Virginia Hospital, Suter v. Artist M., Gonzaga University v. Doe. And you called for the narrowing of Congress' spending powers and limiting the right of individuals to sue to compel the protections Congress required under Federal law.

I worry about this if an individual loses their right to sue if the State or the administration, whoever the administration might be, doesn't protect their rights. For example, if the only remedy for a State's refusal to live up to its obligations under a spending power enactment, like Medicaid or another such program, is action by the Federal Government, and the Federal Government doesn't act, where does that leave the rule of law? Where does that leave America's sense of justice if an individual can't then step in and seek action?

Judge Roberts. Well, two points, Senator. The issue in the Spending Clause cases that you refer to--Wilder, the later one, the Suter case, and the Gonzaga case that I argued when I was in private practice--the issue is one of congressional intent. The question is: Did Congress intend there to be a private right of action? That's what the courts are trying to figure out. And if Congress did intend there to be a private right of action, if Congress intended this to be actionable whether through 1983 or under--Section 1983 or under the law itself, then there would be a private right of action. In some cases, Congress doesn't intend that, and in those cases, there wouldn't be. I would say--

Senator Leahy. But--no, go ahead.

Judge Roberts. I was just going to make the point that in those cases, of course, I was advocating a position for a client. I did have occasion as a judge to address a Spending Clause case. It was a case called Barber v. Washington Metropolitan Area--

Senator Leahy. But that one, the statute was pretty darn clear, the Metro case.

Judge Roberts. Well, it was a 2-1 decision, divided decision on a court that doesn't often issue 2-1 decisions. There was a lengthy dissent saying that Congress did not have the authority to require the Metro--

Senator Leahy. Judge Sentelle dissented?

Judge Roberts. Judge Sentelle dissented.

Senator Leahy. I read that. I don't want to go into that. He is not here before us. But what I worry about, though, is the trend of these to say that Congress intended these programs, more like Medicaid, commitments there to be kind of an exclusive bargain between the Federal Government and the State government. And that raises a question in my mind. Do the courts really think we have made empty promises? I thought of this the other night because I remember what you said about the empty promises of the Soviet constitution. But wouldn't it be an indication we were making the same kind of empty promises if individuals can't sue if they are left as innocent bystanders who are harmed, but they have no remedy if the State is negligent in acting or if the Federal Government doesn't protect it? I mean, why shouldn't they be able to sue to get the promises that are made in these bills so that it is not like the Soviet constitution, great promises but empty?

Judge Roberts. Well, the issue is not whether they should be able to sue or not. The issue is whether Congress intended them to be able to sue or not. The issue doesn't even come up if Congress would simply spell out in the legislation we intended these individuals to have the right to sue in Federal court. That would prevent the issue from even coming up.

All of those cases we have been talking about arose because Congress did not address the question, and, therefore, the courts--

Senator Leahy. Yes, but Congress assumes the States and the Federal Government are going to do what the law spells out. We don't do it as an empty promise. We assume they are going to do it. When they don't do it, if you are developmentally disabled, Medicaid kids, foster kids, rape victims and so on, shouldn't they be able to have a voice?

Judge Roberts. Well, if Congress wants them to sue, all Congress has to do is write one sentence saying, "Individuals harmed by a violation of this statute may bring a right of action in Federal court." There are laws where Congress says that, and that question never comes up.

The issue in the various cases that we have been talking about, including in the Barber case, where I ruled that the individual did have the right to sue when I was judge, the issue is, What did Congress intend? And all too often that issue is not even addressed. I don't know whether it's because of inadvertence or it's because of an inability of Congress to agree, and they both sort of--both sides sort of say, well, let's let the courts figure it out.

Senator Leahy. Well, maybe it is an assumption of those of us who take an oath of office here to uphold the laws that the State government, those officials who take similar oaths of office, or the administrators in the national government who take similar oaths of office are actually going to do what they have sworn to do.

Judge Roberts. Well--

Senator Leahy. Let me--can I move on? Because it also goes to--and I understand your point on this, and we could probably debate this all morning long. But I hope you understand my concern, which is a concern of lot of American people in this area.

Let's go to another precedent that moved me a great deal, Gideon v. Wainwright. As a young law student, I had an opportunity--my wife and I had an opportunity to have lunch with Hugo Black shortly after that, one of the most memorable times I had. He was a former Senator. He recognized the Sixth Amendment's guarantee to counsel in a criminal case was a fundamental right to a fair trial. He called it an obvious truth that in an adversary system of criminal justice, any person hauled into court who was too poor to hire a lawyer cannot be assured a fair trial unless counsel is provided for him. There is a wonderful book, "Gideon's Trumpet," that Anthony Lewis wrote.

Doesn't Gideon stand for the principle that to be meaningful such a fundamental right as the right to counsel requires assurances that can be exercised?

Judge Roberts. Yes, I think so. I have often said that a lot of these difficulties, particularly in the area of legal errors being raised and collateral review, a lot of those difficult questions could be avoided if people had competent counsel from the very beginning.

Senator Leahy. Well, doesn't the same principle embodied in Gideon, that the Constitution guarantees a person's ability to exercise fundamental constitutional rights, doesn't that apply to other constitutional rights? I mean, to be meaningful, if we have these rights, they have also got to be real in people's lives.

Judge Roberts. Well, I think the basic instinct and genius behind the Gideon decision was that without counsel to protect people's rights, they were going to forfeit them. They were going to waive them due to ignorance or inability to appreciate the proceedings, and that is why you need counsel at that stage. It is not simply because you have a right to counsel in the abstract. It was the recognition that having counsel is a way to ensure the protection of your other rights that you may not even be aware of.

Senator Leahy. That could be with a lot of our rights. I mean we have got to be meaningful. You cannot just say you have them. I am really struck by your discussion of the Soviet Constitution. I totally agree with you on that, but we have 280 million Americans of all different economic and educational backgrounds and everything else; we have wonderful rights. Our Bill of Rights is, I think, one of the most amazing things ever written by a democratic people. But the rights are only there if they are meaningful in people's lives, that they can be enforced. And ultimately it may come right down to the courts.

Judge Roberts. Well, I think--

Senator Leahy. I mean Hugo Black's opinion is a pretty strong opinion.

Senator Feinstein. . . . Senator Kennedy engaged you in, I think, a substantive discussion on the civil rights issue, and you did let a little bit of the man come through, and I commend you for that. Thank you very much.

Let me talk about Gonzaga for a minute, because if I understand it, you argued that the Spending Clauses are not the supreme law of the land but should be viewed as contracts between the Federal Government and the States, right?

Judge Roberts. No.

Senator Feinstein. Okay.

Judge Roberts. It was not a dispute about it being the supreme law of the land. There is no dispute about that, that when Congress passes legislation, under the Supremacy Clause it's the supreme law of the land.

The question is what remedies are available. It's a very simple problem. You folks give money to the States, and you say you can spend this money on educational programs. But if you accept our money, you have to do this, this, and this.

Senator Feinstein. Right.

Judge Roberts. And the question is, well, what happens if somebody comes into court and says they accepted the money, Congress said if you take our money you have to do this, they didn't do it, they violated my rights under this provision, what happens then?

Now, in many cases, Congress will say if these rights are violated, you can sue in court and you can make that State institution--in this case, not a State institution, a private university. The same thing, they've accepted the funds. You can make them pay damages. But in other cases, the argument is, well, the condition was imposed by the Federal Government, and the Federal Government should enforce any violations. And you don't necessarily have the right to sue for damages. That's the question.

It's an issue that would never come up if Congress would say in each law if you violate this provision, you can sue in Federal court, or you can't sue in Federal court. Or as in this case, we are going to set up an office in the Department of Education that is going to police compliance, and if you violate this provision, that office is going to come down on the university and make them comply, make them do whatever they need to do to get back into compliance.

There's no dispute that the university in this case is bound by the condition. The question is: Does an individual who's harmed by their violation get to sue about it? And sometimes it comes out that they can, as in the Wilder case. Sometimes it comes out that they can't. The determination is that Congress did not intend there to be a private lawsuit to enforce that. And that was the conclusion in the Gonzaga case.

Senator Feinstein. Well, let me ask you: Do you believe that State obligations created by Congress through the Spending Clause are enforceable by citizens in the courts?

Judge Roberts. Well, the answer there is it depends on that law. In Gonzaga what the Court determined was that provision at issue there was not enforceable by private citizens in the courts. It was enforceable by the Federal Government. The Federal Government can cut off the funds. More likely, the Federal Government can enforce the provision through proceedings against the university.

In the Wilder case, a different statute, the Court determined the condition in that case, the Medicare--or Medicaid funding case was enforceable, a private citizen could go into court because the review of Congress' intent in that case came out differently than it did in the Gonzaga case.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you. Well, let me just finish this quickly. I am not a lawyer and I don't really know how to ask this question, but let me try. When is it a contract and when is it the law? Because if it is a contract, that affects a whole host of laws that we pass that are very important--Medicaid, Title IX, No Child Left Behind, even the Internet Protection Act, all of these things. So when does a contract attach?

Judge Roberts. It's always a contract, and sometimes if the intent of Congress is that private parties be allowed to sue, it's more than a contract. But it's always at least a contract.

Senator Feinstein. So the intent has to be a specific intent.

Judge Roberts. It doesn't--no, the courts don't require that. They don't require that you specifically say you have the right to sue. But the Court has to look at it and try to figure out did you intend--when you put this provision in, did you intend private parties to be able to sue for damages? Or did you expect the Department of Education to enforce that and have the authority to cut off the funds or to impose other conditions because a university is violating it? And as I've said, some cases come out one way, and some cases come out the other way. But in each of those cases, what the Court is trying to do is figure out what you, the Congress, meant in that statute.

Senator Feinstein. I think my time is up. Thank you very much. Thank you.

Federal Jurisdiction – Jurisdiction-stripping

Senator Kohl. Judge Roberts, as you know, over the last two decades or so, there have been several bills introduced in Congress to strip the Supreme Court and all other Federal courts of their jurisdiction over many issues. These bills are generally sponsored by people who are unhappy with various court decisions, including decisions on things like school prayer, remedies for school desegregation, and even a woman's right to choose.

While you served in the Justice Department and in the White House Counsel's Office in the Reagan administration in the 1980s, you did state that you believed that bills stripping the Court's jurisdiction were constitutionally permissible. Do you still hold this view? Do you think it is the right way for us to go, to allow legislatures to strip your authority to review cases?

Judge Roberts. Well, I know the memos to which you're referring make the point, answer your second question. I said that they were a bad idea. They were bad policy.

I'd been asked earlier when I was--back in 1981, I believe, when I was working in the Attorney General's office, to present to him an affirmative case for the proposition that these proposals were constitutional. He was getting an opinion that they were unconstitutional. He had to make that decision for the Department's position. He wanted me to argue the other side and I did. I prepared a memorandum presenting the best argument I could that these proposals were constitutional.

The two memos to which you refer in the White House where I suggested I thought they were suggest that my memo persuaded me, if nobody else. The Attorney General adopted instead the contrary position. And I think my views may have had something to do with the proximity to my own advocacy at the time.

As I say, I did say they were a bad policy. The reason I thought they were a bad policy is because they lead to a situation where there's arguable inconsistency and disuniformity in Federal law. If you don't have the Supreme Court with jurisdiction to address that, then you get different decisions, and that's bad policy.

If I were to look at the question today, to be honest with you, I don't know where I would come out. I think one of the questions I would have is whether these concerns I had that I labeled as policy concerns might more appropriately be considered legal arguments, in other words, not a policy dispute but a legal argument.

That's the way the opinion of the Office of Legal Counsel that the Attorney General agreed with viewed it. They said these--the fact of disuniformity and inconsistency is a legal argument against the constitutionality. It's not simply a bad policy decision. I'm not sure where I would regard that determination today.

Senator Kohl. Really? Are you saying that you're not sure where you would come out if you were faced with the decision to go along with or to fight legislative attempts to take away the Court's authority?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't think--on the question of legislative attempts, I think my view is the same now as it was 24 years ago, which is that these are--it's a bad idea. It's bad policy.

I was talking about the other question about whether it's constitutional or not, and on that, of course, I don't think I should express a determinative view because, as you know, these proposals do come up and one may be enacted, and if that is the case, then

I'd have to address that question on the court. It could be on the court I'm on now or another court.

Senator Kohl. Well, in that case, or in this case, your heart might tell you that it's a bad idea. Your mind might tell you it is constitutional.

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't know what my mind would tell me--

Senator Kohl. I mean, theoretically. It is possible.

Judge Roberts. Yes, but I feel comfortable with the conclusion, as I was 24 years ago, that it's a bad idea. They're bad policy.

Senator Brownback. . . . [discussing checks and balances on the Court] There is also another area that you wrote about when you were working within the Reagan administration and that was the ability of Congress to limit the authority and the review of the courts, of what you would have, and I want to look at that in particular. It is the power to define jurisdiction that we would have. It is in Article III, section 2, and I just want to read this because I do not think it is well understood as the check and balance, and I want to get your reaction to it. This is Article III, section 2, "In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction." No question there.

It goes on: "In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make."

That phrase, you know, is known as the Exceptions Clause. You wrote about this when you were in the Reagan White House, about this Exceptions Clause, and you stated this: "It stands as a plenary grant of power to Congress to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The clause, by its terms, contains no limit"--these are your words, and "this clear and unequivocal language is the strongest argument in favor of congressional power and the inevitable stumbling block for those who would read the clause in a more restrictive fashion."

Now, I also understand that you also argued on policy grounds this is not a good idea for the Congress to do, but would you agree with those earlier statements that you made about the nature of this power being a plenary power of the Congress, and stands as a clear standard in favor of the Congress to be able to limit the jurisdiction of the Courts?

Judge Roberts. Well, you know, Senator, that that writing was done at the request of the Attorney General, and he asked me specifically to present the arguments in favor of that power. He was receiving from elsewhere in the Department a memorandum saying that this was unconstitutional, the exercise of that authority. He wanted to see the other view before making up his mind for the Department, so I was tasked to present the arguments in favor of constitutionality. And as you say, they focus and start with the language in the Constitution, the Exceptions Clause, which is as you read it, and I went on to explain that it had been interpreted in the famous case of Ex parte McCardle around the time of the Civil War, which seemed to suggest that the Framers meant what that language says on its face. Also though, a later case, United States v. Klein suggested that there were limits on the power of Congress in this area.

It is a central debate among legal scholars, the scope of that authority. The argument on the other side, the one that the Attorney General adopted, rather than the argument he asked me to present, is that it is the essential function of the Supreme Court to provide uniformity and consistency in Federal law, and that if you carve out exceptions in its constitutional area, that you deprive it of that ability and that that itself violates the constitutional scheme. It's an area in which most distinguished scholars line up on either side because it does call into question basic relationships between the Congress and the Courts.

Senator Brownback. Could that language be any clearer though in the Exceptions Clause? I mean I understand how legal scholars maybe can debate what a single word means, but that language is pretty clear, is it not?

Judge Roberts. The argument on the other side says that it's intended to apply to--well, for example, we have clear situations in the lower Federal Courts like the amount-in-controversy, those cases are excluded. You can have rules about timing. The question is whether it was intended to address for constitutional areas or simply more administrative matters.

The argument on the other side says if you get into the core constitutional areas, that undermines the Supreme Court's authority that the Framers didn't intend that.

Senator Brownback. Then what check is there on the Court's power?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think the primary check is the same one that Alexander Hamilton talked about in the Federalist Papers, because the exact argument was raising in the debates about the Constitution. People were concerned about a new Judiciary, what was it going to do? They were concerned that it might deprive them of their rights. And of course, Hamilton's famous answer was that Judiciary was going to be the least dangerous branch because it had no power. It didn't have the sword. It didn't have the purse. And the judges were not going to be able to deprive people of their liberty because they were going to be bound down by rules and precedents. They were going to just interpret the law. And if judges just interpreted the law, there was no threat to liberty from the Judicial Branch.

So I would say the primary check on the courts has always been judicial self-restraint, and a recognition on the part of judges that they have a limited task, that they are insulated from the people. They're given life tenure, as you mentioned, precisely because they're not shaping policy. They're not supposed to be responsive. They're supposed to just interpret the law.

Senator Brownback. I guess that is the area that has so many people concerned, is that the Judiciary does not show restraint, and judicial restraint is the limitation on the courts, such as in the Takings Clause we just had really, where the Court is saying, "Well, no, this is a broader power." But if you do not restrain yourselves, then who does within this system? Obviously there are restraints on the Congress, there are restraints on the President. We like that system. We want that check and balance system. I think the Framers put that Exceptions Clause and other things in there for clear purpose, for clear reason.

Let me take you on to another area because that one I think you are going to see a lot of action as you get pushing back and forth between the three branches of Government, and a number of people feeling like the Judiciary has not show judicial restraint in recent years.

Federal Jurisdiction – Standing, Advisory Opinions

Senator Leahy. I hope you feel that way. I know the people who spoke of the First Amendment, it is not there to protect popular speech, that is easy, it is unpopular speech. And as I mentioned yesterday, our State really wanted to make sure the Bill of Rights was going to be there before we joined the union.

Let me switch gears a bit. In the area of environmental protection, I feel that you have narrowly construed laws in the Constitution in a way that closed the courthouse doors to millions of parents who want to protect their children from dangerous air pollution or unsafe drinking water, fish contaminated with mercury, foods covered with pesticides. We all know that often the President, no matter who is President, and the local governments do not do enough to protect people in environmental areas, from environmental dangers, and we have given them protection, the Congress has.

I thought your Duke Law Journal, which many have commented about in the press and otherwise, was somewhat dismissive regarding these citizen suits to protect the environment. You wrote that Congress may not ask the courts in effect to exercise oversight of responsibility at the behest of any John Q. Public who happens to be interested in the issue. You discount the interests that many citizens and Congress have in preserving our environment. A few years ago--you sound very much like Justice Scalia--I know a few years ago, the Supreme Court, over the dissent of Justice Scalia, ruled that a citizen living near a stream that had been polluted by many illegal discharges of mercury from an upstream company did have the right to go to court over these illegal mercury discharges. The Government was not enforcing the laws.

So I ask you this. People, if their President or their Governor fails to enforce these laws, why should not individuals have access to courts where polluting companies could be made to pay for their wrongdoing? What can you tell us to assure us, parents or children who are worried about this from birth defects and all, all of us, what can you do to assure us that they as individuals who under Chief Justice Roberts find the courthouse door slammed shut in their face?

Judge Roberts. Well, one thing I would tell them to do is read the rest of the Duke Law Journal article, because one thing it makes--point it makes is that environmental interests, it goes on to say aesthetic interests, those are all protected under the law, and that one reason courts should insist that those who bring suit have standing--that's the issue--that are actually injured, is because standing can encompass certainly environmental harms. The issue that was being addressed in the Duke Law Journal article was whether anyone could bring a lawsuit just because they are interested in the issue, or whether the plaintiffs had to show that they had been injured. In other words, in your hypothetical, the people who are downstream from the mercury pollution, they will be able to show that they are injured and can bring suit.

The question is whether somebody halfway across the country who's not injured by that act should be able to bring suit. That was the issue in the—

Senator DeWine. As you know, Judge, our Constitution created Federal courts with limited powers. In fact, Article III of the Constitution only gives the Federal courts the power to decide cases and controversies. This case and controversy requirement means that Federal courts will only hear real lawsuits involving real parties with real injuries. We have talked about this in the last several days.

This has led to the development of a number of different rules about when people can bring lawsuits in Federal court and when they cannot. One of these rules, as you well know, is the principle of standing.

You talked about this in 1993 in a law review article you wrote in the Duke Law Journal. You said the following, and I am going to quote briefly from this. "The legitimacy of an unelected life-tenured judiciary in our democratic republic is bolstered by the constitutional limitation of that judiciary's power in Article III to actual cases and controversies." You went on later to state the following. "The Article III standing requirement ensures that the court is carrying out its function of deciding a case or controversy rather than fulfilling the executive's responsibility of taking care that the laws be faithfully executed," end of quote.

Judge, could you elaborate on your statements today and maybe explain briefly what the doctrine of standing is and what that doctrine is really so important to our constitutional system?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, your question really brings--ties together a few things we've already touched on.

I don't remember if it was you or someone else who referenced Justice White's description of his obligation, what it was, and his answer was, "To decide cases."

That was me. And the basis for the institution of judicial review, as explained by Chief Justice John Marshall in Marbury v. Madison is similarly grounded on the obligation to decide cases and controversies, because if you look at the Constitution it doesn't say in Article III that the Judicial Branch is established in order to tell us all what the Constitution means. It says that the Judicial Branch is established to decide cases and controversies arising under this Constitution and the laws.

And that is the basis for the authority to interpret the Constitution. As Marshall explained, we have to decide a case. If the argument is that it's inconsistent with the Constitution, we have to decide that. Therefore, we have that authority, and I believe that's consistent with the intent of the Framers.

But it does mean--and this is the point I was trying to make in that small little Law Review comment--that judges should be very careful to make sure they've got a real case or controversy before them, because that is the sole basis for the legitimacy of them acting in the manner they do in a democratic republic. They're not accountable to the people. As judges they have the obligation to decide cases according to the rule of law.

So first make sure you've got a real case, and a real case is not simply, you know, I'm interested in this area, I don't like what the Government's doing or I don't like this law, and so I'm going to go to court. What the standing doctrine requires is that you actually be injured by what the Government is doing, injured by Congress's action. Now, the injury doesn't have to be economic. The Supreme Court has explained in cases like Sierra Club v. Morton, it can be aesthetic, it can be environmental, it can cover a wide range of injuries, but you do have to show some injury that separates you from the general public, so you're just not voicing a gripe, you're trying to get a case decided. That's the importance of the standing doctrine.

Senator DeWine. Appreciate the explanation, Judge.

Senator Cornyn. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I will not dwell on this any more about the numbers of questions asked, but I know we are now up to about 66 questions that you have responded to on the role of a judge and your judicial philosophy, 48 on civil rights and discrimination, 44 on abortion and privacy.

Let me ask you this, if we keep asking the same question over and over and over again, but try to approach it from a slightly different way to get you to answer a question that you do not feel you can ethically answer, are you going to give us a different answer, or are you going to give us the same answer?

Judge Roberts. I hope my answer would be the same, Senator.

Senator Cornyn. I am sure that is the case. We talked about the Code of Judicial Conduct and your ethical obligation. We have talked about the practical aspects of being a judge and the importance. And I guess this is not just practical. It is really a constitutional duty that judges have to maintain judicial independence, even from the Legislative Branch, by making commitments of performance in office as a condition to your confirmation.

But I want to also ask you what I would, I guess for lack of a better phrase, practical reasons why it is hard if not impossible, even if a judge wanted to, to be able to accurately predict how you might decide a particular matter. I was interested to hear Senator Biden earlier ask you about right-to-die issues, and you said, "I can't answer the question in the abstract," and he said, "That's not abstract, that's real." And you said, "Well, Senator, as a legal matter it is abstract because the question would be in any particular case, is there a law that applies that governs that decision?"

That prompted me to think of in addition to, as I think Senator DeWine asked you about, the case or controversy limitation in Article III of the Constitution, that limits the manner in which you might reach a particular issue, so it requires a case for controversy. He talked about standing and the importance of litigants actually having a stake in the outcome so they are willing to fight hard in the adversarial process.

Could you explain, for example, why the adversarial process is so important? And it is important for judges to make sure that people have an actual stake in the outcome, rather than, let us say--well, I know Senator Brownback, Senator Coburn, all of us get letters from constituents that say, "What is your position on the Base Realignment and Closing Commission?" And why we just cannot write judges letters and ask what your opinion is just sort of for an advisory capacity.

Judge Roberts. Well, that actually goes back very far in our history, as you know, to the early states when John Jay, I believe, as the first Chief Justice, was asked for his opinion on a matter, and he made the determination that it would be inappropriate to give that kind of advice. It was really one of the leading historical episodes that contributed to implementing the separation of powers. I think he appreciated that if he started just giving advice on legal questions that were of concern to the President, that he would be acting more like an Attorney General and it wouldn't be separated from the Executive. And then he would be in a position of giving the President advice, while at the same time ruling on the legality of his conduct. I think the reason John Jay decided that was not appropriate for these new judges on the new Supreme Court to give advisory opinions is because he appreciated that they were in the Judicial Department, as the Constitution put it, not in the Executive Department, or if the advice, request for advice had come from the Legislature. It's an important part of the separation of powers that our courts don't give advisory opinions.

Now, some State courts do have a different system of separation of powers, and in some State courts the Supreme Court will give an advisory opinion, but the Federal rule has always been that you have to have a constitutional case or controversy.

Senator Cornyn. Is that a constitutional limitation?

Judge Roberts. It's in Article III, yes.

Senator Cornyn. I mean it is not something you can take or leave?

Judge Roberts. No. The requirement of an actual case or controversy is derived from the Constitution. There are some aspects of standing doctrine that are, they say, prudential, in other words, that it's up to the Court whether to apply them or not, but the core requirement, that the litigants have a stake in the issue, a case or controversy, is a constitutional requirement.

Senator Cornyn. In getting back to Senator Biden's question about right to die, and what you believe or what your position would be if that were to come before the Court. It just occurred to me you would have to determine whether there was in fact a case or controversy, whether there was actually a person that had standing, that is, with a concrete stake in the outcome that brought the lawsuit, so as to preserve that adversarial process. It would, I imagine, if you are sitting as an appellate judge, either in the Circuit Court or Supreme Court, you would want to look and see what the evidence is, and maybe, for example, whether it would make any difference in a right-to-die case whether someone had a living will or not, and what the evidence was in the court below before you could really sort of make a pronouncement from on high, that, yes, right to die trumps everything.

Judge Roberts. Well, it's hard to know whether it trumps something until you know what the other something is, and that includes what the legislation might be. I've had many questions before this Committee about the importance of deferring to the legislature in areas in which Congress is given authority under the Constitution.

Well, as a judge, before I would propound the idea of right, that it does not matter what the issue is on the other side, I would like to know if a legislature had addressed that issue. Now, sometimes, as you know, legislatures can exceed their constitutional bounds and there are rights under the Constitution that individuals have that trump efforts by the legislature to address those or infringe upon them, but you need to know what the issue is in terms of the conflict between an asserted right and an asserted power of the legislature. I do not think members of a legislative body would accept the principle that you would decide a case like that without even knowing what the legislature had enacted or what the issue was or why they had decided that this was an appropriate area of legislation. That is not deciding the controversy. It is just saying we need to have the issue narrowed in a way that courts are familiar with addressing.

Senator Cornyn. Well, then, of course, juries in many instances are the fact finder, and their determination is usually binding on not only the court below, but also appellate courts reviewing that, and I guess citizens would feel that they were engaged in a futile exercise of serving on juries and listening to evidence and trying to decide disputed facts if the judge on appeal was just going to say, you know, "Let us throw that out the window. We do not really care because this is a result we want to reach in a particular case."

Judge Roberts. Well, judges, when they sit down to decide a case, when the cases come into the chambers, judges don't sit and decide, well, what do I think about issues under the Fourth Amendment or the Fifth Amendment or the Seventh Amendment. They want to know what the case is about, and that begins with knowing what the factual dispute is about and what the record is. Then they want to know what law applies in resolving that question. And they want to know what the arguments are. That's why we have briefs on one side, then briefs on the other. And I'm sure you've had the same experience that I've had, which is that you find the opening brief can be very persuasive; then you move on to the second one, and you see it in an entirely different light. And maybe your view of the case will change again as you consult with your colleagues on the bench or as you hear the oral argument.

I know I spent a lot of time doing those briefs and arguments, and I certainly hope they had some impact on a case from time to time. And then when you sit down with the judges, all of these things, your view of the case is going to change in some way at every stage. And to say that it's the same thing when you sit down and ask an abstract question as when you have been through the judicial process and reached a decision, including having to reduce it to writing, the requirement that judges write opinions is an important discipline on the decisional process, because--and those opinions are going to be submitted to the public, and everyone is going to be able to see your reasoning. And so it has to be coherent and reasonable and something that can stand the glare of publicity and the scrutiny of scholars and other judges.

That's a very important discipline. It means--it's quite a bit different than saying, well, what do you think about this and whatever opinion you might give.

Senator Cornyn. I am also, of course, intrigued by how poorly Senators, Presidents, and others who try to predict how a life-tenured judge or Justice on the Supreme Court is likely to look at issues next year, 10 years, 20 years down the road. And it just occurs to me that there is a long list of examples where life tenure and the lack of electoral or political accountability has caused judges to change the way they perhaps have looked at things over time, and I guess how badly Presidents have guessed sometimes about how a judge will decide cases in the future. And I think, you know, one of my favorites is Teddy Roosevelt and Oliver Wendell Holmes, when he said, "I could carve more backbone in a banana than demonstrated by this Justice." He was pretty hot.

So, in addition to the ethical, the constitutional, the practical limitations, it just seems to me that we are engaged in a little bit of a futility here because when you are confirmed--and I expect that you will be confirmed--the designers of our Constitution expected and created a system where you would be immunized or at least insulated, I should say, from political or other pressures.

Federalism

Senator Biden. Let me go on to my next question. Violence Against Women--and I realize it is a bit of a hobby horse for me since I wrote the legislation, and I know people say they wrote things. I mean, I actually did write that my little old self, with my staff. And no one liked it, I might add, at first--women's groups or anybody else.

But in 1999, you said, in response to a question--you were on a show. It was 1999. You were talking about a number of things, and you said, and I quote, "You know, we've gotten to a point these days where we think the only way we can show we're serious about a problem is if we pass a Federal law, whether it's the Violence Against Women Act or anything else. The fact of the matter is conditions are different in different States, and State laws are more relevant. It is, I think, exactly the right term. More in tune to different situations in New York as opposed to Minnesota, and that's what the Federal system is based upon."

Judge, tell me how a guy beating up his wife in Minnesota is in any different condition in New York.

Judge Roberts. Senator, I was not speaking specifically to any piece of legislation there. That was making a very--

Senator Biden. Well, you mention Violence Against Women, don't you?

Judge Roberts. That was the issue that had come up on the show, and the general issue that was being addressed is a question of federalism. I think it was part of the genius of the Founding Fathers to establish a Federal system with a national government to address issues of national concern; State and local government more close to the people to address issues of State and local concern; obviously, issues of overlap as well. I was not expressing a view on any particular piece of legislation. And I think the statement you read--

Senator Biden. Well, let me ask you--

Judge Roberts. --confirms that.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you. I would like to move to another subject because my time is moving on, and that is what has been happening in the Court in the last ten years. As I mentioned, for 60 years, the Court didn't strike down a single Federal law for exceeding Congressional power under the Commerce Clause. Yet in the last decade, the Court's reinterpretation of the Commerce Clause has been used to strike down more than three dozen cases. The Court's future decisions will determine whether the Congress will be able to take necessary action to stop child pornography, combat violent crime, ensure child support payments, prevent discrimination, improve our schools, and protect our environment.

My question is, do you agree with the direction in which the Supreme Court has moved in more narrowly interpreting Congressional authority to enact laws under the Commerce Clause?

Judge Roberts. Well, of course, I tried to avoid saying whether I agree or disagree with particular cases. But I would point out in this area, in particular, I think it's very important to look at the most recent case, which is the Raich case, the medical marijuana case, because the argument there was that these two decisions that you're talking about that were the first in the 60 years, Lopez and Morrison, the argument there was based on Lopez and Morrison, Congress lacks the power in this area.

And what the Supreme Court said in the Raich case, which I think is very important, it said there are a lot more precedents on the Commerce Clause besides Lopez and Morrison, and the appropriate way to regard those is two decisions in the more than 200-year sweep of decisions in which the Supreme Court has given extremely broad--it's recognized extremely broad authority on Congress's part, going all the way back to Gibbons v. Ogden and Chief Justice John Marshall, when those Commerce Clause decisions were important in binding the nation together as a single commercial unit.

So again, without commenting on whether particular decisions are correct or not, I do think it's important to recognize that the Court itself in its most recent decision has said we need to focus on the broad sweep and not just on those two decisions.

Senator Feinstein. Let me move to the case of the hapless toad, known more commonly as Rancho Viejo v. Norton. Do you believe there is a basis for sustaining the Endangered Species Act other than the Commerce Clause?

Judge Roberts. Well, the opinion I wrote there noted that the panel decision that I thought should be reheard en banc looked at one ground for under the Commerce Clause and the concluding paragraph in my opinion said that we ought to rehear the case to look at other grounds that were also under the Commerce Clause, but they were not the particular prong of the Commerce Clause analysis that the panel opinion had relied on, and the reason was that, as I explained in the opinion, another circuit court has suggested pointedly that the approach in the panel opinion was inconsistent with the Supreme Court.

And I thought if there was another basis for sustaining the Endangered Species Act that was not inconsistent in the view of another circuit court, that we ought to look at that and try to do it. It really reflects a restrained and minimalist approach. If there's a ground that doesn't cause another circuit court to say, you're violating the Supreme Court precedents, we ought to look at that and see if we could rest the decision there.

Senator Feinstein. I guess the point I am trying to get at is you are saying that the fact that the toad was almost only found in California means that it was an impermissible use of the Endangered Species Act. Well, then that raises a question. What if the toad strays across the border, or what if the toad, this is the last remaining toad, and--

Judge Roberts. Right, but the one point I would emphasize is my opinion did not conclude that there was no authority under the Commerce Clause in just that situation. There was another dissenting opinion that was filed by another judge who said this violates the Commerce Clause. I did not join that opinion. I wrote separately to say that we should hear this en banc with all the judges because there are other ways of sustaining this Act that don't implicate the concern that has caused the other circuit to question our approach that had caused the dissenting judge to conclude there was no authority, and I thought we ought to look at those other grounds because if we could sustain it without implicating that objection, that would be better all around.

I did not take the position that it was outside the scope of the Commerce Clause. It was a question of which ground under the Commerce Clause we ought to look at.

Senator Feinstein. There is a great deal of concern as what this then means for the implication for all environmental law--the Clean Water Act, the Clean Air Act. But if I understand you correctly, what you are saying is that you do not believe that the Commerce Clause should prohibit legislation in this area, is that correct?

Judge Roberts. I have not had occasion to decide that. I did not decide it in the Rancho Viejo case. One of the other judges did and I did not join that opinion. What I said is we should consider these other grounds. Now, I didn't have the opportunity, because there was a dissent from rehearing, to consider those other grounds.

Those other grounds were what other courts, the Fifth Circuit in the GDF case, had used to sustain application of the Endangered Species Act in the cases that came before them. They didn't get into the question of whether you look at the regulated activity, the building or the actual what was prohibited, the taking of the toad. They analyzed the protection of the endangered species as implicating a commercial activity, and that allowed them to sustain the Act without regard to whether it had an interstate effect itself.

Senator Coburn. I want to go to one other area that I have some concern about. I know my concerns are opposite from some of those who have a different philosophy of life. Many of the questions posed to you have focused on our concerns about an activist Judiciary. My opening statement expressed some of those concerns. However, I am equally concerned about an activist Congress that goes beyond its bounds, a congress that routinely ignores its own constitutional boundaries. Historically the debate about the role and scope of Congress has focused on the General Welfare clause.

As we all know, Article I, section 8, clause 1 of the Constitution gives Congress the power to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. The Tenth Amendment also spells out limitations on congressional power. We had the discussion yesterday on the toad, I believe. The Tenth Amendment states the power not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

I want to give you a quote that James Madison said, because in his wisdom he anticipated that we would try to stretch the definition of the Founders. And he wrote with respect to the words "General Welfare:" I have always regarded them as qualified by the detail of powers connected with them. To take them in a literal and unlimited sense would be a metamorphosis of the Constitution into a character in which there is a host of proofs was not contemplated by its Creators.

In Federalist Paper 45 Madison writes: "The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State Governments are numerous and infinite."

Do you agree with James Madison's interpretation of the General Welfare Clause, that the powers of the Congress should be fundamentally limited, or do you agree with the modern prevailing wisdom of both political parties, particularly appropriators, who believe Congress' role is fundamentally unlimited?

Judge Roberts. well, I agree with Madison's view in general that the Constitution does contain limitations on the Federal authority. The General Welfare Clause, and in particular the necessary and proper clause, of course, would have been interpreted in many of Chief Justice John Marshall's early opinions to recognize though that the scope of authority given to Congress is broad, and broad enough to confront the problems that in Chief Justice John Marshall's case were confronted by a young Nation and helped to bind it together as a Nation and broad enough today to confront the problems that Congress addresses. But the notion that the Constitution was one of limited powers, albeit broad, under the Necessary and Proper Clause and even the General Welfare Clause is interpreted by Chief Justice John Marshall in these early opinions, that recognition doesn't undermine the Framers' essential vision that we are dealing with a Federal system I which vast powers reside with the States, and that the Federal Government is one of limited powers, broad in obviously particular areas and broad under the Necessary and Proper Clause, but limited powers nonetheless.

DOJ_NMG_0035795

First Amendment – Free Speech

Senator DeWine. . . . Let me move, if I could, to something that is very important to me and to all of us and that is the First Amendment. Certainly, Judge, there is no right in our Constitution that is any more important than the freedom of speech. In a sense, it is the foundation of our democracy. It is the right upon which other rights are built. It is the right that guards our liberty and preserves our freedom.

At the heart of the First Amendment is the idea that people have a right not only to speak their mind, but also to be heard. I would like to talk to you a little bit about that and ask you a question.

The case I think that most eloquently talks about the public square where we engage in speech is Hague v. CIO, a 1939 case which you are well familiar with, and I want to quote it very briefly.

"Wherever the title of streets and parks may rest, they have immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and time out of mind have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens and discussing public questions. Such use of the streets and public places has from ancient times been a part of the privileges, immunities, rights, and liberties of citizens," end of quote.

Judge, I want to be honest with you and say that as of late, I feel that we are seeing a disturbing trend when it comes to speech in the public arena. I want to give you some examples.

In a recent case, a Wisconsin woman was kicked off a city bus, and this is what she was kicked off a city bus for doing. She was trying to distribute a book containing Bible stories to individuals sitting next to her.

Another case that is repeated time and time again across this country and has been for many years in towns and cities and villages across the country, individuals are prohibited from placing political signs, and it could be not just for candidates, it could be for a school levy, against a school levy, on their own property--on their own property--except during specified times and in specified ways. The government tells them, so many days before the election. You can't put that up there until so many days before the election, not just for candidates, but for bond issues, whatever the issue that they want to talk about, do their own political speech, on their own property.

Another example, in many public--people who wish to exercise free speech in many public places, these individuals are forced into so-called "free speech zones," which many times are far away from the event that they wish to protest about, so far away that they can't ever been seen or ever be heard, out of sight. Again, we go back to the issue of you have to be heard.

In one recent case, the New York City Housing Authority refused to let a woman conduct Bible studies in the community center of a housing project, even though the community center was used for a host of activities, even weddings. I must say, in that case, she actually won the case.

So I am concerned when I see these restrictions. I think at the core of the First Amendment is the idea that individuals should be able to speak and be heard in public places.

Now, Judge, I know you can't tell us how you will decide any particular case. I am not asking you to do that. But it is important to me that you talk to us a little bit about how you will evaluate these cases involving the right to speak in public places, public places such as buses, metro stations, city sidewalks, public parks, and tell us, if you could, Judge, what factors will you consider when deciding restrictions on speech in the public square as we traditionally know it and what is proper under the First Amendment and which ones are not. What tools will you use to decide that?

Judge Roberts. Well, again, of course, without commenting on any of the particular hypotheticals or actual cases--

Senator DeWine. That is right. I am not asking--and they are all real cases, but I don't want you to talk about that.

Judge Roberts. I do think, though, first as a general matter and then to get into the law, that it is important that people keep a basic principle in mind when they're addressing these types of concerns. It's not a provision in the Constitution, it's not a provision in the law, but it's a basic American approach that I think is important, and that's captured in the expression, you know, it's a free country. And when you're talking about what people can say, what people can--signs they can put up, what they can do, I think people, as a general matter, need to appreciate that it's a free country and it's a wonderful thing that people can say things in the public that you may not agree with because you, of course, have the same right.

Now, the particular mode of analysis that the Supreme Court uses in addressing these types of public speech issues is to some extent unsettled. The public forum doctrine, as it's called, for many years you've tried to characterize an issue. Is this a public forum? Is it a quasi-public forum? Is it a private forum? And the different definition sort of carried with it the conclusion about what could be allowed, and many of the Justices thought that the reasoning was awfully circular.

I remember years ago I argued one of the cases in the Supreme Court about post office and what could be done in a post office area and whether the restriction of that area to postal business meant they could exclude people who wanted to engage in political speech. I remember thinking at the time that the precedents were very unsettled and I'm not sure that the Court has made much progress since then.

But you do try to focus a little bit on whether you're dealing with a public forum, one that has traditionally been open to expression, and if it has, then any restrictions on expression are going to be subject to a very exacting standard before they'll be upheld. If it's a more limited public forum, it's only been open for certain types of speech or the nature of the forum requires there to be a restriction--that was the government's argument in the post office case I litigated--then it's a less-demanding standard in those situations.

Senator DeWine. Judge, let me just follow up with that with a short question, if you would give me just a reaction to this, if I could. Do you think the First Amendment is flexible enough in the year 2005 to account for what I believe, at least, is the shrinking public square? I know we have the Internet, we have TV, we have radio, a lot of things that we didn't have when our Founders wrote the Constitution. But I think there is a shrinking public square.

What do I mean by this? Someone who wants to run for school board today, someone who wants to support a school levy, oppose a school levy, when you and I were growing you--you are younger than I am, but when we were growing up in the Midwest, you could go downtown. If you supported a school levy, let us say, you could go downtown and pass out literature in front of the hardware store or the grocery store and that was a public place because there was a sidewalk and you knew everybody in town was probably going to go by there. And if you lived in a city, there were communities in the city where you could do the same thing.

Today, most people--we just don't live that way. Most people don't. Some do, but most don't. Today, people get in their car and if they go to the grocery store, they go to a strip mall and they go to a grocery store that is surrounded all by private property, and the people who own that strip mall say you can't come--usually say you can't come on and distribute any literature of any kind on this facility, and basically they are upheld in that right because it is private property. Or they go buy their clothes or everything else or their hardware, they go in a big mall and that mall clearly--there is a Supreme Court case right on point that says that they can be excluded.

So the traditional public forum as we know it has really shrunk. Does the Court take that into consideration when they look at the precedents, they look at all the decisions that have been made? How does that--without citing any case or talking about any specifics--

Judge Roberts. Well, I do know--

Senator DeWine. It is a different world we live in today.

Judge Roberts. I appreciate the point, and I do know that even the analysis in this particular area, one of the factors that the Court considers is the availability of alternative avenues for expression, and a concern, if they are cutting off a particular mode of expression, a particular avenue, are there alternatives available? And I think that's a very important consideration.

I think you're quite right that this is one of those areas in which technology is going to figure in a very prominent way, and the question of whether this type of analysis that grew up when you're talking about a public square or a town hall type thing, applies in the Internet situation, and whether there's changes that do need to be made in the analysis.

Senator DeWine. Since you talked about the Internet, let me turn to a disturbing trend in regard to the Internet, and that has, quite frankly, to do with pornography. We have passed several bills in Congress, the Communications Decency Act to protect our children. The Supreme Court struck it down. I am not going to ask you to comment about that. A few years later we passed the Child Online Protection Act, again, with the intent to protect our children. Again the Court struck it down.

Unlike the traditional public square, the Internet has really become a place for the distribution of some, I find, very troubling materials, and that is pornography. I guess what bothers me about these cases is they fail to account for something that to me at least is very relatively simple, and that is that at the core of the First Amendment is, to me at least, the protection of political speech, speech on matters of public concern, I have talked about before. But it seems to me that pornography is different, particularly pornography that children can easily access. It seems to me that that should be treated differently than political speech.

Famous case, Young v. American Mini Theaters. In that case the Court upheld zoning regulations on adult theaters. Justice Stevens, hardly a right-winger, had this to say, and I quote: "Even though we recognize that the First Amendment will not tolerate the total suppression of erotic materials that have some arguably artistic value, it is manifest that society's interest in protecting this type of expression is of a wholly different and lesser magnitude than the interest in untrammeled political debate." Few of us would march our sons and daughters off to war to preserve the citizen's right to see "specified sexual activities" exhibited in the "theaters of our choice."

Judge, in light of that quotation, here are my questions. Are there or should there be different levels of speech under the First Amendment? Should pornography, for instance, be treated with less regard than Mark Twain's Huck Finn? And how would you, if confirmed to the Supreme Court, decide what protection if any certain kinds of expression are entitled to under the First Amendment?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, it's my understanding under the Supreme Court's doctrine that pornographic expression is not protected to the same extent at least as political and core speech, and the difficulty that the Court has addressed in these different areas of course is always defining what is or is not pornography and what is entitled to protection under the First Amendment and what is not.

That question is sort of antecedent to the question of what the level of protection is. We determine whether it's entitled to First Amendment protection in the first place. In certain types of speech like child pornography, the Court has determined are not entitled to protection under the First Amendment. There are different categories, and the Court has struggled over the years in figuring out how to determine those categories and what belongs in what category, and beyond that, I don't think I can give a more precise answer.

Senator Graham. . . . Let us talk about righting wrongs here. I think it stinks that somebody can burn the flag and that is called speech. What do you think about that?

Judge Roberts. Well--

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. We had the Flag Protection Act after the Supreme Court concluded that it was protected speech.

Senator Graham. Show me where the term "symbolic speech" is in the Constitution.

Judge Roberts. Well, it's not, and-- Senator Graham. It is not. They just made it up, did they not?

Senator Leahy. We talked just briefly about the First Amendment yesterday. It is written primarily in terms of speech, but in a free and democratic nation, access to information, I think, is extraordinarily important. To our Framers, there was the maxim, "knowledge is power." Actually, that was the maxim the administration used as the model for what was a somewhat Orwellian total information awareness program until a Republican Congress, and I supported this, shut it down. It was asking too much knowledge about individual Americans.

I also spoke about "we the people." If we the people know what our government is doing and why it is doing it, we can hold the government accountable, and should. So I worry about an administration--I am not going into a specific case, but I worry about an administration that spreads misinformation and is declaring more things secret and spending billions of dollars doing that, far more than any administration in history, probably all administrations put together. It punishes the whistleblowers. It bars the press and cameras from so many different events.

And I believe very strongly that if the people want to know what is going on, the courts are, if at all possible, supposed to take their sides in making sure they know what is going on, because our government should not be able to hide things unnecessarily from the people. No matter who is in power, the people should know what is going on.

So I would like to know how you would approach such a case. Let me give you a few examples in the last couple of years. The administration fought to prevent the media from covering coffins returning from Iraq. It fought to keep disturbing images of U.S.-run prisons in Iraq from the media. And just last weekend, actually after a loss, the court abandoned its zero-access policy regarding the scenes of devastation in New Orleans. As you know, most of America found out what was going on in New Orleans really from the press, not from our government, at least the first few days.

There have been a number of reasons, excuses, which seem to change day by day for why these things are being blocked. I am not going to ask you to evaluate them, but my question is this.

If the government seeks to exclude, broadly exclude media from access to images or events of public interest or concern, does the First Amendment require the government to justify that denial of access, and if so, what kind of standards? Not any particular case, but what kind of standards does the court have to apply?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I haven't dealt with a lot of First Amendment access cases. I know I studied one about media access to prisons, for example, the issue about whether the media had a right of access to prisons if they wanted to report on it. So I am not terribly familiar with the precise levels of scrutiny that apply.

There is, obviously, a balancing of sorts between particular interests when you are dealing with governmental operations and there are some perfectly valid reasons for excluding media. On the other hand, simply disagreement about whether it's an appropriate issue for the public to see would not strike me as a very compelling governmental interest, and I think the courts regularly balance these sorts of things when they get an issue about a challenge by the media saying their First Amendment rights are being violated because of a particular exclusion.

Again, I'm not terribly familiar with the precise legal standards or how they've developed since the prison access case that I'm familiar with, but it does require a consideration and weighing, and the values of the First Amendment obviously are something that have to be given careful weight by the court for the very reasons that you have discussed, because the First Amendment is--it serves a purpose. It's not there just because the Framers thought this was in general a good idea. It serves a purpose with respect to the government. It provides access to information and allows people in a free society to make a judgment about what their government is up to.

Senator Leahy. Let me--like the Chairman, I was a prosecutor, and if we move a little bit out of the prison situation, which raises all other kinds of questions and abilities to limit access, let's just go to something that the public might easily have access to if they could just walk in there.

Suppose the government--I will use something like Katrina. Suppose they felt that the rescue operations of the government, whether it is State, local, or Federal, was being handled in an inept way or evacuees were being mistreated. Does that give them a right to bar the media who may want to expose that?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think as a general--

Senator Leahy. How would you analyze the claim, without citing a particular case, how would you analyze--the media comes and says, look, the government screwed up and we are trying to get in there to take pictures to show how they screwed up and they say you can't come in. How would you analyze a claim like that?

Judge Roberts. Well, you know, I do start with a general principle in this area, and I think it was Justice Brandeis who talked about sunlight being the best disinfectant--

Senator Leahy. Disinfectant.

Judge Roberts. --and I think that's a lot of what the Framers had in mind in guaranteeing freedom of speech and the other rights that go along with it. They appreciated the benefits that would come from public awareness. That's an important principle.

I also, and again, this is not an areas that I feel completely up to speed on the precedents, and I obviously, if I were in a position as a judge and had to decide a particular case, would study them and become aware, but my recollection is that there is great difficulty whenever you try to distinguish between public rights and media rights and that if it's a situation in which the public is being given access, you can't discriminate against the media and say, as a general matter, that the media don't have access because their access rights, of course, correspond with those of the public.

And as you said, they're in a position--if there are a handful of people who might be able to have access, the media is in a position to make that information or knowledge, whatever, available on a broader basis and--

Senator Leahy. I raise this because I am not trying to pin you on a particular case. I think we are going to see more and more of this. We are in the digital age. A lot of information is readily available. At the same time, the bad part about that is our government can acquire more and more and more information on us, just as your credit card company or anybody else does on you. Some of us want to be in a position to be able to go in and find out what is being collected on us. To what extent are we giving up our privacy?

Usually, far more than the Congress or anybody else, it has been the media that has exposed when this has been overdone, when mistakes or violations are done, and I would hope that you would be committed to protecting just as much as possible access rather than the other way around.

Senator Brownback. . . . I want to take you back to the First Amendment discussions. This is an issue in an area that I have just not understood where the Court has been going. I hope you are going to be willing to answer some of this analysis, or give me at least your thought on how the Court got to where they did on these issues.

First Amendment, everybody knows, Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech. Well-known, well-regarded, broadly interpreted by the Courts to the point that you would get court opinions--and I just want to quote these. This is actually in a Supreme Court opinion, that the Court would in the past four years when this opinion was issued, in--I think it was 2003--the last four years, the Court had sternly disapproved--sternly disapproved restrictions upon certain forms of speech such as virtual child pornography. Court said you can't do that, limit that speech. Tobacco advertising. Court said can't limit that speech. Dissemination of illegally intercepted communications. Can't limit that speech. Sexually explicit cable programming. Can't limit that speech.

So the Court has been, it seems to me, very pronounced in this area of free speech--can't limit it, basically, to the Congress. Can't limit it. And to the point, you know, where it goes to the issue of virtual child pornography. And that was the case of Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition. And I want to describe this in a little bit of detail because I want to back it up and ask another question associated with it. Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, Court struck down a congressional statute regulating pornography, in this case the Child Pornography Prevention Act of 1996; expanded the Federal prohibition on pornography to include virtual child pornography, realistic images which were made without the use of actual children.

But the Congress based its opinion on the basis that pedophiles will use this material to recruit over the Internet individuals to draw in children into sexual activity. And so we found out about that, investigated it, did a number of hearings, and said we have to stop this stuff. Court says you can't do it; it is a limitation on free speech.

Then, not long ago--as a matter of fact, the opinion was issued in 2003--we had a big debate on campaign finance reform in front of the Congress. One of the members of our Committee, Senator Feingold, who was one of the lead sponsors of the McCain-Feingold piece, the legislation. And it came in front of the courts, McConnell v. Federal Election Commission, and the Court largely upheld the McCain-Feingold law, one section of which did this: Prohibited corporations, labor unions, and other organizations from political advertisement that mentioned a specific candidate or office-holder within 60 days of a general election. You are probably very familiar with this.

This was a big national debate. Under the Court decision, this congressional action prohibiting speech--and not just any speech, and not just pornography--this is political speech close to the time when people are making decisions on elections.

The Court decided that this congressional action prohibiting political speech was upheld under a First Amendment ostensibly designed to protect this, I would contend, form of political participation and speech. I looked at that. I voted on the McCain-Feingold law. I did not think there was any way the Court would hold that this is constitutional because you are limiting political free speech and right when people are making their decision.

One of the lead reasons, lead abilities we have in this country is to be able to criticize the Government, and certainly at a point when it matters the most, right ahead of elections. How do you square such a broad interpretation of the First Amendment in these cases and such a limitation on political free speech? Can you explain that to me?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I'm not sure that I can put the two together side by side and talk about it other than to say that I think the Court tends to address each case on its own terms, and in the case of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act, I do know that we're dealing there with an extraordinarily extensive record in that case. The judicial opinions addressing the issue before three-judge District Court I know went on for several hundred pages, just dealing with records and the issues involved, the record that had been developed, including before Congress.

My reading of the Court's opinion in the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act case is that that was a case where the Court's decision was driven in large part by the record that had been compiled by Congress. I think the determination there was based--just reading the opinion, there's no great insight--that the extensive record carried a lot of weight with the Justices.

Now, with respect to the other areas, again, I think the Court would tend to look at those, sort of put the one case aside and then move on to the next case, and they're dealing there with developments in that area, and again I--

Senator Brownback. Does this not strike you as odd, these two side by side under the same First Amendment?

Judge Roberts. Only in the sense, Senator, that obviously they come out different ways, and your point that the political speech is generally regarded as at the core of what the First Amendment was designed to protect, and some of the other speeches is not. I certainly appreciate that concern, but whether--again, whether the particular cases were correctly decided or not is not something I feel is appropriate for me to discuss.

Senator Brownback. I looked at those and this just did not make much sense. If you are going to read it expansively on the First Amendment, which I agree with, that should be consistently done.

DOJ_NMG_0035803

First Amendment – Religion Clauses

Senator Feinstein. Thank you very much. I would like to ask a question or two on church and state. I mentioned in my opening statement that for centuries, people have been persecuted for their religious beliefs, and our country grows more diverse every day and tensions among different beliefs have grown. I really believe that there is a brilliance in what the Founding Fathers did in drafting the First Amendment and how it protected an individual's right to practice their belief, whatever it may be, but also protect against using religion against individuals by prohibiting the government from becoming and/or imposing religion.

In 1960, there was much debate about President John F. Kennedy's faith and what role Catholicism would play in his administration. At that time, he pledged to address the issues of conscience out of a focus on the national interest, not out of adherence to the dictates of one's religion, and even said, "I believe in an America where the separation of church and state is absolute."

My question is, do you?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I think the reason we have the two clauses in the Constitution in the First Amendment reflects the Framers' experience. Many of them or their immediate ancestors were fleeing religious persecution. They were fleeing established churches. And it makes perfect sense to put those two provisions together, no establishment of religion and guaranteeing free exercise. That reflected the Framers' experience.

Senator Feinstein. If you can, answer my question yes or no.

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't know what you mean by absolute separation of church and state. For example, recently in the Ten Commandments case, the Court upheld a monument on the Texas capitol grounds that had the Ten Commandments in it. They struck down the posting of the Ten Commandments in a Kentucky courthouse. Is it correct to call the monument on the Texas capitol grounds with the Ten Commandments, is that an absolute separation, or is that an accommodation of a particular monument, along with others, that five of the Justices found was consistent with the First Amendment?

So I don't know what that means when you say absolute separation. I do know this, that my faith and my religious beliefs do not play a role in judging. When it comes to judging, I look to the law books and always have. I don't look to the Bible or any other religious source.

Senator Graham. . . . I think it stinks that a kid cannot go to school and say a prayer if he wants to voluntarily. What do you think about that?

Judge Roberts. That's something it's probably inappropriate for me to comment on.

Senator Graham. What do you think Ronald Reagan thought about that?

Judge Roberts. His view was that voluntary school prayer was appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0035804

Senator Durbin. Thank you. Earlier, Senator Feinstein asked you about the separation of church and state and I would like to follow up on this, if I could. She asked whether you believed the separation of church-state was absolute, and I have your answer here relative to the two recent cases on the Ten Commandments. It appears now that there is debate within the Court as to whether or not they will stand behind the Lemon v. Kurtzman standards under the Establishment Clause, the three-part test, which I won't go through in detail.

As Deputy Solicitor General of the Bush administration, you co-authored two legal briefs in which you urged the Supreme Court to overrule the Lemon standard, Board of Education v. Mergens and Lee v. Weisman. You argued instead for what has been characterized in shorthand as the legal coercion test.

So I would like to ask you at this point in time, what is your view on the Establishment Clause and the Lemon standard?

Judge Roberts. Well, the Lemon test is a survivor. There's no other way to put it. When we wrote the brief in Lee v. Weisman, we had a long footnote explaining that, I think it was six different members of the current Court had expressed their criticisms of the Lemon test. They never got together at the same time and the test has endured.

The approach that we were advocating in Lee v. Weisman did focus on the question of coercion and argued that in certain circumstances, a recognition of ceremonial religious practices--an invocation at a graduation was the one at issue there--were permissible, and again, that, I think, lost five-to-four.

And the Lemon test to this day is the test that the Court applies. I think one of the Justices recently explained, you know, it's not so much how good the Lemon test is, it's that nobody can agree on an alternative to take its place, and there may be something to that. There are cases where the Court doesn't apply the Lemon test. It seems to follow a different approach.

The great benefit of the Lemon test, the three-part test that everybody's familiar with, of course, is that it's very sensitive to factual nuances. The disadvantage of the Lemon test, I think, is that it's very sensitive to factual nuances and you get a situation like with the Ten Commandments case, and again, I'm not commenting on the correctness or not, but those are two decisions and there is exactly one Justice that thinks they're both right.

Nobody would suggest that this is an area of the law where the Court's precedents are crystal clear, and I think there may be some inevitability to that. There is a tension of sorts between the Establishment Clause, on the one hand, and the Free Exercise Clause on the other, and the Court's cases in recent years have tried to consider when is an accommodation for religious belief--when does that go too far and become an establishment of religion? The Court has a case on its docket coming up.

I think the animating principle of the Framers that's reflected in both of the religion clauses is that no one should be denied rights of full citizenship because of their religious belief or their lack of religious belief. That is the underlying principle. That is, I think, what the Framers were trying to accomplish.

The jurisprudence, again, it's an area where the Court has adhered through thick and thin to the Lemon test, probably because they can't come up with anything better, but the results sometimes, I think, are a little difficult to comprehend.

Senator Durbin. Now, of course, Justice Rehnquist had a different point of view, or at least he alluded to one when he appeared before this committee in 1986. Senator Simon asked him a question. He replied as follows. "I have in my opinions read the Establishment Clause more narrowly than some of my colleagues, but I also think, Senator Simon, these are almost questions of degree and that there is not a tremendous amount of difference there as to the broad principles of the Establishment Clause are uncontroverted, and those kinds of cases do not get up to us because they're pretty well settled. It is these kinds of frontier-type cases that come and reflect divisions among us. I certainly have read the Establishment Clause more narrowly than some of my colleagues."

Do you feel that you are reading the Establishment Clause from a narrow point of view or from the traditional Lemon point of view?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't think I've had an Establishment Clause case. The cases where I have argued, I obviously was representing the position of the administration, which was that the Lemon test was regarded by the administration as too manipulable, not determinative, and in some senses inconsistent. So those--with the understanding of the Framers. So that was the position that we were advocating there. I haven't expressed my personal views on the Establishment Clause in any context.

Senator Durbin. Well, let me read what you wrote in a memo on June 4, 1985, to Fred Fielding, again, this period of time when you were serving as a staff attorney, related to Wallace v. Jaffre, and here is what you wrote in reference to Establishment Clause and the Lemon test.

"Thus, as I see it, Rehnquist took a tenuous five-person majority and tried to revolutionize Establishment Clause jurisprudence and end up losing the majority, which is not to say the effort was misguided. In the larger scheme of things, what is important is not whether this law is upheld or struck down but what test is applied."

I know you have said over and over again that you were just doing what you were paid to do, to tell the administration what they wanted to hear. Is that what happened here?

Judge Roberts. I don't think I've said that.

Senator Durbin. Well, that's correct. Strike that from the record. Let me just say you were a staff attorney reflecting the views of the administration you worked for. Is that a correct characterization?

Judge Roberts. It's a correct view. The views of the administration were quite clear with respect to the moment of silence, which was the issue in Wallace v. Jaffre. It was the President's view that it was constitutional, through the Attorney General, that it was constitutional to observe a moment of silence.

Now, what the Court held in Wallace, of course, was that you couldn't look at just the moment of silence. There was a history there about school-led prayer, and to substitute it and suddenly say, well, now it is a moment of silence, they didn't look at it in those terms but looked at it in the long history and the issue of whether a real moment of silence without that kind of background and history, whether that would prevail or not was one that the Court didn't address in Wallace.

Senator Durbin. Let me just wrap this up by asking, and I think you have alluded to this, is it your belief that what we are trying to establish in the constitutional protection on the exercise of religion is not only to protect minorities, religious minorities, but also non-believers?

Judge Roberts. Yes. The Court's decisions in that area are quite clear, and I think the Framers' intent was, as well, that it was not their intent to just have a protection for denominational discrimination. It was their intent to leave this as an area of privacy apart--a conscience from which the government would not intrude.

Senator Sessions. Judge, I will just conclude with noting that I remember when the court in the Ninth Circuit ruled that striking down the Pledge of Allegiance, then-Majority Leader Tom Daschle came to the floor, as now-Majority Leader Harry Reid did the same afternoon, and they criticized the opinion and criticized the Ninth Circuit and expressed concern about activism in that circuit, which I have done often myself.

But I responded that my concern was not so much with the circuit but with the confusing number of opinions from the Supreme Court and that I had no doubt that there was Supreme Court authority that would justify the Ninth Circuit rendering, or ruling, that they did. And I say that because we have just received word today that a judge in San Francisco has upheld--has ruled that the Pledge's reference to one Nation under God violates the Constitution and should be stricken down. So that case is going to be winding its way forward.

I am not going to ask you to comment on it because it will obviously come before you. But will you tell us whether or not you are concerned about the inconsistencies of these opinions, and will you work to try to establish a body of law in the Supreme Court that recognizes the Free Exercise rights of American citizens in regard to religion and to avoid a State establishment of a religion?

Judge Roberts. Well, we talked about this in the Committee hearings on a couple of occasions, and I think everyone would agree that the religion jurisprudence under the First Amendment, the Establishment Clause and the Free Exercise Clause could be clearer. The Ten Commandments cases are the example right at hand. You have two decisions of the Supreme Court. Only one Justice thinks both are right. That is an area in which I think the Court can redouble its efforts to try to come to some consistency in its approach.

Now, it obviously is an area that cases depend in a very significant way on the particular facts, and any time that's the case the differences may be explained by the facts. You do have the two provisions, as your question recognized, the Establishment Clause and the Free Exercise Clause. And as I've said before, I think that both of those are animated by the principle that the Framers intended, the rights of full citizenship to be available to all citizens without regard to their religious belief or lack of religious belief. That I think is the underlying principle, and hopefully, the Court's precedents over the years will continue to give life to that ideal.

Senator Sessions. Thank you, Judge Roberts.

Judicial Ethics (Hamdan; answering questions; honoraria and paid judicial conferences)

Senator Feingold. Let me talk to an aspect of the case that I think you can speak to. Many people were surprised to learn in your questionnaire submitted to the Committee that you were interviewed by the Attorney General in connection with a possible vacancy on the Supreme Court on April 1st of this year, just 6 years [sic] before you sat on the panel that heard oral arguments in the Hamdan case, and that while the case was still pending, before a decision was issued, you had additional interviews in May with the Vice President, the White House counsel, Mr. Karl Rove, and other top officials.

I am going to give you an opportunity to explain why you think it was not necessary for you to recuse yourself from the case, but first I would like to know: Did the possibility of recusal because you were under serious consideration for the Supreme Court occur to you, or was it raised with you at any point prior to the oral argument in the case?

Judge Roberts. Senator, that, again, is a question I can't answer for you. I can't address that. There's a motion pending in the Court seeking to file a petition to recuse, and that motion is pending. It's a matter I can't talk about outside of the judicial process.

In addition, because the Hamdan case itself is still pending, I don't think that's appropriate for me to address that.

Senator Feingold. Judge, I am a little disappointed with that answer. As you know, Senator Schumer and I sent you a letter asking questions about this issue, and then we received a letter on September 1 from the Assistant Attorney General for Legislative Affairs at the Department of Justice on your behalf. It says, "Your August 24th letter requests that Judge Roberts answer certain questions regarding the D.C. Circuit's recent decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld. As you know, Chairman Specter has scheduled hearings on Judge Roberts' nomination to begin immediately after Labor Day. At that time, Judge Roberts will be available to respond to questions from all Senators on the Committee."

Now, I took that to mean a little more than telling me you couldn't talk about it. Are you now refusing to answer a question even about when this issue--

Judge Roberts. Senator--

Senator Feingold. --came to your attention?

Judge Roberts. Senator, we're talking about the canons of judicial ethics. They're quite clear on the subject. They say I may not talk about a matter that's pending before the Court.

Senator Feingold. Even when it first came to your attention?

Judge Roberts. That matter is still--is pending before the Court. My hands are tied. It's not something I can discuss under the canons of ethics.

Senator Cornyn. . . . I want to also talk to you a little bit about one area of questioning. I believe it was Senator Biden who was asking you about Justice Ginsburg and the fact that she answered some questions, but declined others. And we have talked about the Ginsburg standard. I think Senator Schumer referred to that as well. What I understand that to mean, what I mean by that when I say it is that she has recognized that there is a line that a nominee cannot step over in terms of prejudging cases or issues that may come back before the Supreme Court, and that is the line I understand you to have drawn.

But to Justice Ginsburg, as I believe Senator Graham pointed out, had an extensive paper trail and record, and she did feel at some liberty to talk about issues where her views were already public or where she had already written. Is that the distinction, of could you explain your understanding of the distinction she was making or how she handled, perhaps in a way that is different from the way you are handling questions?

Judge Roberts. My understanding, based on reading the transcript, not just of Justice Ginsburg's hearing but of the hearings for every one of the Justices on the Court, is that that was her approach, that she would generally decline to comment on whether she viewed particular cases as correctly decided or not. She at one point said that that was the Court's precedent, she had no agenda to reconsider it, and that was all she was going to say. And in areas where she had written, she thought it was appropriate to discuss more fully because it was an area that she had already publicly commented on, and I understand that to be the distinction as to why she commented on particular areas but not others.

Senator Cornyn. To your knowledge, is the line that you have attempted to walk in these proceedings about being as forthcoming as you can, but recognizing that you have a responsibility not to jeopardize your impartiality, either the perception or the reality, or the impartiality and independence of the Judiciary; has that been the line that you have attempted to walk and as you understand previous nominees have attempted to walk?

Judge Roberts. It is, Senator, with an exception, and the exception is that I have tried to be--to share more of my views with respect to particular cases. I know other nominees have declined, for example, to comment on even a case like Marbury v. Madison because they thought as a theoretical matter it could come before the Court. I tend to take a more practical and pragmatic approach to things, rather than a theoretical or ideological approach. I think as a practical matter, an issue about Marbury v. Madison is not likely to come before the Court, the same with Brown v. Board of Education, so I have gone farther than many nominees and have been willing to talk about my views on those particular cases.

But I do think when it gets into an area where the correctness or incorrectness or my agreement or disagreement with a particular precedent is an area that is likely to come before the Court or could well come before the Court, I do have to draw the line there , and it is not out of any interest to dodge questions or anything. My views on cases that I think are not likely to come before the Court, I'm perfectly willing to discuss. It's based on the concern that the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court depends upon Justices who go there and will decide the issues there with an open mind based on the judicial decisional process, not based on prior commitments they made during the nomination hearing.

All of the Justices have adhered to that approach for that reason, and if I am to join their number, I need to be able to look them in the eye in the conference room and say, "I kept the same faith with the independence and integrity of this Court."

Senator Coburn. . . . I want to cover one area that was discussed yesterday where the implication was made that you might have ruled on a case violating a judicial ethic, and that was the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case. Senator Feingold asked you questions about the case. You invoked the cannon, the code of conduct of U.S. judges that prohibits you from talking about a pending case. I would like, Mr. Chairman, a copy of that canon to be placed in the record.

Chairman Specter. Without objection, so ordered.

Senator Coburn. Canon 3 provides that a judge should perform the duties of the office impartially and diligently. The judicial duties of a judge take precedence over all other activities. In performing the duties prescribed by law, the judge should adhere to the following standards.

Adjudicative responsibilities--there is another one of those legal words I am having trouble getting my hands around. A judge should avoid public comment on the merits of a pending or impending action requiring similar restraint by court personnel subject to the judge's direction and control. The official commentary to Canon 3(a)(6) provides the admonition against public comment about the merits of a pending or impending action until completion of the appellate process.

I would also note that any criticism of your participation in this case is unwarranted. Numerous law professors who specialize in legal ethics have stated that you in no way have violated any ethics rules simply because you were considered for another judgeship. The opinion was finalized well before you met with the President--I believe that is correct--or was offered this nomination. Is that correct?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Coburn. The argument, the initial vote, and the drafting of the opinion all took place before there was a Supreme Court vacancy at all, is that correct?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Coburn. You did not write an opinion on that case, is that correct?

Judge Roberts. I joined Judge Randolph's opinion.

Senator Coburn. Right, but you did not write a separate opinion on that case?

Judge Roberts. No.

Senator Coburn. And I would like to also enter into the record the nonpartisan ethicists who agree that Judge Roberts did not violate any ethics rules--

Chairman Specter. Without objection, it will be made a part of the record.

Senator Kyl. [omitted extensive explanation why nominee should not give views on cases likely to come before the Court] . . . But as Senator Biden just said--and I am paraphrasing here--he said without the knowledge of your personal views--he was talking at the time about end-of-life issues--we are rolling the dice. And your response to that, as I understand it, is: My personal views are irrelevant to a case that comes before me of Jones v. Smith, of X v. Y. What I personally think about issues has nothing to do with the resolution of the dispute between those two parties. And were I to let them intrude, I would not be doing my job as a judge, fairly taking the facts of their case and then applying the law that I understand it to be to reach a decision.

Moreover, Judge, isn't it the case that if you were to state your views on such subjects as they might pertain to a case that would come before the Court, wouldn't you actually have to recuse yourself from deciding that case and, therefore, all of the discussion, all of the effort to get you committed to a particular point of view, would be for naught, because if you expressed it, you couldn't sit on the case anyway, or am I incorrect in that?

Judge Roberts. I think that's a concern that other nominees have raised in the past, particularly given the expression of views as part of the confirmation process. It's not supposed to be a bargaining process, and if you start stating views with respect to particular issues of concern to one Senator, then obviously everyone is going to have their list. And when that individual nominee, if confirmed, if the bargain is successful from his or her point of view and he gets confirmed, he will have to begin each case not with the parties' briefs and arguments but with the transcript of the confirmation hearing to see what he or she swore to under oath was their view in a particular area of the law or a particular case. And I think that would undermine the independence of the Supreme Court. It would undermine the integrity of the judicial process. Every one of the Justices on the Court today, every one of them refused to engage in that type of process. And if I am to sit with them, if I am confirmed, I feel I have to follow the same approach.

Now, I do think I have been more expansive than most nominees. I have gone back and read the transcripts, and some of them would not talk about particular cases even if it were unlikely that the case was going to come before the Court. And the reason they gave was, look, it is hard to draw the line. If I think this case is not going to come before the Court, what about this one? And maybe that will. And rather than trying to draw the line, I am just not going to do it. And those Justices were confirmed.

I have taken what I think is a more pragmatic approach.

If I think an issue is not likely to come before the Court, I have told the Committee what my views on that case were, what my views on that case are. You know, perhaps that means I am in--it is sometimes difficult to draw the line. Perhaps that's right. But, again, if I make the judgment--and other nominees may draw the line differently, may have drawn it differently in the past or differently in the future, the nominee I think has to be comfortable with the proposition that they're not doing anything that's going to undermine the integrity of the Court.

Senator Kyl. And I noted yesterday in response to a question, you said, Well, that is the reward for trying to be more expansive. You were talking about Griswold v. Connecticut at the time, and I thought at the time, Boy, he is expressing a view on a relatively recent case, and at least issues associated with it are clearly going to come before the Court. And I wondered, Does that go too far? Does that cross the line? But your point was the specific issue in the case and the precise holding of the case are not likely in your view to come before the Court, and, therefore, you expressed your opinion about that case and the law underlining the ruling in the case.

So I would agree with you that not only have you attempted to answer every one of our questions, but you have also ventured into expressing your personal views on matters that you didn't think would come before the Court, although, as you note, it is at least possible that some of them might. So hopefully you have not gone too far there.

Senator Feingold. . . . Let me ask you about something else, the Hamdan matter. Yesterday you refused to answer any questions regarding your conduct in the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case. But today you answered questions from Senator Coburn regarding this matter. So I want to follow up in order to make sure the record is complete.

Your interview with the Attorney General of the United States concerning a possible opening on the Supreme Court on April 1, 2005. Is that correct?

Judge Roberts. Yes. The specifics of the details I've discussed in the response to the Committee's questionnaire.

Senator Feingold. That was six days before the oral argument in the Hamdan case, is that not right?

Judge Roberts. I don't remember the exact date of it. I know it was shortly before that, yeah.

Senator Feingold. You had further interviews on May 3rd concerning a possible appointment to the Court with numerous White House officials including Karl Rove, the Vice President and the White House counsel before the decision in the Hamdan case was released; is that correct?

Judge Roberts. The decision was June 15th.

Senator Feingold. The question here is just did you have further interview on May 3rd concerning a possible appointment to the Court?

Judge Roberts. May 3rd, yes. But whatever was--I don't remember the exact dates, but whatever was--

Senator Feingold. But you had interviews with those individuals--

Judge Roberts. --in the Senate questionnaire.

Senator Feingold. The question seems to indicate it was on May 3rd. You met again with Ms. Myers, the White House Counsel on May 23rd; is that right?

Judge Roberts. I'm relying on the--if that's what I said in the questionnaire, yes. I don't have an independent recollection.

Senator Feingold. You have no reason to doubt that those facts are correct. You never informed counsel in this case of these meetings, did you?

Judge Roberts. I did not, no.

Senator Feingold. Mr. Gonzales's advice to the President concerning the Geneva Conventions was an issue in the case, isn't that right?

Judge Roberts. I don't want to discuss anything about what's at issue in the case. The case is still pending, and pending before the Supreme Court.

Senator Feingold. How about this one. President Bush was named a defendant in the case, right?

Judge Roberts. Yes. In his official capacity.

Senator Feingold. The Hamdan decision was released on July 15th. Is it your testimony that no work on that decision took place after July 1?

Judge Roberts. No. I didn't--that was not my testimony. The opinions in the D.C. Circuit--

Senator Feingold. Your testimony now that no work on that decision took place after July 1?

DOJ_NMG_0035812

Judge Roberts. Opinions in the D.C. Circuit are complete and circulated to the panel a week before they're released. That was my--the conclusion of when work was complete, and again, I wasn't the author of the opinion--it would have been a week before it was released.

Senator Feingold. Did you read over the opinion of the concurrence after July 1? Was there any editing that took place after that date?

Judge Roberts. I don't recall, Senator, and-- Senator Feingold. Well, when was the issue of whether you should recuse yourself from this case, when did that first come to your attention?

Judge Roberts. I saw, was made aware of an article--I think it was an article--I don't remember when that took place, whenever the article was published. And then I understand there was legal opinions on the other side were requested by I believe the Chairman, and I know that those were published--

Senator Feingold. You do not recall when this matter first came up? I would think it would be something you would remember, when somebody suggested you should have recused yourself.

Judge Roberts. I don't remember the date of the-- Senator Feingold. How about the approximate time?

Judge Roberts. I think it was sometime in July or--

Senator Feingold. Mr. Chairman, so the record would be complete, I would like to submit the article from Slate Magazine by Professors Gillers, Luban and Lubet and a letter sent to you responding to Professor Rotunda's criticism of their position, and I also want to submit an article by these three law professors that was published int Los Angeles Times on this topic.

I do not want to take any more time on this, but I think these--

Chairman Specter. Without objection that will be made a part of the record.

Senator Feingold. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think these professors very convincingly answer Professor Rotunda's views and point out that his analysis of the case law is not particularly persuasive. And I would urge any of my colleagues who really want to understand the issue with Judge Roberts' participation in the case, rather than just dismissing it because it is inconvenient, that they take a look at and actually see what the issues were here. But I do appreciate your answer to those questions.

Senator Graham. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge Roberts, your intellectual stamina impresses me because--you can't see this on television--it must be 150 degrees in here.

[Laughter.]

Senator Graham. And I just don't know how you are doing it, but I am tremendously impressed.

Mr. Chairman, I would like permission to introduce into the record some law professor's opinion that being interviewed for the Supreme Court vacancy when Judge Roberts was interviewed did not require him to recuse himself, and I will do that at--

Chairman Specter. Without objection, it will be made a part of the record.

DOJ_NMG_0035813

Senator Graham. But let's think about that in kind of political terms, and I know that is not really your job. If we took this to its logical conclusion, say I was President--and I don't think that is going to happen, so you don't need to be overly worried about it. But you could pick someone to be Chief Justice from the people sitting on the Court; is that correct?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Graham. So if you had a judge you did not particularly like, the best thing you could do is go talk to him about the job and they could not decide anything. Would that be the logical conclusion of this?

Judge Roberts. I think that would be the logical conclusion of some--

Senator Graham. Well, I will remember that if I am President. On the record now, I don't think I should have the right to do that. That is part of the process.

Senator Schumer. . . . But let me ask you this about judges in general. You sit on a court, correct?

[Judge Roberts nods head.]

Senator Schumer. Okay. And sometimes you dissent.

[Judge Roberts nods head.]

Senator Schumer. And that's routine, not just for your but for every judge.

Judge Roberts. It's rare on our court, I'm happy to-- Senator Schumer. Yes, it is. It is. That is true. I have noticed that. But it happens in courts all the time.

[Judge Roberts nods head.]

Senator Schumer. Okay. And in doing so, the dissenting judge is criticizing the majority opinion, right?

[Judge Roberts nods head.]

Senator Schumer. Disagreeing with it?

[Judge Roberts nods head.]

Senator Schumer. And I take it this happens on the Supreme Court quite often.

[Judge Roberts nods head.]

Senator Schumer. And, in fact, there aren't that many unanimous Supreme Court cases on major cases these days.

Judge Roberts. Well, actually, at one point the statistics always showed that more cases were unanimous than anything else.

Senator Schumer. But there are a lot of dissenting judgments.

Judge Roberts. There are a lot.

Senator Schumer. And every Justice on the Supreme Court has dissented in many cases.

[Judge Roberts nods head.]

Senator Schumer. Meaning they disagreed with the opinion of the Court, right?

[Judge Roberts nods head.]

Senator Schumer. And nothing is wrong with that. There is nothing improper, nothing unethical.

[Judge Roberts nods head.]

DOJ_NMG_0035814

Senator Schumer. Okay. Let's go to commentators. Non-judges are free to criticize and disagree with Supreme Court cases, correct?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Schumer. In speeches, law review articles. This is a healthy process, wouldn't you say?

Judge Roberts. I agree with that, yes.

Senator Schumer. And you did this occasionally when you were in private practice?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Schumer. Okay. Nothing unseemly about that.

Judge Roberts. No.

Senator Schumer. Okay. And how about lawyers representing clients? Lawyers representing clients criticize cases in legal briefs all the time. That is what they do for a living.

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Schumer. And that is part of being a good lawyer. And you have signed your name to briefs explicitly criticizing and disagreeing with Supreme Court decisions.

Judge Roberts. On occasion, yes.

Senator Schumer. In Rust v. Sullivan, for example, your brief said that, "Roe was wrongly decided and should be overturned." Right?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Schumer. Okay. But in this hearing room, you don't want to criticize or disagree with any decided cases. That seems strange to me. It seems strange, I think, to the American people, that you can't talk about decided cases, past cases, not future cases, when you have been nominated to the most important job in the Federal judiciary. You could do it when you worked in the White House. You could do it when you worked in the Justice Department. You could do it when you worked in private practice. You could do it when you gave speeches and lectures. As a sitting judge, you have done it until very recently. You could probably do it before you just walked into this hearing room. And if you are confirmed, you may be doing it for 30 years on the Supreme Court. But the only place and time that you cannot criticize any cases of the Supreme Court is in this hearing room when it is more important than at any other time that the American people and we, the Senators, understand your views.

Why this room should be some kind of cone of silence is beyond me. The door outside this room does not say, "Check your views at the door." So your failure to answer questions is confounding me. You have done it in instance after instance after instance after instance. What is the difference between giving your views here in this hearing room and what judges do every day, what professors do every day, what lawyers do every day? In each case, they have to state their opinion. They have to do it as part of their job, if you will, writing a brief, rendering an opinion, writing an article. In each case they are stating their views, which might bias them. You have done it.

Yet only here you cannot state your views. If the argument--and by the way, there is a very good countervailing reason that you should state your views, because, as the Founding Fathers so constructed, this is the one time you go before an elected body before a lifetime appoint. And it seems to me this is something of an argument of convenience. Senator Specter said it will. He said you will answer as many questions as you have to to get confirmed. That may be the actual fact, but it is not the right thing to do, in my judgment.

And so please tell us why is the bias, why is the fact that you have already stated an opinion any different when you sit in this room, in terms of jeopardizing your future as a judge, than it is when you are doing all these other things that you have done? And let me just remind you--I am going to give you a chance to answer this, but I think it is bothering a lot of people in this room and out of this room. Justice Ginsburg, people who have sat in your very chair, just about every single Justice, with one or two exceptions, has given their opinions of existing cases.

Justice Ginsburg said on Roe v. Wade, My view is that if Roe had been less sweeping, people would have accepted it more readily. Do you think she was unable to keep an open mind in cases implicating Roe? Do you? Do you think she was unable to keep an open mind? Just answer me about her, not about what you think--

Judge Roberts. Senator, I'll explain why she expressed her views on that particular issue. It was an explanation that she gave at the time, that she had written extensively on that subject and she thought that her writings were fair game for discussion. She took a different view--

Senator Schumer. But she--excuse me, I just--because I want to-- She would be expressing an opinion which might yield bias whether she wrote before or not. She did it over and over again. She praised Learned Hand's First Amendment decision in Masses Publishing. I don't think she was biased to keep her mind open on courts in that line. As Joe Biden said, in Moore v. East Cleveland, she candidly--and I don't think she had writings on that one. She expressed that the opinion has difficulties. And other Justices have done it. Justice Bryer talked about U.S. v. Booker, Justice Powell about Miranda, Justice Souter about Miranda. It didn't bias him in the Dickerson case. Not all of these people had previously written.

You can make a distinction to every single example I give. You can say, well, she wrote on that one. But when you add it all up, you are being less forthcoming. I know you are doing what you feel is right, but you are being less forthcoming with this Committee than just about any other person who has come before us. You are so bright and you know so much, but there is another aspect to this, which is letting us know what you think. And you have set up your own little construct. It is not really the Ginsburg precedent or it isn't Canon 5, which you cited repeatedly at your Court of Appeals hearing.

And so let me ask you this one question and then you can answer it in general. Has there been any judge that you are aware of who has had to recuse himself or herself because of what they said at a confirmation hearing? Can you name for me a judge who you think was biased or not able to render justice because they gave their opinion at a confirmation hearing, sitting at this table as you do?

Judge Roberts. I think, because the Justices have followed the approach that I am following, and as I said, I've gone back and read every one of the transcripts for the Justices, they have avoided commenting on whether they think decisions were correctly decided or not. If you look at what Justice Ginsburg said when she was asked whether she thought the Mayer and Harris cases were correctly decided, you will see she said, I'm not going to comment on that. She said, I know what the precedents are, I have no agenda to overrule them, and that's all I'm going to say.

Senator Schumer. She commented on many other cases, as you went through with Senator Biden yesterday and as we have gone through a little bit here. She commented on many different cases, didn't she?

Judge Roberts. My understanding--

Senator Schumer. There were reasons, but she did comment on other cases, didn't she?

Judge Roberts. My understanding of the cases she felt it appropriate to comment on, as I've said, were the ones where she had already written on it. And she said, I think my writings are appropriate.

Senator Schumer. There are no cases she commented on where she hadn't written?

Judge Roberts. I thought she adhered to her view. Her view was no hints, no forecasts, no previews. That's exactly what she said. That's an exact quote from her hearing transcript.

Senator Schumer. I have to say, sir, I disagree with you. I have looked at her testimony. She didn't comment on some cases and commented on others. If you look at how many she commented on and how many she didn't, it is a far different balance than you, who have commented on Marbury, Brown, Griswold, and not much else. And each time, even when we talked yesterday about Wickard v. Filburn--and it is a 1942 case, it is at the root of a large, it is a trunk of a large tree of constitutional law--you were unwilling to comment. And of course you say it might come before the Court. But that is a prediction. Some may, some may not. Maybe a Brown case would come before the Court. Maybe a Griswold case would come before the Court. And if you had wanted to, you could have easily said those may come before the Court and not answer those. It is sort of your own little way of doing it.

Senator Cornyn. . . . I want to talk to you a little bit--well, first of all, before we go there, I know one of the questions involved the Code of Judicial Conduct and whether you were proscribed by that and the differences between what you have felt at liberty to testify to, and Justice Ginsburg did. But I notice that in the commentary to Canon 5, the Model Code of Judicial Conduct, the last sentence says, "This section applies to any statement made in the process of securing judicial office, such as statements to commissions charged with judicial selection and tenure, and legislative bodies confirming appointment." Is that your recollection of the Code's scope?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator.

Senator Cornyn. I would ask unanimous consent that that be made a part of the record.

Chairman Specter. Without objection, it will be made a part of the record

Senator Cornyn. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Cornyn. . . . I know there were questions about--I want to move quickly to your participation in a lawsuit. Let me see. It was the Hamdi case?

Judge Roberts. Hamdan was the one that--

Senator Cornyn. Hamdan.

Judge Roberts. Hamdi was the one in the--

DOJ_NMG_0035817

Senator Cornyn. Supreme Court, right. Sometimes I confused those.

Judge Roberts. It is a common source of confusion.

Senator Cornyn. And we have had a little back and forth. I think Senator Feingold asked about the ethics of your participation. Senator Graham I thought made a very good point in talking about if a President wanted to disqualify a judge in a case, well, just call the judge up and tell him, "You are being considered for a Federal appointment," which certainly cannot be right.

But do you know for a fact that Justice Breyer, when he was being considered about a possible nomination to the Supreme Court, sat and decided seven cases while sitting on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals? Are you familiar with that statistic?

Judge Roberts. No, I'm not, Senator.

Senator Cornyn. Okay. Well, our research reveals that that is, in fact, what happened, and so if Justice Breyer could participate fully in the court's decisionmaking process while being considered by President Clinton for appointment to, nomination to the Supreme Court, it strikes me that we should not have a different standard. And I am not asking you to comment on that because you said you are not familiar with Justice Breyer's record. But if that is true--and I believe it is, that he sat on seven different cases involving the United States Government and the executive branch while he was being considered for the Supreme Court, we shouldn't hold John Roberts to a different standard. And that is my view.

Senator Feingold. A topic we touched on in our meeting in my office in July was the issue of judges going to judicial education conferences at sometimes fancy resorts which are put on by ideologically oriented groups and paid for by private corporations sometimes that even have cases pending before the judges in attendance. And when we spoke, of course, you had been nominated for the Associate Justice position, and our conversation concerned your personal interest in attending such events. As I remember, your answer was that you said you would rather spend your free time with your family, which I thought was a pretty good answer.

But now you have been nominated for Chief Justice, and one of your duties is to head the Judicial Conference which, among other things, sets the ethics policies for the Federal judiciary. And this is one area where I think Chief Justice Rehnquist might have taken a different course. He took a number of steps to essentially leave this ethical question up to the personal decision of individual judges and appointed a judge to head the Committee on Codes of Conduct who had been prominently featured in a "20/20" expose of these junkets. Not surprisingly, the Committee weakened the judicial ethics rules on this question of privately financed trips.

Chief Justice Rehnquist strongly opposed congressional efforts to put a halt to these judicial junkets that I believe sometimes reflect poorly on the independence and impartiality of the judiciary.

So I would like to know, Judge Roberts, if confirmed, whether you will use your power as Chief Justice to set a high ethical tone for the Federal judiciary by putting in place new codes of conduct that would prohibit judges from participating in privately funded "judicial education" that lets special interests essentially lobby Federal judges?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't think special interests should be allowed to lobby Federal judges. Stated that way, I think the answer is clear.

I don't know enough about how these things operate. As I said, I have not been on one of them. I don't know how the funding is set up. I don't know what the situation is. If confirmed, I'm certainly happy to examine it. I know that there is a conflict of interest or ethical standard review group, I think, within the Judicial Conference. I believe they addressed that question and issued an opinion on it recently. But, again, I am just sort of recollecting something I read.

I would say more generally, though--and maybe it is off topic, in which case feel free to cut me off. But I do think it is important for judges and Justices to get out, particularly get out of Washington a little bit. I've always enjoyed going to the law schools, participating in the moot courts or, you know, functions where you get to visit with the law students. I've done that a few times--not a lot, a few times. I wouldn't call that by any stretch of the imagination "a junket." But I do think it's important for the Justices to get out around the country and particularly visit the law schools. That is probably not the same sort of thing you are talking about.

Senator Feingold. Fair enough, and I think you would agree that there is nothing wrong with judges or Senators golfing. That is not the question.

Judge Roberts. It may not be good for the game of golf, but...

[Laughter.]

Senator Feingold. In 2000, Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote a letter supporting repeal of a provision of the Ethics Reform Act of 1989 that bans honoraria for judges. Do you believe that the law should be changed to permit judges to take honoraria for speeches or appearances?

Judge Roberts. There again, Senator, that's not an issue I've looked at. I know the law prohibits that. I know that there was a case about that, and the Supreme Court decided that, to some extent, that prohibition was unconstitutional as applied to lower-level officials but constitutional as applied to others. It's not a question that I've addressed.

Senator Feingold. Just to return for the record for a moment, the item that the judge referred to in terms of Judicial Conference policy is actually the policy that I was concerned about that I thought was a step backward, and I just wanted that reflected in the record.

Judicial Philosophy and Constitutional Interpretation

[Opening statement:] My personal appreciation that I owe a great debt to others reinforces my view that a certain humility should characterize the judicial role. Judges and Justices are servants of the law, not the other way around. Judges are like umpires. Umpires don't make the rules, they apply them. The role of an umpire and a judge is critical. They make sure everybody plays by the rules, but it is a limited role. Nobody ever went to a ball game to see the umpire.

Judges have to have the humility to recognize that they operate within a system of precedent shaped by other judges equally striving to live up to the judicial oath, and judges have to have the modesty to be open in the decisional process to the considered views of their colleagues on the bench.

Mr. Chairman, when I worked in the Department of Justice in the Office of the Solicitor General, it was my job to argue cases for the United States before the Supreme Court. I always found it very moving to stand before the Justices and say, "I speak for my country." But it was after I left the Department and began arguing cases against the United States, that I fully appreciated the importance of the Supreme Court in our constitutional system. Here was the United States, the most powerful entity in the world, aligned against my client, and yet all I had to do was convince the Court that I was right on the law, and the Government was wrong, and all that power and might would recede in deference to the rule of law.

That is a remarkable thing. It is what we mean when we say that we are a Government of laws and not of men. It is that rule of law that protects the rights and liberties of all Americans. It is the envy of the world, because without the rule of law, any rights are meaningless.

President Ronald Reagan used to speak of the Soviet Constitution, and he noted that it purported to grant wonderful rights of all sorts to people, but those rights were empty promises because that system did not have an independent judiciary to uphold the rule of law and enforce those rights. We do, because of the wisdom of our Founders and the sacrifices of our heroes over the generations to make their vision a reality.

Mr. Chairman, I come before the Committee with no agenda. I have no platform. Judges are not politicians who can promise to do certain things in exchange for votes. I have no agenda, but I do have a commitment. If I am confirmed, I will confront every case with an open mind. I will fully and fairly analyze the legal arguments that are presented. I will be open to the considered views of my colleagues on the bench, and I will decide every case based on the record, according to the rule of law, without fear or favor, to the best of my ability, and I will remember that it's my job to call balls and strikes, and not to pitch or bat.

. . . If I am confirmed, I will be vigilant to protect the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court, and I will work to ensure that it upholds the rule of law and safeguards those liberties that make this land one of endless possibilities for all Americans.

Senator Hatch. I read an interesting book over the weekend, Cass Sunstein's book, recent book published by Basic Books. He discussed various philosophies with regard too judging, and I would just like to ask you this question. Some of the philosophies he discussed were whether a judge should be an originalist, a strict constructionist, a fundamentalist, a perfectionist, a majoritarian or a minimalist. Which of those categories do you fit in?

Judge Roberts. Well, I haven't--I didn't have a chance to read Professor Sunstein's book. He writes a different one every week, it's hard to keep up with.

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. But, you know, I think--

Senator Hatch. I have read a number of them.

Judge Roberts. Like most people, I resist the labels. I have told people when pressed that I prefer to be known as a modest judge, and to me that means some of the things that you talked about in those other labels. It means an appreciation that the role of the judge is limited, that a judge is to decide the cases before them, they're not to legislate, they're not to execute the laws.

Another part of that humility has to do with respect for precedent that forms part of the rule of law that the judge is obligated to apply under principles of stare decisis. Part of that modesty has to do with being open to the considered views of your colleagues on the bench. I would say that's one of the things I've learned the most in the past two years on the Court of Appeals, how valuable it is to function in a collegial way with your colleagues on the bench, other judges being open to your views, you being open to theirs. They, after all, are in the same position you're in. They've read the same briefs. They heard the same arguments. They've looked at the same cases. And if they're seeing things in a very different way, you need to be open to that and try to take another look at your view and make sure that you're on solid ground.

Now, I think that general approach results in a modest approach to judging which is good for the legal system as a whole. I don't think the courts should have a dominant role in society and stressing society's problems. It is their job to say what the law is. That's what Chief Justice Marshall said, of course, in Marbury v. Madison. And, yes, there will be times when either the Executive Branch or the Legislative Branch exceeds the limits of their powers under the Constitution or transgresses one of the provisions of the Bill of Rights, and then it is emphatically the obligation of the courts to step up and say what the Constitution provides, and to strike down either unconstitutional legislation or unconstitutional Executive action.

But the Court has to appreciate that the reason they have that authority is because they're interpreting the law, they're not making policy, and to the extent they go beyond their confined limits and make policy or execute the law, they lose their legitimacy, and I think that calls into question the authority they will need when it's necessary to act in the face of unconstitutional action.

Senator Hatch. I know that I have only mentioned a few of these so-called descriptions of various philosophical attitudes with regard to judging, but am I correct in interpreting that you are probably eclectic, that you would take whatever is the correct way of judging out of each one of those provisions? There may be truths in each one of those provisions, that none of them absolutely creates an absolute way of judging.

Judge Roberts. Well, I have said I do not have an overarching judicial philosophy that I bring to every case, and I think that's true. I tend to look at the cases from the bottom up rather than the top down. And like I think all good judges focus a lot on the facts. We talk about the law, and that's a great interest for all of us, but I think most cases turn on the facts, so you do have to know those, you have to know the record.

In terms of the application of the law, you begin obviously with the precedents before you. There are some cases where everybody's going to be a literalist. If the phrase in the Constitution says two-thirds of the Senate, everybody's a literalist when they interpret that. Other phrases in the Constitution are broader, "unreasonable searches and seizures." You can look at that wording all day and it's not going to give you much progress in deciding whether a particular search is reasonable or not. You have to begin looking at the cases and the precedents, what the Framers had in mind when they drafted that provision.

So, yes, it does depend upon the nature of the case before you I think.

Senator Hatch. Please help the Committee sort this out by describing further the role you believe unelected judges play or should play in our system of Government. Are they charged, for example, with using the Constitution to effect cultural and political reform, or does the Constitution require that this should be left to the people and their elected representatives? How can the Judiciary sit in constitutional judgment over the Legislative and Executive branches while still remaining co-equal with them? If you could kind of take a crack at those various questions, I would appreciate it.

Judge Roberts. Well, Justice White's insight that was quoted by Senator DeWine yesterday, that judges' obligation is to decide cases, really has constitutional significance. It goes back to Marbury v. Madison. You know, the Constitution doesn't have any provision that says, oh, and the judges, by the way, are to interpret the Constitution and tell us what it means. What it says it that the judges are to decide cases that arise under this Constitution, this new Constitution, and under any new laws that the Congress might pass. And what Chief Justice Marshall explained in Marbury v. Madison was that, well, if we've got to decide cases, that's our constitutional obligation, we've got to decide whether in a particular case something's consistent with the Constitution or not. So we have to decide what the Constitution means, and that's what the Framers intended.

So the obligation to decide cases is the only basis for the authority to interpret the Constitution and laws. That means that judges should be careful in making sure that they have a real case in front of them, a real live dispute between parties who have actual injury involved, actual interests at stake, because that is the basis for their legitimacy. And then they're to decide that case as a judge would, not as a legislator would based on any view of what's the best policy, but as a judge would based on the law. That's why the Framers were willing to have the judges decide cases that required them to interpret the Constitution, because they were going to decide it according to the rule of law.

If the people who framed our Constitution were jealous of their freedom and liberty, they would not have sat around and said, "Let's take all the hard issues and give them over to the judges." That would have been the furthest thing from their mind. Now, judges have to decide hard questions when they come up in the context of a particular case. That's their obligation. But they have to decide those questions according to the rule of law, not their own social preferences, not their policy views, not their personal preferences, according to the rule of law.

Senator Hatch. You have explained that it is not the duty of the Judiciary to make the law or to execute it, but to interpret it. I am not naive. Sometimes interpretation is more of an art than a science. There are those who would label "interpretation" absolutely anything a judge might do, or to the text of a statute or Constitution. But it seems to me there comes a point where a judge is using his own creativity and purpose, and crosses the line between interpreting a text written by somebody else, and in a sense creating something new. Now that troubles me, since as I said earlier, I believe in the separation of powers. If a judge crosses the line between interpreting and making the law, he has crossed the line supporting his legitimate authority from the Legislative branch's authority. To me that is a very serious matter.

If we believe, as America's Founders did, that the separation of powers, not just in theory or in textbook, but in practice in the actually functioning of Government is the linchpin of limited Government and liberty.

How do you distinguish between these two roles of interpreting and making law? And can you assure the Senate and the American people that you will stay on your side of this line?

Judge Roberts. I will certainly make every effort to do so, Senator. I appreciate the point that in some cases the question of whether you are interpreting the law or making the law, that that line is hard to draw in some cases. I would say not in most cases. I think most cases, most judges, know what it means to interpret the law, and can recognize when they're going too far into an area of making law, but certainly there are harder cases. And someone like Justice Harlan always used to explain that when you get to those hard cases, you do need to focus again on the question of legitimacy, and make sure that this is the question that you the judge are supposed to be deciding rather than someone else.

You go to a case like the Lochner case. You can red that opinion today and it's quite clear that they're not interpreting the law, they're making the law. The judgment is right there. They say: We don't think it's too much for a baker to work whatever it was, 13 hours a day. We think the legislature made a mistake in saying they should regulate this for their health. We don't think it hurts their health at all.

It's right there in the opinion. You can look at that and see that they are substituting their judgment on a policy matter for what the legislature had said. So, you know, the fact that it's difficult to draw the line doesn't relieve a judge of an obligation to draw the line.

There are those more academic theorists who say it is a question of degree, and since it's just a question of degree, you shouldn't try to draw the line, because it's hard sometimes to interpret the law without making the law. We'll throw our hands up and say, well, judges make the law, and proceed from that.

That has not been my experience either as a judge or an advocate. My experience has been in most cases you can see where the line is, and you do know when judges are exceeding their authority and making a law, rather than interpreting it, and careful judges are always vigilant to make sure that they're adhering to their proper function and not going into the legislative area.

DOJ_NMG_0035823

Senator Grassley. . . . So, Judge Roberts, beyond your umpire analogy, what do you understand to be the role of a judge in a democratic society? And I would like your reaction to a quote of Justice Cardozo on the nature of the judicial process, and he said this, not paraphrasing but direct quote: "The judge, even when he is free, is still not wholly free. He is not to innovate at pleasure. He is not knight-errant roaming at will in pursuit of his own ideal of beauty or of goodness. He is not to yield to spasmodic sentiment, to vague or unregulated benevolence. He is to exercise a discretion informed by tradition, methodized by analogy, disciplined by system, and subordinated to the primordial necessity of order in social life. Wide enough in all conscience is the field of discretion that remains."

What do you think Justice Cardozo meant by that passage? And do you agree with it?

Judge Roberts. I know I agree with it. Now let me figure out what he meant by it.

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. I think what he meant was that judges operate as judges when they are confined by the law. When I became a lawyer, the proclamation they read for the graduates, they referred to the law as "the wise restraints that make men free." And judges are the same way. We don't turn a matter over to a judge because we want his view about what the best idea is, what the best solution is. It's because we want him or her to apply the law. They are constrained when they do that. They are constrained by the words that you choose to enact into law in interpreting the law. They are constrained by the words of the Constitution. They are constrained by the precedents of other judges that become part of the rule of law that they must apply. And that cabining of their discretion, that is what Hamilton referred to in Federalist 78. He said judges should not have an absolute discretion; they need to be bound down by rules and precedents--the rules, the laws that you pass, the precedents that judges before them have shaped. And then their job is interpreting the law. It is not making the law. And so long as they are being confined by the laws, by the Constitution, by the precedents, then you're more comfortable that you're exercising the judicial function. It's when you're at sea and you don't have anything to look to that you need to begin to worry that this isn't what judges are supposed to do.

Senator Grassley. Well, is there any room in constitutional interpretation for the judge's own values or beliefs?

Judge Roberts. No, I don't think there is. Sometimes it's hard to give meaning to a constitutional term in a particular case. But you don't look to your own values and beliefs. You look outside yourself to other sources. This is the basis for, you know, that judges wear black robes, because it doesn't matter who they are as individuals. That's not going to shape their decision. It's their understanding of the law that will shape their decision.

Senator Grassley. Some legal scholars claim that when the political branches of Government are slow to act, the broad and spacious terms of the Constitution lend themselves to Court-created solutions. So you agree with this role of the Court?

Judge Roberts. I have said that it is not the job of the Court to solve society's problems, and I believe that. It is the job of the Court to decide particular cases. Now, sometimes cases are brought and the courts have to decide them even though the other branches have been slow to act, as you say. Brown v. Board of Education is a good example. The other branches and society were not addressing the problems of segregation in the schools. They were not just slow to act. They weren't acting. But that didn't mean the courts should step in and act. But when the courts were presented with a case that presented the challenge, this segregation violates the Equal Protection Clause, the courts did have the obligation to decide that case and resolve it, and in the course of doing that, of course, change the course of American history.

Senator Grassley. Your reference to Brown would be a good time to throw in this question. Do you agree with the view that the courts, rather than the elected branches, should take the lead in creating a more just society?

Judge Roberts. Again, it is the obligation of the courts to decide particular cases. Often that means acting on the side of justice as we understand it, enforcing the Bill of Rights, enforcing the Equal Protection Clause. But it has to be in the context of a case, and it has to be in the context of interpreting a provision that's implicated in that case. They don't have a license to go out and decide I think this is an injustice and so I'm going to do something to fix it. That type of judicial role I think is inconsistent with the role the Framers intended. When they have to decide a case, it may well from time to time in particular cases put them in the role of vindicating the vision of justice that the Framers enacted in the Constitution, and that is a legitimate role for them. But it's always in the context of deciding a proper case that's been presented.

Senator Grassley. Judge Roberts, during the Souter nomination, I questioned--and I didn't go back and check the record just to see exactly what I said, but I questioned in some way about how he would interpret statutory law. Justice Souter responded to some of my questions by talking about vacuums in the law, specifically that the courts--and these are his words--"fill vacuums that are maybe left by Congress."

This concept was troubling to me then and remains so today, and if Justice Souter is listening, I would like to say to him, well, you know, maybe Congress intended to leave some vacuums.

So I would like to know how much filling in of vacuums in the law left by Congress will you do as a Supreme Court Justice. Do you think this is the way for the Court to be activist in that courts will be deciding how to fill in generalities and resolve contradictions in law?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't want to directly comment on what Justice Souter said. He's either going to be a colleague or continue to be one of my bosses.

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. So I want to maintain good relations in either case. But I do think it's important to recognize in construing legislation that sometimes a decision has been made not to address a particular problem. That isn't a license for the courts to go ahead and address it because that would be overriding a congressional decision. At the same time, as is always the case, courts are sometimes put in the position of having to decide a question that Congress has left deliberately or inadvertently unanswered. We see that in the issue of what remedies are available under an implied right of action when Congress has not spelled them out and the courts sometimes have to address that sort of question. And if it's presented in a case, it's unavoidable.

But, again, I resort back to the bedrock principle of legitimacy in the American system for courts, which is that any authority to interpret the law, any authority to interpret the Constitution, derives from the obligation to decide a particular case or controversy.

Senator Grassley. In your confirmation for the D.C. Circuit, you answered a question, asked by another member, whether you supported the originalist approach to constitutional interpretation by saying this, so I hope I am quoting you accurately: "I do not have an all-encompassing approach to constitutional interpretation. The appropriate approach depends to some degree on the specific provisions at issue. Some provisions of the Constitution provide considerable guidance on how they should be construed; others are less precise. I would not hew to a particular school of interpretation but would follow the approach or approaches that seem most suited in the particular case to correctly discerning the meaning of the provision at issue."

Could you explain what approaches you are talking about? I am not sure in your quote what you are getting at. Secondly, can you give some examples? And, three, I would like to know when you do not believe that the originalist approach is the right approach.

Judge Roberts. Well, I think it's very important to define these terms. Let's take "the originalist approach." I do think it's the--that the Framers' intent is the guiding principle that should apply. However, you do need to be very careful and make sure that you're giving appropriate weight to the words that the Framers used to embody their intent.

I think in particular of the 14th Amendment and the Equal Protection Clause. There are some who may think they're being originalists who will tell you, well, the problem they were getting at were the rights of the newly freed slaves, and so that's all that the Equal Protection Clause applies to. But, in fact, they didn't write the Equal Protection Clause in such narrow terms. They wrote more generally. That may have been a particular problem motivating them, but they chose to use broader terms, and we should take them at their word, so that it is perfectly appropriate to apply the Equal Protection Clause to issues of gender and other types of discrimination beyond the racial discrimination that was obviously the driving force behind it. That is an originalist view because you're looking at the original intent as expressed in the words that they chose, and their intent was to use broad language, not to use narrow language.

There are some areas where a very strict textualist approach makes the most sense. Obviously, the example I gave earlier, two-thirds means two-thirds. You don't say, well, their purpose was to apply some super-majority requirement, and now that we have more Senators, three-fifths will give effect to that intent. Nobody would apply that approach. You stick to the language.

In other areas, the Court's precedents dictate the approach. This is not something that is purely a matter of academic exercise. For example, on the Seventh Amendment, the right to a jury trial, the Court has been very specific. We have a historical approach there. The job of a judge is to sort of look at whatever action is and try to analogize it. What would that be most like in 1787? And if you got a jury trial for that, you get one today; and if you didn't, you don't. It's a purely historical approach.

So the approaches do vary, and I don't have an overarching view. As a matter of fact, I don't think very many judges do. I think a lot of academics do. But the demands of deciding cases and the demands of deciding cases by committee, either a group of three or a group of nine, I find with those demands the nuances of academic theory are dispensed with fairly quickly, and judges take a more practical and pragmatic approach to trying to reach the best decision consistent with the rule of law.

Senator Kyl. . . . So really the question here is how you view your role as a judge with respect to this concept of advancing freedom and progress, especially since you cannot, for the most part, choose what cases come before you to decide. What is your take on your role if you were to become the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court in considering this notion of advancing freedom and progress through your decision making?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, judges and Justices do have a side in these disputes. They need to be on the side of the Constitution, and in most of these areas, what the Constitution provides is that these sorts of policy debates, which approach is better suited to promote freedom or to promote progress are vested in the Legislative Branch. There are areas where the Constitution sets aside certain areas, in the Bill of Rights and other protections of liberty, and says that these areas are beyond the reach of the policymaking branches and judges and Justices have the responsibility to enforce those provisions in the Constitution. But outside of that, judges and Justices should not take sides in these disputes.

I think people on both sides need to know that if they go to the Supreme Court that they're going to be on a level playing field, that the judge is going to interpret the law, that the judge is going to apply the Constitution and not take sides in their dispute. That's what this body is for in Congress and in the State legislatures, to resolve those types of policy disputes. So long as the resolution is consistent with the Constitution, that's what the judges are there to ensure, and so long as they ensure that, the Framers' notion was that freedom and progress would be advanced by allowing those decisions to be made by the people's elected representatives.

Senator Kohl. … Judge Roberts, yesterday you describe your role as a judge as just an umpire, as you called it, calling balls and strikes. That is an interesting analogy for me as I have more than most some personal experience with umpires and referees. But as all of us with any involvement in sports know, no two umpires or no two referees have the same strike zone or call the same kind of a basketball game, and ballplayers and basketball players understand that, depending upon who the umpire is and who the referee is, the game can be called entirely differently.

When we look at real legal cases, I wonder whether or not your analogy works. For example, in our private conversation, I asked you whether the words of the Constitution must always be interpreted in the same way as the authors originally intended. For example, the 14th Amendment, which guarantees equal protection under the laws to all citizens, was written at a time when schools were, in fact, segregated based on race. And yet in Brown v. Board of Education, the Equal Protection Clause was interpreted to find segregation schools unconstitutional, and you, of course, have endorsed that decision.

No one disagrees with that conclusion today, but would a neutral umpire, as you described yourself yesterday, have decided back in 1954 to expand the words of the Constitution outside of the strike zone? Would a neutral umpire have overturned a 58-year-old Supreme Court precedent and gone against the understanding of the authors of the 14th Amendment and also the views of almost half of the State legislatures at that time in making the decision that they made?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I think the answer to your question is yes. The research into the original understanding of the drafters of the 14th Amendment has expanded and changed quite a bit, and I think a very good case can be made about their views. But, more importantly, the issue was the institution of public education wasn't as established at the time as it was in 1954, the time of the crafting of the amendment. And, you know, the Framers spoke in broad language, and whether they specifically addressed the question of public education or not isn't the limitation. Their intent was not limited to the particular problem. They chose broad language, and they should be held to their word. And I think it is perfectly consistent with an original understanding to argue and to conclude that their original understanding meant that segregated schools were unconstitutional, not just in 1954 but at the time they enacted the amendment. I think a strong case can be made there.

And what was interesting about the Brown case--maybe it's my own perspective, but if you look at the arguments in that case, yes, John W. Davis arguing for the Board was arguing on the basis of precedent in Plessy v. Ferguson, saying this is the established law. But so was Thurgood Marshall. He went in and he was arguing on the basis of more recent precedent, Sweatt v Painter, a more recent decision of the Court about law school separate but equal. And he was saying you need to build on that more recent precedent in addressing this case.

So the Court was not changing the strike zone. That wasn't the way Marshall presented his argument. And it wasn't necessary for them to say we're changing the rules of the game. What was necessary for them to do and what Marshall was urging them to do was to get it right when they had gotten it wrong in Plessy.

Senator Kohl. Judge, back in 1954, clearly the Supreme Court Justices were willing to step outside the box, to break new ground, to do something that no one, no Court, no legislature, no President had done before, and strike out in an entirely new and positive direction for this country. They were not umpires simply calling balls and strikes. They were breaking new ground, and they did so in the best interest of our country, didn't they?

Judge Roberts. Well, of course, it was a dramatic shift, and the overruling of Plessy v. Ferguson was exactly that. My point is simply that if you look at the Brown decision, it is more consistent with the 14th Amendment and the original understanding of the 14th Amendment than Plessy v. Ferguson, and it's based on the conclusion that the separation of the races in the schools was itself a violation of equal protection. In other words, it's not a departure from the 14th Amendment. It was a departure from the--

Senator Kohl. But it was ground-breaking.

Judge Roberts. Certainly.

Senator Kohl. One more observation, Judge, about your analogy of the judge as an umpire, neutral umpire. You are 50 years old. You bring great life experience to the bench, Judge, and don't you and all judges bring their own life experiences, their philosophies to the bench in deciding cases? Or would you have us believe--and if not, you can correct that--that judges merely operate as automatons?

Judge Roberts. Not automatons, no, Senator. I appreciate that, that judges don't. And, of course, we all bring our life experiences to the bench. But I will say this: that the ideal in the American justice system is epitomized by the fact that judges, Justices, do wear the black robes, and that is meant to symbolize the fact that they're not individuals promoting their own particular views, but they are supposed to be doing their best to interpret the law, to interpret the Constitution, according to the rule of law, not their own preferences, not their own personal beliefs. That's the ideal.

Senator Kohl. And isn't it also true that, to a large extent, the greatest men in our history, judicial, executive, legislative, have been men and women with both great minds and great hearts?

Judge Roberts. Absolutely.

Senator Graham. The idea of a dramatic departure under your watch from the Rehnquist era is probably not going to happen, is that true?

Judge Roberts. Given my view of the role of a judge, which focuses on the appropriate modesty and humility, the notion of dramatic departures is not one that I would hold out much hope for.

Senator Graham. I know people do not like being labeled, put me in that category, but I am in a business where people label me all the time. But I ask for it, I run for office. But we do tend in our business of politics to try to label people, particularly when we are talking about judges. When the President introduced you to the United States, to the people of the United States, he said you were a strict constructionist. Do you know what he meant by that and why he chose to use those words?

Judge Roberts. Well, I'd hope what he meant by that is somebody who's going to be faithful to the text of the Constitution, to the intent of those who drafted it, while appreciating that sometimes the phrases they used, they were drafting a Constitution for the ages to secure the blessings of liberty for their posterity, they were looking ahead, and so they often used phrases that they intended to have a--

Senator Graham. Does that term make you feel uncomfortable?

Judge Roberts. No.

Senator Cornyn. . . . First was the umpire that says, "Some are balls, and some are strikes, and I call them the way they are." The second umpire says, "Some are balls and some are strikes, and I call them the way I see them." The third said, "Some are balls and some are strikes, but they ain't nothing till I call them."

Well, I do not know whether it is a fair question to ask you. Which of those three types of umpires represents your preferred mode of judicial reasoning, but I wonder if you have any comment about that.

Judge Roberts. Well, I think I agree with your point about the danger of analogies in some situations. It's not the last, because they are balls and strikes regardless, and if I call them one and they are the other, that doesn't change what they are. It just means that I got it wrong. I guess I like the one in the middle because I do think there are right answers. I know that it's fashionable in some places to suggest that there are no right answers and that the judges are motivated by a constellation of different considerations, and because of that it should affect how we approach certain other issues. That's not the view of the law that I subscribe to.

I think when you folks legislate, you do have something in mind in particular, and you put it into words, and you expect judges not to put in their own preference, not to substitute their judgment for you, but to implement your view of what you are accomplishing in that statute.

I think when the Framers framed the Constitution it was the same thing, and the judges are not to put in their own personal views about what the Constitution should say, but they are supposed to interpret it and apply the meaning that is in the Constitution, and I think there is meaning there, and I think there is meaning in your legislation, and the job of a good judge is to do as good a job as possible to get the right answer.

Again, I know there are those theorists who think that is futile, or because it is hard in particular cases, we should just throw up our hands and not try in any case, and I do not subscribe to that. I believe that there are right answers, and judges, if they work hard enough, are likely to come up with them.

Senator Cornyn. . . . Judges are not in the business of picking winners and losers before they have actually heard the case, of course. I mean that is fundamental to our concept of justice, that a judge be open-minded, be willing to listen to the facts and arguments of counsel, and then make a decision.

And the process that you use is by applying neutral principles. In other words, when you make a decision based on the Commerce Clause or even based on stare decisis, does that really have anything to do with the ultimate result? In other words, do you start with the results you want to reach first and then go back and try to rationalize it or justify it by the way you read the Commerce Clause of the Constitution, or apply the legal doctrine of stare decisis?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator. It's saying a judge is result oriented, that type of judge. That's about the worst thing you can say about a judge.

Senator Cornyn. Those are almost fighting words.

Judge Roberts. It's about the worst thing you can say because what you're saying is, you don't apply the law to tell you what the results should be. You don't go through the judicial decisional process. You don't look to the principles that are established in the Constitution or the law. You look to what you think the result should be, and then you go back and try to rationalize it, and that's not the way the system is supposed to work.

DOJ_NMG_0035830

Senator Brownback. [after line of questioning concerning Congress's ability to limit the Court's jurisdiction/checks and balances on the Court] Then what check is there on the Court's power?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think the primary check is the same one that Alexander Hamilton talked about in the Federalist Papers, because the exact argument was raising in the debates about the Constitution. People were concerned about a new Judiciary, what was it going to do? They were concerned that it might deprive them of their rights. And of course, Hamilton's famous answer was that Judiciary was going to be the least dangerous branch because it had no power. It didn't have the sword. It didn't have the purse. And the judges were not going to be able to deprive people of their liberty because they were going to be bound down by rules and precedents. They were going to just interpret the law. And if judges just interpreted the law, there was no threat to liberty from the Judicial Branch.

So I would say the primary check on the courts has always been judicial self-restraint, and a recognition on the part of judges that they have a limited task, that they are insulated from the people. They're given life tenure, as you mentioned, precisely because they're not shaping policy. They're not supposed to be responsive. They're supposed to just interpret the law.

Senator Brownback. I guess that is the area that has so many people concerned, is that the Judiciary does not show restraint, and judicial restraint is the limitation on the courts, such as in the Takings Clause we just had really, where the Court is saying, "Well, no, this is a broader power." But if you do not restrain yourselves, then who does within this system? Obviously there are restraints on the Congress, there are restraints on the President. We like that system. We want that check and balance system. I think the Framers put that Exceptions Clause and other things in there for clear purpose, for clear reason.

Let me take you on to another area because that one I think you are going to see a lot of action as you get pushing back and forth between the three branches of Government, and a number of people feeling like the Judiciary has not show judicial restraint in recent years.

Senator Brownback. . . . As you go on, and I anticipate you will be approved to be the Chief Justice of the United States, I would ask you just if you could briefly to respond, how do you view his mentorship of you and your taking over, if you are confirmed, as Chief Justice? What does that mean personally to you and how will it impact you as Chief Justice?

Judge Roberts. Well, it makes the opportunity a very special one, as I've said before. The Chief was a mentor to many people, and like many great mentors, of course, he led by example, not by precept. His example of how he dealt with other people, not just other Justices but everybody in the courthouse, including the law clerks, in an open, friendly, balanced way was an example for everybody there.

Substantively, his approach to the role of a judge and the appropriate role of the Court is, I think, a very important example. He was somebody who appreciated the limits, the appropriate limits on the judicial role and the judicial power, and he was always careful and conscious of that. He was always asking whether or not this was something that it was appropriate for the courts to do.

I do think it's important for judges at every level to always ask that question, because as we had talked earlier, judicial self-restraint is the key check on the authority of the court, and if you're not asking yourself that question at every stage, is this an appropriate thing for me to do as a judge, then there's a great danger that you'll lose sight of that important judicial self-restraint.

Chairman Specter. . . . Near the end of my questioning I had commented on the case of United States v. Dickerson where the Chief Justice had made a modification of his earlier objections to Miranda and said that the Miranda warnings ought to be upheld, contrasting his view in 1974 in a Supreme Court decision with his view in the year 2000, saying that Miranda should not be overruled because it has been embedded in routine police practices and become a part of our national culture, and that has all of the earmarks of a doctrine of a living Constitution.

Dissenting in Poe v. Ullman, Justice John Marshall Harlan made one of the famous statements on this issue, saying that the--commenting on liberty, quote, "The traditions from which it is developed," that tradition is a living thing. My question to you is, do you regard the evolution of various interpretations on liberty as a living thing, as Justice Harlan did and as Justice Rehnquist appeared to on the Miranda issue?

Judge Roberts. I think the Framers, when they used broad language like "liberty," like "due process," like "unreasonable" with respect to searches and seizures, they were crafting a document that they intended to apply in a meaningful way down the ages. As they said in the preamble, it was designed to secure the blessings of liberty for their posterity, they intended it to apply to changing conditions, and I think that in that sense it is a concept that is alive in the sense that it applies and they intended it to apply in a particular way, but they intended it to apply down through the ages.

Chairman Specter. Well, when you talk about intent, I think that is a pretty tough interpretation. When the Equal Protection Clause was passed by the Senate in 1868, the Senate galleries were segregated, blacks on one side and whites on the other. So that could not have been their intent. The interpretation which occurs later really is captured by Justice Cardozo in the case of Palco v. Connecticut, a case which impressed me enormously back in the law school days, when talking about the constitutional evolution referred to it as expressing values which are, "the very essence of a scheme of order to liberty," "principles of justice so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental." Would you agree with the Cardozo statement of jurisprudence which I just quoted?

Judge Roberts. Well, the general approach of recognizing the values that inform the interpretation of the Constitution, it applies to modern times. But just to take the example that you gave of the Equal Protection Clause. The Framers choose broad terms of broad applicability, and they state a broad principle, and the fact that it may have been inconsistent with their practice may have meant that they were adopting a broad principle that was inconsistent with their practice, and their practices would have to change, as they did, with respect to segregation in the Senate galleries, with respect to segregation in other areas.

But when they adopt broad terms and broad principles, we should hold them to their word, and imply them consistent with those terms and those principles. And that means when they have adopted principles like liberty, that doesn't get a crabbed or narrow construction. It is a broad principle that should be applied consistent with their intent, which was to adopt a broad principle.

I depart from some views of original intent in the sense that those folks, some people view it as meaning just the conditions at that time, just the particular problem. I think you need to look at the words they used, and if the words adopt a broader principle, it applies more broadly.

Chairman Specter. Well, I will accept that as an indication of your view not to have a "crabbed interpretation" and applying the broad principles.

Senator Hatch. [comment, not question] I think you have really acquitted yourself as well as anybody I have seen in the ten nominations for the Supreme Court that I have been part of. And I just have to--I want to correct the record a little bit. It isn't the Ginsburg rule, although that has been referred to by almost all of us, including me. It is the Thurgood Marshall rule, the Rehnquist rule, the Kennedy-Souter-Thomas-Ginsburg-Breyer, just to name a few, rule because in every case, as I stated in my original remarks, the individual nominee has to draw a line as to what they can discuss and what they cannot. And you have drawn, I think, a fair line here throughout these proceedings, and I commend you for it. And there is just no excuse for being pushed to try and answer questions about cases that are likely to come before the Court or presently are before the Court. And I think the American people are starting to really fully realize that now as a result of these hearings.

Senator Hatch. Well, thank you. Now, also yesterday the Democrat staff of the Committee released a press release stating that you failed to distance yourself from what it called your "earlier cramped positions on Title IX and women's rights." And after listening to you yesterday, I did not find your earlier positions cramped at all. In fact, as you explained here to the Committee, many of the documents that questioners relied upon reflected the positions of the Reagan administration for which you worked.
Now, what assurance can you give the Committee that you will fairly interpret the civil rights laws, including critical statutes such as Title IX, fully and fairly, consistent with the purposes Congress intended in passing these laws?

Judge Roberts. Well, I can give the commitment that I appreciate that my role as a judge is different than my role as a staff lawyer for an administration. As a judge, I have no agenda. I have a guide in the Constitution and the laws and the precedents of the Court, and those are what I would apply with an open mind, after fully and fairly considering the arguments and assessing the considered views of my colleagues on the bench. That's the way I would approach cases in that area, as in any other area.

The approach of someone who is obviously a staff lawyer in an administration is very different. The approach of someone who is an advocate for a client before the Court is obviously very different. Those are positions that I have held in the past. I am now a judge, and I have had the experience and I think my record will establish that that is how I approach cases across the spectrum of issues that are raised before the courts.

Senator Hatch. And reasonable people can differ on some of these issues.

Judge Roberts. Oh, certainly.

Senator Grassley. The Supreme Court has repeatedly stated that the legislative history of a particular bill is critical to interpretation of the statute. Of course, Justice Scalia is of the opinion that most expressions of legislative history, like committee reports or statements by the Senators on the floor, or in the House, are not entitled to great weight because they are unreliable indicators of legislative intent. Presumably, Justice Scalia believes that if the members don't actually write a report or don't actually vote on a report, then there is no need to defer to this expression of congressional intent.

Now, obviously, I have great regard for Justice Scalia, his intellect and legal reasoning. But, of course, as I told you in my office, I don't really agree with his position.

So I would like to ask you five questions. They are relatively short, so I will ask them all at once. What is your opinion, how important is legislative history to you? How have you utilized it? And will it be any different from your use on the circuit court versus what you might do on the Supreme Court? And did you refer to any committee reports or congressional debate in any of your 39 briefs before the Supreme Court? And to what extent do you--and don't start out with this last one. To what extent do you share Justice Scalia's view on unreliability of legislative history? Although that is important, I would like--and I can repeat those, if you forget what I have asked.

Judge Roberts. Sure. Well, if I leave one out, you can remind me at the end. But obviously when you are dealing with interpreting a statute, the most important part is the text. You begin with the text, and as the Supreme Court has said, in many cases, perhaps most cases, that's also where you end. The answer is clear.

I have, though, as a judge, relied on legislative history to help clarify ambiguity in the text. The Supreme Court stated once--and I think it's a very important principle--you look to legislative history to clarify ambiguity. You don't look to legislative history to create ambiguity. In other words, if the text is clear, that is what you follow, and that's binding. And you don't look beyond it to say, well, if you look here, though, maybe this clear word should be interpreted a different way.

On the other hand, we confront situations where the text is not clear, and the legislative history can be helpful in resolving that ambiguity. It requires a certain sensitivity to what you're dealing with. All legislative history is not created equal. There's a difference between the weight that you give a conference report and the weight you give a statement of one legislator on the floor. You have to, I think, have some degree of sensitivity in understanding exactly what you're looking at, appreciate where those comments were made in the legislative process, be careful to make sure that they're dealing with the same language that was eventually adopted. You have to, for example, be very skeptical about statements by opponents of the bill. It's quite a common thing saying, well, this bill would do this, this, and this, and so we shouldn't pass it. That's not always the best guide as to what the sponsors really intended in the language. So it does require a certain sensitivity to what you're dealing with.

But I have quoted and looked to legislative history in the past to help determine the meaning of ambiguous terms, and I would expect to follow that same approach on the Supreme Court. I don't think there's a difference there in terms of what things you think it is appropriate to look to, to help you do your job, which is to figure out what Congress intended.

Senator Grassley. And you didn't address Justice Scalia, but let me put it another way so I don't put you in a bad position. You would see, at least in some instances, where it needs to be used, reliability in legislative history.

Judge Roberts. In some instances, I think if you look at it carefully, you can make an assessment that this is a reliable guide. And one area I didn't touch on in my arguments, I've certainly relied on legislative history in presenting arguments because, of course, in the Supreme Court you need five votes and not just the one. So you tend to cast your net as widely as possible. And at argument sometimes, Justice Scalia would not be as receptive to an argument based on legislative history as some of the others, but, again, the name of the game is counting to five when you're arguing up there. And so I've certainly made arguments based on legislative history.

Senator Grassley. In regard to how you view and use legislative history, I would like to discuss your opinion in the Totten v. Bombardier Corporation case interpreting the False Claims Act. The issue on appeal was whether Bombardier had met the presentment requirements of the False Claims Act. To violate the statute according to Section 3729(a)(1), a company must have presented its false claim to an officer or employee of the Federal Government. Importantly, Section 3729(c) explicitly provide that the term "claim" includes demands for payment submitted to Government contractors whether or not they are resubmitted to the Federal Government.

In your opinion, you wrote that those facts of that case did not consist of a false claims under the False Claims Act because there can only be a false claim if it is literally presented to somebody that is a Federal Government employee, I assume.

It seems to me that to reach this result, you inserted a resubmission requirement into the law in a place where it doesn't, in fact, appear, Section 3729(a)(1), and, in fact, gave short shrift to the legislative history, which spelled out what Congress intended when it amended the Act in 1986. The legislative history of the Act and the Senate Committee report--and I didn't refer to my authorship of the legislation, but, anyway, in our Senate Committee report explaining that liability under the False Claims Act attaches to a submission of, and I quote, "a false claim to the recipient of a grant from the United States or to a state under a program financed in part by the United States."
The legislative history also states that Congress sought to ensure that "a false claim was actionable although the claim or false statements were made to a party other than the Government if the payment thereon would ultimately result in a loss to the United States."

So my question is whether, on reflection, that is a fair way to deal with the express wishes of Congress and whether it is possible that you misunderstood the statute when you decided the Totten case, and why did you reject legislative history if you referred to it--and maybe you didn't refer to it. But why did you reject legislative history regarding the resubmission requirement in the False Claims Act when you wrote the opinion in Totten?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, the answer to your question is it's certainly possible that the majority in that case didn't get it right and that the dissent that was a very strong dissent did get it right. I think the majority got it right. There we focused on particular language. The issue in the case involved, as you know, a subcontractor claim. You have the United States giving money to--in this case, it was Amtrak, and then Amtrak using that money to hire a subcontractor--I think it was Bombardier--to do a particular part of the job. Everybody agreed that under the precedents that are applied, Amtrak is not the Government, can't be considered part of the Government. And the statute, as you noted, required--it was triggered by the presentment of a false claim to an officer or employee of the United States. And the majority's reasoning was that when--the false claim was one made by Bombardier to Amtrak, and the claim was submitted to Amtrak. And since Amtrak was not the Government, what Judge Rogers and I concluded was that that wasn't presentment of a false claim to an officer or employee of the United States.

There was an extensive discussion between the majority and the dissent. The view that you have articulated was certainly presented in a compelling way by Judge Garland, my colleague on the court of appeals, and we spent a great deal of time on the case, and I think it's reflected in the opinions. And that view was laid out. Judge Rogers and I thought that the statutory language that said the claim had to be presented to an officer or employee presented too high a hurdle for us to get over in looking at the legislative history.

But I'm happy to concede that it was among the more difficult cases I've had over the past 2 years. Anytime judge Garland disagrees, you know you're in a difficult area. And the function of his dissent to make us focus on what we were deciding and to make sure that we felt we were doing the right thing I think was well served. But Judge Garland disagreed, and so it's obviously to me a case on which reasonable judges can disagree. And I just have to rest on the analysis in the majority opinion.

Senator Grassley. Let me tell you something you might not be aware of, and that is that the Bush administration has filed an amicus brief in the Eleventh Circuit arguing that you had misread the False Claims Act in the Totten case, and in Atkins v. McIntyre, the administration has argued that there's no presentment requirement in Section 3738(a)(2) of the False Claims Act, and that "the Totten majority misconstrued the language and purpose of the False Claims Act in concluding that the Act does not encompass false claim records statements submitted to recipients of Federal funds absent resubmission to a United States officer or employee." And I assume if I ask you if you have an opinion on that you can't answer it.

Judge Roberts. Well, not on that one. I do know the Bush administration filed an amicus brief in our case as well. I guess this would be one of those cases I would cite in response to the question of whether I'm capable of ruling against the administration. We did in that case. Again, the arguments, I think, were well presented on both sides, and Judge Rogers and I gave it our best shot, and the opinion will stand or fall on its own.

Senator Grassley. Well, I hope sitting in the marble palace you will remember that I have great pride in the success of the False Claims Act--$8 billion coming back to the Federal Treasury.

[note: further questioning by Senator Grassley re False Claims Act (on issues unrelated to legislative history/judicial philosophy) appears in the FCA section of this document]

Senator Biden. Look, here is the point I want to make. I asked--and I am sure you are not going to answer it--I asked Justice Ginsburg a question about footnote 5 in the Michael H. case, and the whole issue there is, as you well know, whether or not you keep talking--it sounds wonderful to the uneducated ear, the non-lawyer's ear--that I am going to look at history and tradition. You and I both know how you determine history and tradition determines outcomes.

In that case, as you will recall, there was a question of whether or not the natural father--you could prove by a blood test and DNA that he was the natural father--of a child he wanted to see, that happened to be born to a woman who was living with her married husband, so the child was illegitimate. And so in determining whether or not there are any visitation rights, there is a famous footnote there. I am going to do this quickly, I have 2 minutes and 7 seconds.

The Court said, Scalia said in footnote 6, "Look, you go back and look at the specific historical precedent, short--have bastards ever been protected in the law." And--then said, "No, no, no, that's not what you go back. You go back and look at fatherhood. Was fatherhood ever something that is part of the traditions and part of the embraced notions of what we hold dear? Is that worthy of protection?"

Now, Scalia said, No, no, no, no, no. I looked up the record. Bastards have never been protected in English common law; therefore, there is nothing going on here. And, by the way, you should never go back, he says, and look at the general proposition has fatherhood achieved a status of consequence. No, it is have bastards achieved.

So, Judge, how do you--I am not asking you about a case. How do you--do you look at the narrowest reading of whether or not such an asserted right has ever been protected, or do you look at it more broadly? What is the methodology you use?

Judge Roberts. I mean, I think you're quite right that that is quite often the critical question in these cases, the degree of generality at which you define what the tradition, the history, and the practice you're looking at. The example, I think, that I've always found it easiest to grasp was Loving v. Virginia. Do you look at the history of miscegenation statutes, or do you look at the history of marriage?

Senator Biden. Thirty-three seconds left. Do you agree with O'Connor then?

Judge Roberts. Well, I get extra time, you said.

Senator Biden. I know. But I don't. I got to get it in now.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. Judge Roberts, when his red light goes on, you will have as much time as you want.

DOJ_NMG_0035837

Judge Roberts. Thank you. The point is that, again, the Court has precedents on precisely that question, about how you should phrase the level of generality. And you look at--

Senator Biden. But which precedent do you agree with? There are competing precedents.

Judge Roberts. Well, you do not look at the level of generality that is the issue that's being challenged. So, for example, in Loving v. Virginia, if the challenge is, it seems to me--and this is what the Court's precedents say. If the challenge is to miscegenation statutes, that's not the level of generality because you're going to answer it's completely circular.

Senator Biden. But that is specific, Judge. The generality was the right to marry. That is the generality.

Judge Roberts. Well, that's what I'm saying. The dispute is do you look at it at that level of specificity or broader. And I'm saying you do not look at the narrowest level of generality, which is the statute that's being challenged, because obviously that's completely circular. You are saying there is obviously that statute that's part of the history. So you look at it at a broader level of generality.

Now, the only point I was going to make earlier--because I do think it is an important one. You make the point that we stand for election and we wouldn't be elected if we didn't tell people what we stand for. Judges don't stand for election. I'm not standing for election, and it is contrary to the role of judges in our society to say that this judge should go on the bench because these are his or her positions and those are the positions they're going to apply.

Judges go on the bench and they apply and decide cases according to the judicial process, not on the basis of promises made earlier to get elected or promises made earlier to get confirmed. That's inconsistent with the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court.

Senator Biden. No one is asking for a promise.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Senator Biden.

Senator Biden. Thank you. Thank you, Judge.

Judge Roberts. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Kyl. [omitted extensive explanation why nominee should not give views on cases likely to come before the Court] . . . But as Senator Biden just said--and I am paraphrasing here--he said without the knowledge of your personal views--he was talking at the time about end-of-life issues--we are rolling the dice. And your response to that, as I understand it, is: My personal views are irrelevant to a case that comes before me of Jones v. Smith, of X v. Y. What I personally think about issues has nothing to do with the resolution of the dispute between those two parties. And were I to let them intrude, I would not be doing my job as a judge, fairly taking the facts of their case and then applying the law that I understand it to be to reach a decision.

Moreover, Judge, isn't it the case that if you were to state your views on such subjects as they might pertain to a case that would come before the Court, wouldn't you actually have to recuse yourself from deciding that case and, therefore, all of the discussion, all of the effort to get you committed to a particular point of view, would be for naught, because if you expressed it, you couldn't sit on the case anyway, or am I incorrect in that?

Judge Roberts. I think that's a concern that other nominees have raised in the past, particularly given the ex pression of views as part of the confirmation process. It's not supposed to be a bargaining process, and if you start stating views with respect to particular issues of concern to one Senator, then obviously everyone is going to have their list. And when that individual nominee, if confirmed, if the bargain is successful from his or her point of view and he gets confirmed, he will have to begin each case not with the parties' briefs and arguments but with the transcript of the confirmation hearing to see what he or she swore to under oath was their view in a particular area of the law or a particular case. And I think that would undermine the independence of the Supreme Court. It would undermine the integrity of the judicial process. Every one of the Justices on the Court today, every one of them refused to engage in that type of process. And if I am to sit with them, if I am confirmed, I feel I have to follow the same approach.

Now, I do think I have been more expansive than most nominees. I have gone back and read the transcripts, and some of them would not talk about particular cases even if it were unlikely that the case was going to come before the Court. And the reason they gave was, look, it is hard to draw the line. If I think this case is not going to come before the Court, what about this one? And maybe that will. And rather than trying to draw the line, I am just not going to do it. And those Justices were confirmed.

I have taken what I think is a more pragmatic approach.

If I think an issue is not likely to come before the Court, I have told the Committee what my views on that case were, what my views on that case are. You know, perhaps that means I am in--it is sometimes difficult to draw the line. Perhaps that's right. But, again, if I make the judgment--and other nominees may draw the line differently, may have drawn it differently in the past or differently in the future, the nominee I think has to be comfortable with the proposition that they're not doing anything that's going to undermine the integrity of the Court.

Senator Kyl. And I noted yesterday in response to a question, you said, Well, that is the reward for trying to be more expansive. You were talking about Griswold v. Connecticut at the time, and I thought at the time, Boy, he is expressing a view on a relatively recent case, and at least issues associated with it are clearly going to come before the Court. And I wondered, Does that go too far? Does that cross the line? But your point was the specific issue in the case and the precise holding of the case are not likely in your view to come before the Court, and, therefore, you expressed your opinion about that case and the law underlining the ruling in the case.

So I would agree with you that not only have you attempted to answer every one of our questions, but you have also ventured into expressing your personal views on matters that you didn't think would come before the Court, although, as you note, it is at least possible that some of them might. So hopefully you have not gone too far there.

Senator Sessions. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And thank you for your leadership as we move forward expeditiously, I think, today and I think in a helpful way. I think the hearings have been very good and, Judge Roberts, I salute you for your excellent manner and your forthrightness and professionalism as you answer these questions.

You know, I hope we are moving away, Senator Feinstein, from divisiveness. In some ways, we do have a divided country. But in other ways, I think we have the potential to move together, and I frankly believe that one thing that causes divisiveness and frustration and angst is when the Supreme Court were to render an opinion that really is more a political or social policy decision rather than a legal decision. And when they say it amounts to the Constitution, a constitutional provision, then that Supreme Court opinion can only be changed by two-thirds of both Houses and three-fourths of the States.

Do you understand that danger, Judge Roberts, in opinions? And is that perhaps one reason you think a judge should show modesty?

Judge Roberts. Well, it's part of what I mean when I say a certain humility should characterize the judicial function. Judges need to appreciate that the legitimacy of their action is confined to interpreting the law and not making it. And if they exceed that function and start making the law, I do think that raises legitimate concerns about legitimacy of their authority to do that.

Senator Sessions. Well, I would observe that the American people are beginning to believe that is occurring, and I think it does threaten legitimacy of the Court in a way that all of us who love the law should be concerned. And I do love the law, and I am a big critic of the courts on these kinds of activist cases. But I have practiced full-time before Federal judges, and as I said earlier, I believe day after day justice is done.

You have said that before your court you are impressed with the objectivity and fairness that the judges bring. Is the ideal of blindfold justice, a neutral umpire, is that a romantic, naive ideal, or is that something that you believe we can and should strive to achieve in America?

Judge Roberts. Well, I do know that there are sophisticated academic theorists, people who spend a lot more time theorizing in this area than I do, and a lot smarter than I am addressing these issues who--some of whom conclude that in particular cases it's difficult to do, it's difficult to avoid making the law while you're interpreting it, and they kind of throw up their hands and suggest that we shouldn't even try, therefore.

I don't agree with that. I think as a practical matter, as a pragmatic matter, judges every day know the difference between interpreting the law and making the law. Every day judges put aside their personal views and beliefs and apply the law. Whether the result is one they would agree with as a legislator or not agree with, the question is what the law is, not what they think it should be.

I've seen that on the court of appeals. I've seen that as a practicing lawyer before the court. That is the ideal. I'm sure judges, I'm sure Justices don't always achieve it in every case because it's a human endeavor and error is going to infect any human endeavor. But that is the ideal, and I think good judges working hard can not only achieve it but also achieve it together in a collegial way and benefit from the insight and views of each other.

Senator Sessions. Well, I thank you for that, and I would share those views. And I absolutely believe the strength of our Nation is our good legal system.

DOJ_NMG_0035840

Senator Schumer. . . . I just have one more question here. The President, as I said--and this motivates some of us--he said he wants to nominate judges in the mold of Thomas and Scalia. I want to ask you, are you in the mold of Thomas and Scalia? The President said he wanted to nominate people that way.

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I'll give the same answer I gave yesterday to Senator Graham when he asked if I would be in the mold of the Chief Justice. And the answer is I will be my own man on the Supreme Court. Period.

Senator Schumer. I appreciate that.

Do you think they are activist judges?

Judge Roberts. I'm not going to criticize them with respect to any general description of that sort. I'm sure there are cases where I would agree with them, there are cases where I would disagree with them, as with all of the Justices.

Senator Schumer. Right. Okay. Now--by the way, I will note, I don't think I have time here, but you did criticize in a memo back when you were working in Attorney General Fred Fielding's office, Brennan and Marshall as activist judges. Now, I don't think that was the official position of the Reagan administration, so it seemed to be your opinion. Can you tell me in 30 seconds, so I can just ask one more question, how is it different not to want to characterize Justices Thomas and Scalia but it was okay to characterize Justices Marshall and Brennan as activist?

Judge Roberts. Well, that was a--it was a reflection of the views of the Attorney General at the time, and that was part of the administration's position.

Senator Schumer. But was it official Reagan policy?

Judge Roberts. I don't think it was official policy. It was an expression that the Attorney General had made on various occasions.

Senator Schumer. Let me just say, sir, in all due respect--and I respect your intelligence and your career and your family--this process is getting a little more absurd every time the further we move. You agree we should be finding out your philosophy and method of legal reasoning, modesty, stability, but when we try to find out what modesty and stability mean, what your philosophy means, we don't get any answers.

It is as if I asked you what kind of movies you like. Tell me two or three good movies. And you say, I like movies with good acting. I like movies with good directing. I like movies with good cinematography. And I ask you, no, give me an example of a good movie. You don't name one. I say give me an example of a bad movie. You won't name one. Then I ask you if you like "Casablanca," and you respond by saying, Lots of people like "Casablanca."

[Laughter.]

Senator Schumer. You tell me it is widely settled that "Casablanca" is one of the great movies.

Chairman Specter. Senator Schumer, now that your time is over, are you asking him a question?

Senator Schumer. Yes. I am saying, sir, I am making a plea here. I hope we are going to continue this for a while, that within the confines of what you think is appropriate and proper, you try to be a little more forthcoming with us in terms of trying to figure out what kind of Justice you will become.

Chairman Specter. We will now take a 15-minute break and reconvene at 4:25.

Judge Roberts. Mr. Chairman, could I address some of the--

DOJ_NMG_0035841

Chairman Specter. Oh, absolutely. Absolutely. I didn't hear any question, Judge Roberts, but you--

Judge Roberts. Well, there were several along the way.

I will be very succinct.

Chairman Specter. You are privileged to comment. This is coming out of his next round, if there is one.

Judge Roberts. Oh, well, then.

[Laughter.]

Senator Schumer. I guess there will be.

Judge Roberts. First, "Dr. Zhivago" and "North by Northwest."

[Laughter.]

Senator Schumer. Now how about on the more important subject of what cases--

Judge Roberts. On the more important subject, I--

Chairman Specter. Let him finish his answer. You are out of time.

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. The only--

Senator Schumer. Not out of movies.

Judge Roberts. The only point I would like to make, because you raised the question how is this different than Justices who dissent and criticize and how is this different than professors. And I think there are significant differences. The Justice who files a dissent is issuing an opinion based upon his participation in the judicial process. He confronted the case with an open mind, he heard the arguments, he fully and fairly considered the briefs, he consulted with his colleagues, he went through the process of issuing an opinion. And in my experience, every one of those stages can cause you to change your view. The view you ask, then, of me, well, what do you think, is it correct or not, or how would you come out, that's not a result of that process. And that is why I shouldn't respond to those types of questions.

Now, the professor, how is that different? That professor is not sitting here as a nominee before the Committee. And the great danger of courts that I believe every one of the Justices has been vigilant to safeguard against is turning this into a bargaining process. It is not a process under which Senators get to say I want you to rule this way, this way, and this way. And if you tell me you'll rule this way, this way, and this way, I'll vote for you. That is not a bargaining process. Judges are not politicians. They cannot promise to do certain things in exchange for votes.

And if you go back and look at the transcripts, Senator, I would just respectfully disagree. I think I have been more forthcoming than any of the other nominees. Other nominees have not been willing to tell you whether they thought Marbury v. Madison was correctly decided. They took a very strict approach. I have taken what I think is a more pragmatic approach and said if I don't think that's likely to come before the Court, I will comment on it. And, you know, again, perhaps that's subject to criticism, because it is difficult to draw the line sometimes. But I wanted to be able to share as much as I can with the Committee in response to the concerns you and others have expressed, and so I have adopted that approach.

Senator Schumer. Thank you.

Chairman Specter. 4:25. We are anxious to try to conclude your testimony, Judge Roberts, as early as we can. I know you will agree with that.

DOJ_NMG_0035842

Judge Roberts. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Sorry--thank you for the accommodation.

Senator Schumer. . . . How about modesty and stability? Let's try to talk about that. And when we met, I was very impressed with the concepts of modesty and stability. They suggest to me you respect precedent and well-settled law. You have said that yourself here, particularly in reference to Senator Specter's opening round of questions. And that is a good opportunity for common ground. I had a history professor, and he said--Franklin Ford. He had Ford's rule of history. We are no smarter than our fathers. A pretty good rule. And that is sort of a modest concept in history, not in jurisprudence.

So I would like to find out a little bit more about modesty. So I would ask you--and these can be well settled. They could be 50 or 100 years ago, and please don't go on at length. But can you give me a few Supreme Court cases that are modest, or represent modesty, is a better way to put it, at least in your view, and a few Supreme Court cases that would represent immodesty?

Judge Roberts. Sure. I guess I would think the clearest juxtaposition would be the cases from the Lochner era. If you take Lochner on the one hand and, say, West Coast Hotel, which kind of overruled and buried the Lochner approach on the other, and the immodesty that I see in the Lochner opinion is in its re-weighing of the legislative determination. You read that opinion, it's about limits on how long bakers can work. And they're saying we don't think there's any problem with bakers working more than 13 hours.

Senator Schumer. Right.

Judge Roberts. Well, the legislature thought there was, and they passed a law about it, and the issue should not have been, Judges, do you think this was a good law or do you think bakers should work longer or not? It should be: Is there anything in the Constitution that prohibits the legislature from doing that?

Senator Schumer. How about another one?

Judge Roberts. Well--

Senator Schumer. Or modest ones. You know, it could be either way.

Judge Roberts. You know, people talk about Brown v. Board of Education, and let me explain why I think that is an example. It's obviously a dramatic departure in American history, and in many respects very bold. Yet I think it's more appropriately understood as a restrained decision compared to the decision that came before in Plessy v. Ferguson. And you can see this if you look at the arguments of the lawyers, because what John W. Davis was arguing on the side of the Board was to the Court, "You need to be worried about the social consequences of upsetting this decision. People have lived their lives this way. If you overturn this, it is going to be disruptive, the consequences are going to be bad."

Thurgood Marshall, on the other side, was making a legal argument addressed to the obligation of the Court to apply the rule of law, and he said, focused on the discrimination involved in the separation. He made an argument, and it was a very clever approach to the case because he based his decision on precedent as well, saying "You have had this recent case in Sweatt v. Painter. Don't talk to me about Plessy v. Ferguson.

You are beginning the process of departing from that. Your recent decision here, if you are going to be consistent, you have to come out this way."

So again it seems odd I know to talk about things like modesty in such a bold decision, but it is in my view a more appropriate judicial restrained decision.

Senator Schumer. Let me ask you. This is a general question that I was going to ask you that leads to this. In other words, if a decision of the Court issued many years ago is immodest, in your view, modesty could compel overruling?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think if you take--

Senator Schumer. That is what you argued just a minute ago with Brown I think.

Judge Roberts. Well, sometimes the appropriate restrained approach--now, with Brown my point was the notion of precedent was one that Thurgood Marshall appreciated in arguing to the Court that it shouldn't be simply a debate. he didn't want to debate it on John W. Davis's terms about Plessy, should it be overruled or not? He said, "Here's another precedent of the Court." So he was arguing from precedent as well.

Senator Schumer. Right. But when you have the conflict, a past error decision that was fundamentally immodest, let us say, and then years and years of it being on the books, stability argues keep it on the books, and even modesty, with its respect for precedent argues keep it on the books. How do you draw that? Can you just elaborate a little bit on how you weigh those two different concepts of "modesty?"

Judge Roberts. Well, I think a modest approach requires beginning with the body of precedent. That is what judges do, and that's a recognition just as Professor Ford said, that we're not necessarily, we're not smarter than our fathers who laid down this precedent.

Senator Schumer. Professor Ford.

Judge Roberts. Professor Ford, yes. My point with respect to Brown was that Thurgood Marshall appreciated that and then he was making an argument from precedent, just as the way Davis was, and they kind of I think gave the Court some comfort in departing from Plessy, that they had already taken the initial step in Sweatt v. Painter.

Senator Schumer. Let me go to--I think Senator Durbin alluded to it, because this is one that was a little troubling and maybe you can talk about it. In the memo you wrote about Wallace v. Jaffre which had just been decided, involved church and State--I am not interested right now in the specific holding--you wrote, "Rehnquist tried to revolutionize Establishment Clause jurisprudence and ended up losing the majority, which is not to say the effort was misguided." Then you wrote, because you were speaking approvingly of Rehnquist's attempt to revolutionize a well-settled area of law. You also in the same memo criticize the opinion of Lewis Powell, same case, criticizing as, "a lame concurring opinion focusing on stare decisis."

To at least the reader of this it seems very immodest, praising the revolutionary decision and sort of criticizing, saying it was lame opinion focusing on stare decisis.

I know you wrote this 20 years ago, and I know you wrote it for your boss, Ronald Reagan, who you admire--I admire him too but probably for different reasons--but those words, Ronald Reagan did not command you to say, "I approve of Rehnquist's view to revolutionize Powell." I know you had to come out on that side. Just please explain to me, if you still stand by, not the holdings in the case, not whether Wallace V. Jaffre was correctly decided, but the language that you used, the thinking that you used, how does that square with modesty, or had you not developed the theory of modesty when you were there as a young clerk or a young member of the, I guess at that point, Solicitor General's Office.

Judge Roberts. No, no.

Senator Schumer. Wherever you were.

Judge Roberts. If it's 20 years ago it would have been--

Senator Schumer. It is 1985, yes.

Judge Roberts. It would have been in the White House Counsel's Office.

Senator Schumer. White House Counsel's Office. Excuse me.

Judge Roberts. And the memo that you are referring to is, obviously, it's speculation about what happened in the case.

Senator Schumer. I know. How does it square with modesty? Did modesty arise in your way of thinking after that?

Judge Roberts. It's not a question about me being a judge. It's a question about my describing what I was obviously speculating was going on in that particular case.

Senator Schumer. But you approved it. You said the revolutionary aspects were not--which is not to say the effort was misguided. And then you said "lame"--there is no real way to interpret that except pejoratively--concurring opinion that focused on stare decisis.

Judge Roberts. Saying that the effort was not misguided referred to what I had been speculating was the Chief Justice's effort to reformulate the approach in that case, and it's the lemon test, and we've talked about the lemon test before, and the pluses and minuses. I've described it I think it was today, maybe yesterday. It is a survivor. I noted when we argued the Lee v. Weisman case, that every--six of the Justices I think had taken the position critical of the lemon test, six of the sitting Justices. They never took it at the same time. It is still the test that applies, and it would be, the precedent that I would begin with--

Senator Schumer. Just going to cut you off. I apologize, because I have 16 seconds, and the Chairman said I have to ask the questions before.

Just assure me and maybe some more of us, that modesty is not a concept that you use when you want to slow things down because the courts are moving too fast, but you do not use when you think things should be sped up, that it is a general approach that sort of says to Judiciary, "Go slow in every aspect." Try to convince me of that if you can.

Judge Roberts. Well, I'll try, Senator. It is a neutral principle. Your suggestion that I apply it in cases where I want to but don't--is of course a grievous insult to any judge, the notion that they're result-oriented, that they would apply a particular approach one way in one sort of cases and a different way in another case. That's not how I approach judging and not how I would approach judging whether I'm back on the Court of Appeals or somewhere else.

It is a neutral principle. It reflects the--and it's obviously not an original concept with me.

Senator Schumer. No, it's not.

Judge Roberts. There are judges, you go back throughout our history, that have articulated and recognized the principle of judicial restraint, that there are limits on what the judge can do. And those judges have always explained that this applies whether or not I'm in favor of a particular result or not. It's a reflection of their institutional authority in their role, that their job is to interpret the law, not to make the law. And that applies without regard to what law you would like to have made or not.

Senator Schumer. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Schumer.

Thank you, Judge Roberts.

Thank you all.

Senator Kennedy. At the outset of my questions I talked about Earl Warren, and you were enormously complimentary about Earl Warren, about him understanding not only the law, but also understanding the importance of the Chief Justice bringing other Justices together in a very important way in terms of dealing with a societal issue and a question, and I think we are a fairer country and a fairer land because of this.

This was really the bringing together of the mind and the heart. Oliver Wendall Holmes said: It's dangerous to think about legal issues can be worked out like mathematics. And another nominee who was here not too long ago, had this to say about the head and the heart. "What you worry about is someone trying to decide an individual case without thinking out the effect of that decision on a lot of cases. That is why I always think law requires both a heart and a head. If you do not have a heart, it becomes a sterile set of rules, removed from human problems and it will not help. If you do not have a head, there is the risk that in trying to decide a particular person's problem in a case, that may look fine for that person, but you cause trouble for a lot of other people, making their lives yet worse."

In the remaining moment, recalling Justice Warren, just thinking through what other nominees have said about the importance of a heart and a legal mind, and you as a Chief Justice together, in telling the American people how you were inspired by Chief Justice Warren at a very important and critical time in our Nation's history, what could yo tell them now that could give them the assurance that you might be a similar kind of Chief Justice should you be approved by the Senate?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, my point with respect to Chief Justice Warren was that he appreciated the impact that the decision in Brown would have, and he appreciated that the impact would be far more beneficial and favorable and far more effectively implemented with the unanimous Court, the Court speaking with one voice, than a splintered Court. The issue was significant enough that he spent the extra time in the reargument of the case to devote his energies to convincing the other Justices--and obviously, there's no arm-twisting or any of that. It's the type of collegial discussion that judges and justices have to engage in of the importance of what the Court was doing, and an appreciation of its impact on real people and real lives.

I recognize as a judge, and I recognized as a lawyer, that these cases have impact on real people and real lives. I always insisted when I was a lawyer about getting out into the field and seeing it. If I was arguing a case involving Native villages in Alaska, I went to the villages. If I was arguing a case about an assembly line, I went to the assembly line. You had to see where the case was going to have its impact and what its impression was going to be on people.

Now, none of those cases were as important as Brown v. Board of Education, but the basic principle is the same. I think judges do have to appreciate that they're dealing with real people with real cases. We obviously deal with documents and texts, the Constitution, the statutes, the legislative history, and that is where the legal decisions are made, but judges never lose sight, or should never lose sight of the fact that their decision affect real people with real lives, and I appreciate that.

Senator Kennedy. My time is up, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

DOJ_NMG_0035847

Leadership and Administration of the Court and of the Judiciary (including budgetary and workload concerns; cert process; management of the Judicial Conference; responsibilities relating to the FISA court; cameras in the Courtroom; judicial honoraria and paid educational conferences)

Senator DeWine. Judge, I want to ask you about one of your more important, probably least understood, not by you, but least understood by the public's role if you are confirmed as the Chief Justice, and that is your job to appoint the members of the FISA Court.

Judge, as you know, in 1978, Congress passed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. This law, of course, set up the FISA Court. As you well know, this is the court that our intelligence agents go to when they want to obtain wiretaps or search warrants against terrorists and foreign spies, a very important court, a court that meets in secret, a court that deals with the most important national security matters that we have really in our country, but also a court that deals with our precious civil liberties. And Judge, because it is a court that meets in secret, it doesn't have the public scrutiny, doesn't have the glare of publicity, and quite candidly, does not have much oversight.

So I would like to know, besides what is in the statute, the statute sets out your job to select the 11 judges who sit on the FISA court and three judges who sit on the FISA Court of Review. There are certain guidelines in the statute. But besides that, I wonder if you could tell us what your criteria will be when you select these men, these women who will serve on the court, and I wonder if you could give me your personal assurance that this will be something that will be very important to you, that you will take a hands-on approach, and that you will be very personally involved in, because really, it is a question of the utmost national security. These are people who are going to make sometimes life and death decisions for our country.

Judge Roberts. I appreciate that, Senator. If I am confirmed, that is something that I will address and take very seriously. I think, as in many areas, my first priority is going to be to listen, to learn a little bit more about what's involved.

I'll be very candid. When I first learned about the FISA Court, I was surprised. It's not what we usually think of when we think of a court. We think of a place where we can go, we can watch the lawyers argue and it's subject to the glare of publicity and the judges explain their decision to the public and they can examine them. That's what we think of as a court.

This is a very different and unusual institution. That was my first reaction. I appreciate the reasons that it operates the way it does, but it does seem to me that the departures from the normal judicial model that are involved there put a premium on the individuals involved.

I think the people who are selected for that tribunal have to be above reproach. There can't be any question that these are among the best judges that our system has, the fairest judges, the ones who are most sensitive to the different issues involved because they don't have the oversight of the public being able to see what's going on.

Again, to be perfectly honest, it is a very unusual situation and I do think it places a great premium on making sure that the best-qualified people for that position are selected.

Senator Feingold. … Judge Roberts, the eyes of America are on you this week thanks to what our generation called the miracle of life, television. Television plays an enormous role in providing information and bringing the country together in times of national pride, like the liftoffs and the landings of spacecrafts and Presidential inaugurations, political conflict like the 2000 election and the 1999 impeachment trial of President Clinton, the great tragedy of September 11 and the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina. Americans can watch virtually every significant event of national importance on television except for oral arguments and announcement of decisions at the Supreme Court.

If you are confirmed, you will essentially disappear from public view. This hearing will, in some ways, be the last time that the nation will see you at work. The possibility of televising trials raises some complicated issues. We have to consider the safety and rights of criminal defendants and witnesses and jurors. But such concerns are not so present in the case of appellate proceedings. There is no doubt that there is enormous public interest in Supreme Court oral arguments, but not very many seats in the courthouse.

I think it would benefit the country and the Court if all Americans had the chance to see the Court conduct its work, so I would like to know if you, as Chief Justice, will support televising the Court's public proceedings.

Judge Roberts. Senator, it's not something that I have a settled view on and I do think it's something that I would benefit from the views of my colleagues, and I know that some of them have particular views and some may not. I noticed the last time there was a formal response by the Court to a request to televise a particular argument, the Chief Justice referred the matter to the whole Court and then reported back on it.

I'm also aware that there are--I'm not sure if the right word is experimental or trial efforts going on in some of the courts of appeals, the Federal courts of appeals, to televise arguments there, and I know I've watched them so I appreciate that opportunity. And I don't know yet if there's been an evaluation of how that experiment proceeded, whether the judges thought it went fine, the lawyers, or whatever. I just don't know.

At the Supreme Court level, I do know they experimented recently in a few cases with releasing the audio tapes immediately after the conclusion of the argument. Again, I listened to those on occasion, not every case, but selected cases of particular interest. I know that on our court, my court, I'm sorry, on the Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, we broadcast at least within the courthouse simultaneously the oral arguments, so I know that the technology is there to do that and I certainly understand the interest and I understand how--I know it was very well received to have the audio tapes immediately available in some of those cases—

Chairman Specter. . . . Judge Roberts, let me move to one other subject in the 2 minutes that I have remaining, and that is, on the ability which you would have, if confirmed as Chief Justice, to try to bring a consensus to the Court. We have 5-4 decisions as the hallmark of the Courts. Not unusual. You commented yesterday about what Chief Justice Warren did on Brown v. Board of Education, taking a very disparate Court and pulling the Court together. As you and I discussed in my office, there are an overwhelming number of cases where there are multiple concurrences. A writes of concurring opinion in which B joins; then B writes a concurring opinion in which A joins and C joins.

In reading the trilogy of cases on detainees from June of 2004 to figure out what we ought to do about Guantanamo, it was a patchwork of confusion. I was intrigued by the comment which you made in our meeting about a dialogue among equals, and you characterized that as a dialogue among equals when you appear before the Court, and they are on a little different level over there. I am way behind you on Supreme Court arguments. It is 39-3. But I would have been an equal of theirs in any event. Perhaps you are. But I am intrigued by your concept, and I asked you how you would be able to be the Chief with Justice Scalia, who is 18 years older than you, and even Justice Thomas, who is 7 years older than you. Tell us what you think you can do on this dialogue among equals to try to bring some consensus to the Court to try to avoid this proliferation of opinions and avoid all these 5-4 decisions.

My time is up.

Senator Leahy. I would like to hear the answer because that is a question I was going to ask, too.

Chairman Specter. Well, now we are on Senator Leahy's time. Go ahead.

Senator Leahy. Oh, no, we are not on my time.

[Laughter.]

Senator Leahy. We are not on my time. We are still on yours, Mr. Chairman. But I would like to hear this answer.

Chairman Specter. It is permissible to have the answer on the red light, just not the question.

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't want to be presumptuous about if I am confirmed, what I would do. I do think, though, it's a responsibility of all of the Justices, not just the Chief Justice, to try to work toward an opinion of the Court. The Supreme Court speaks only as a Court. Individually, the Justices have no authority.

And I do think it should be a priority to have an opinion of the Court. You don't obviously compromise strongly-held views, but you do have to be open to the considered views of your colleagues, particularly when it gets to a concurring opinion. I do think you do need to ask yourself, what benefit is this serving? Why is it necessary for me to state this separate reason? Can I go take another look at what the four of them think or the three of them think to see if I can subscribe to that or get them to modify it in a way that would allow me to subscribe to that, because an important function of the Supreme Court is to provide guidance. As a lower court judge, I appreciate clear guidance from the Supreme Court.

I know the last thing Chief Justice Rehnquist said in Court, on the last day of the term he was reading the disposition in a case and said, you know, A reaches this conclusion, is joined by B, and then C has a separate concurrence joined by D and E, and he ended up by saying, "I didn't know we had that many Judges on the Court." That undermines the importance of providing guidance.

I do think the Chief Justice has a particular obligation to try to achieve consensus consistent with everyone's individual oath to uphold the Constitution, and that would certainly be a priority for me if I were confirmed.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Judge Roberts.

DOJ_NMG_0035850

Judge Roberts. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Judge Roberts. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Senator Leahy?

Senator Leahy. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you for asking that question because it was one I wanted to ask, too.

Senator Leahy. Let me ask you this, then. Let me ask you something that can be ascribed to a Justice of the Supreme Court, and it is something that both the Chairman and I have talked a lot about, and that goes to some of the mechanics. If you will let me take a moment--you understand these, but for the audience, the so-called rule of four. It takes only four Justices to grant cert, but it takes five to grant a stay of execution. Usually the courtesy is that if you get four, a fifth one will sign on. That has not always been followed of late. Of course, we are dealing with the life or death, which Senator Specter called it bizarre and unacceptable, and it needs legislation to change it.

How do you feel, if you were Chief, you had four--four of the Justices now voted for a stay of execution, do you feel as Chief you should do the courtesy of the rule of five and kick in the fifth one?

Judge Roberts. It's an issue that I'm familiar with. I do know it arose. And I thought the common practice, the current practice was that if there are four votes to grant cert that the Court would grant the stay, even though that does require the fifth vote, so that you don't have a situation--

Senator Leahy. Yes, but that is because one more says, okay, we got four--

Judge Roberts. Right.

Senator Leahy. --we will put somebody else's name on here. But that hasn't been followed all the time recently. It usually was, and that is why both Senator Specter and I have raised concern. Do you feel the earlier practice of once you have four--

Judge Roberts. I think that practice makes a lot of sense. I don't want to commit to pursue a particular practice in an area that I'll obviously have to look at in the future, but it obviously makes great sense that if you have four to grant and that's the rule that you will consider an issue if there are four to grant. You don't want to moot the case by not staying the sentence.

Senator Leahy. And I appreciate that because I know we find a lot of cases where they are perfectly willing to grant cert on monetary damages, but here you can't get it right, it doesn't make much difference on appeal after the execution.

Senator Leahy. . . . You wrote a memo regarding--back in 1983, as a White House lawyer, you wrote a memo regarding proposals by then-Chief Justice Warren Burger to reduce the Supreme Court's caseload. In that memo, you volunteered the following: "If the Justices truly think they are overworked, the cure lies close at hand. For example, giving coherence to Fourth Amendment jurisprudence by adopting the good-faith standard and advocating the role of fourth or fifth guesser in death penalty cases would eliminate about a half dozen argued cases from the Court's docket each term."

DOJ_NMG_0035851

Are you saying that judges are just too busy to pay attention to death cases?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator.

Senator Leahy. What are you saying? How do you feel today? That was 1983. How do you feel now 22 years later?

Judge Roberts. Well, in 1983, of course, they were hearing about 150 cases a year. They hear about half that now. Again, I don't want to prejudge questions or even be presumptuous to look down the road, but it seems to me that there's the capability there to hear more cases today, not fewer. And I'm sure there are reasons for the reduction in the caseload that I'm not familiar with that I might become more familiar with, but they handled twice as many cases 20 years ago than they do today. And I think the capability to address more issues is there in the Court.

Senator Leahy. My time is up, but I think you will find both the Chairman and the Ranking Member of this Committee believe they could handle more. Thank you, Judge.

Senator Grassley. Are you against cameras in the courtroom like Justice Rehnquist was?

Judge Roberts. Well, you know, my new best friend, Senator Thompson, assures me that television cameras are nothing to be afraid of--

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. --but I don't have a set view on that. I do think it's something that I would have to--I would want to listen to the views of, if I were confirmed, to my colleagues--

Senator Grassley. I would suggest then to the Chairman that we move quickly on that bill before he has got an opinion on it.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. I intend to do just that, Senator Grassley, now that I have your support.

Senator Grassley. Thank you.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Grassley.

Senator Kohl. We spent quite a bit of time yesterday discussing how you would decide cases, and as we all know, it is your view that Supreme Court Justices are umpires who are neutrally deciding cases. I want to discuss with you another area where I believe your analogy falls somewhat short.

The Supreme Court not only, as you know, has the power to decide cases and to construe the Constitution, but it also has the sole and the absolute power to decide which cases it hears, which cases it decides, which parties get to be heard, and which parties do not get to be heard. So if you are confirmed, you will get to choose which cases will be placed on the Supreme Court's docket with the vote of yourself and only three other Justices, as you know. Making this choice, your opinions, your perspectives, and your life experiences obviously matter quite a bit. Much more than an umpire calling balls and strikes, you are in that sense a manager who is really setting the field with players to decide what the menu is going to be like.

So this power is really quite important, and it is crucial and it is important that we understand that when we look at your role in terms of your own description.

In recent times, the Supreme Court has received appeals in nearly 7,000 cases a year, and as you know, in recent times, the Supreme Court has heard only about 80 cases a year. In other words, the Justices choose to hear only about 1 percent of the appeals that they receive.

My question for you, Judge Roberts, is: Should you be confirmed, how will you decide which cases will make the cut and will be heard by the Supreme Court? And what will guide your complete discretion to choose which cases to hear?

Judge Roberts. I appreciate the question, Senator. It is an area where I will happily concede that the Justices are not acting just like umpires in deciding which cases they're going to hear as opposed to how they're going to decide them. My perspective has changed a little bit in this area. Certainly when I was practicing law, a lot of what I spent my time trying to do was get the Supreme Court to take a case. As you know, you file these things called petitions for certiorari, which are really quite extensive arguments about why the Court should hear your case, having really not that much to do with the merits, whether it was right or wrong, but just why the Court needs to issue an opinion in this area. And I thought they weren't taking enough cases. When I became a court of appeals judge, I thought you didn't need to have more cases taken up for review.

But the considerations, some are pretty well established. The job of the Supreme Court is to ensure the uniformity and consistency of Federal law, in particular, interpretations of the Constitution. So the clearest case that the Court should hear, they should grant certiorari on, as they say, is when two different courts of appeals are interpreting a law differently. Obviously, the law should mean the same thing in every part of the country, and if two different courts take a different view of the law, that's the kind of case the Court ought to be taking.

I think the Court should, as a general matter--and, again, other Justices have expressed this view as well--grant review in cases in which a lower court strikes down an act of Congress. I don't think that's an absolute rule, but certainly as a general matter, if an act of Congress is going to be declared unconstitutional, I think the Supreme Court ought to be the one determining that as a final matter, and generally not leave it to a court of appeals.

So those are two categories: when there is a conflict, when an act is found to be unconstitutional.

Beyond that--and this is where I agree with you the umpire analogy does not hold up--there is a lot of discretion in deciding whether it is the right time to grant review in a case. The people who practice before the Court talk about the Court letting an issue percolate a little bit, in other words, get more than just one or two decisions from the courts of appeals, wait until others have had a chance to weigh in. The theory is that makes it more likely the Supreme Court will get it right if they have the benefit of several decisions from the lower courts rather than just one. Other cases the Justices determine that that's not appropriate. It's not appropriate to wait until the issue develops a little more; they want to look at it expeditiously. And it's hard to lay down categorical rules in that area.

I have expressed the view--and it may be a view that I'll have to be educated on further if I am confirmed, and I am not stating it as a solid view. I do think there is room for the Court to take more cases. They hear about half the number of cases they did 25 years ago. There may be good reasons for that that I will learn if I am confirmed, but just looking at it from the outside, I think they could contribute more to the clarity and uniformity of the law by taking more cases.

I have heard others say they could contribute to the clarity and uniformity of the law by taking fewer cases, but I don't subscribe to that view. I think there is room for additional cases on the docket.

Senator Kohl. I think we agree that it is an enormous power, that power of decision. It is a very active power. It is not benign in any way. If Justices, for example, decide not to hear a case, whatever the merits, that is the final decision. Is that not correct?

Judge Roberts. That's right. The decision of the court of appeals stands in that case. Now, it is true that I think the Justices generally look at their duty and obligation to ensure consistency in a fairly dispassionate and objective way. In other words, it doesn't matter how a particular case came out. If it's different in one part of the country than another, most of the Justices in my experience readily agree that that's the kind of case they need to address.

Senator Kohl. I will just refer to two that were taken up without any reference from any lower court. One was Youngstown Steel and Tube, which was, you know, the ability of the Government to seize a steel mill during a time of war. And, of course, another one that I'm interested in your comment on is Bush v. Gore, in which the Court decided to directly insert itself into a Presidential campaign. I am interested in not what happened after they decided to do that, but that the decision they made in terms of its propriety, its impact on the courts, the Court's standing in the country, you must have thought about it, I am sure, a great deal when it happened.

I am sure you have an opinion on their decision to enter that case, and I think we would like to know what that opinion is.

Judge Roberts. You mentioned first the Youngstown case, and it is a category--and I think perhaps the Bush v. Gore case, that perhaps the Justices concluded it fell into that category. There are certain cases--they don't come along all that often--that are, by their importance, significant enough for the Court to take. In other words, they don't fit the description of a conflict among the Courts of Appeals or an Act of Congress held unconstitutional, but they are otherwise sufficiently important that the Court will grant review and take those cases.

Certainly, the Youngstown case was of that sort. It started out actually in the D.C. Court, the hearing was first there, and then the Court granted that. But the decision by a President to seize the steel mills based on--constitutionally, that's an important enough issue you want the Supreme Court to issue a final ruling on that.

On the decision in Bush v. Gore and the determination of whether to grant review in that case, again, that's not something that--you don't know on what basis the Justices make a decision to grant review. You just get an order that says "review is granted." In that case you had a decision of a State court that apparently the Justices thought should be reviewed, and obviously, expeditious treatment was needed, as I think it was in the Youngstown case as well. They're capable of moving expeditiously when an important matter requires them to do so.

Senator Kohl. I asked you what your opinion of that decision was at that time.

DOJ_NMG_0035854

Judge Roberts. Well, that's an area where I have not been--I have not felt free to comment, whether or not I agree with particular decisions or--

Senator Kohl. It is not likely to come up again.

Judge Roberts. I do think that the issue about the propriety of Supreme Court review in matters of disputed electoral contests is a matter that could come up again. Obviously, the particular parameters in that case won't, but it is a very recent precedent, and that type of decision is one where I thought it inappropriate to comment on whether I think they were correct or not.

Senator Kohl. You will have a decision to make if it [Takings Clause issue/Kelo reprise] does rise up to that level. Is it possible that your decision, along with three other Justices, might be to put that on the docket?

Judge Roberts. That would be one of the decisions that in the exercise of the cert process, as they call it, short for the certiorari decision, and that would certainly be an issue that could come before the Court, and they already have, of course, four dissenters who may be anxious to revisit it or not. I don't know. I don't want to presume how they would view it on an ongoing basis.

Senator Kohl. All right. I will just ask one more question before my time expires and that is on the important role that the Chief Justice plays as the head of the Judicial Conference, which is the organization of the entire Federal Judiciary. As head of the Judicial Conference, the Chief Justice makes policy recommendations as to legal reform, with respect to legal reform, reform of court procedures and advocates for the Federal courts.

What, if you are confirmed, would be your agenda, your plans, or your policy objectives to advance in connection with your role as the head of the Judicial Conference?

Judge Roberts. Well, I am familiar with how the Judicial Conference operates for at least part of its role. I've been on the Advisory Committee on Appellate Rules. I was there as a lawyer and I kept on as a judge. In fact, I was slated to be the Chairman of that committee starting in October.

So I understand the role in promoting the forum of rules that apply in the Federal courts, both the appellate rules, the civil rules, criminal rules, and bankruptcy rules, and evidence rules, different committees there, and I'm familiar with the process. They go through the Advisory Committee, a broader committee about rules in general. Then they're submitted to the Judicial Conference for consideration, and it's a very exhaustive process, but I think also a very responsive one. Particular problems are identified in practice by practitioners, by judges. They're submitted to the committees. They review them. They come up with proposals. It's a very important part of the functioning of the Federal system and it affects all the levels, not just the Supreme Court, of course, but courts of appeals and the trial courts.

Other issues of concern, obviously pressing issues, concerns with respect to security in light of different developments. Those are addressed at the Judicial Conference. Any need for legislative action that the courts feel is appropriate.

I have to tell you that if I were to be confirmed, as an initial matter, I think my primary posture is going to be one of listening because there's obviously much I have to learn about matters of concern to different judges, different courts around the country, and that's the good thing about the Judicial Conference, of course. They bring in judges from around the country to make sure that you get a national perspective on what needs to be done and you're not just focused on issues here in Washington or anywhere else.

But it's an area where I think I will have to listen a lot at the outset before being presumptuous enough to have a particular agenda.

Senator Kohl. I thank you, Judge Roberts. I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge Roberts. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Sessions. . . . Judge, are you aware of the salary that you will be paid when you become--if you are so fortunate?

Judge Roberts. In a vague way, yes.

Senator Sessions. And I suppose you were when you were affirmed to the Court of Appeals?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Sessions. So you are not going to be back next week asking for a pay raise, are you?

Judge Roberts. Not next week, no.

[Laughter.]

Senator Sessions. The Chief was always over here knocking on our door about pay raises. But, you know, we have a deficit in our country--

[Laughter.]

Senator Sessions. --and you are paid the same--I guess the Chief may be paid more than Senators, but for the most part judges are paid what members of Congress are paid. And I frankly am dubious that we should give ourselves big pay raises when we can't balance the budget.

I also chair the Court Subcommittee, Courts and Administration, and as Chief you have a serious responsibility with regard to managing and providing guidance to the Congress on the needs of the court system. I know that--I am sure that you will do that with great skill and determination. But let me ask you, will you also seek to manage that court system--and I hesitate, but I will use the word "bureaucracy" at times--effectively and efficiently and keep it a lean and effective management team and maintain as tight a budget as you can maintain?

Judge Roberts. Well, if I am confirmed, Senator, the answer is yes. I am aware that there is, for example, the Administrative Office, and they provide valuable services to judges around the country. As a consumer of their services for the past two years, I have, certainly, particular views about where I think they're effective and helpful to judges and other areas where, like any bureaucracy, where I think they can do better. It is an area where my first priority is going to be to listen, because I'm sure there are many considerations of which I'm not aware that are very important for the Chief Justice to take into account. And after listening, I'll try to make the best decisions I can about administering that system.

Senator Sessions. Well, there are a lot of problems. Judges are not happy with the General Services Administration and sometimes GSA is not happy with the judges, and sometimes judges overreach and want to be treated awfully specially. So I think you have a challenge there. I would look forward to working with you. If you will help us make sure that your court system is lean and efficient and productive, we will try to make sure that you have sufficient resources to do those jobs.

Senator Graham. . . . The Office of Chief Justice of the United States is different, as you are the first among equals. What do you believe as Chief Justice you can bring to the table that you could not as just a normal member of the Court?

Judge Roberts. Well, if I am confirmed, I think one of the things that the Chief Justice should have as a top priority is to try to bring about a greater degree of coherence and consensus in the opinions of the Court. I know that has been--it was a priority of the last Chief Justice. I actually believe that is something that should be a matter of concern for all of the Justices. But as the Chief, with responsibility for assigning opinions, I think he has greater scope for authority to exercise in that area, and perhaps over time can develop greater persuasive authority to make the point. Again, coming from the Chief, it may be a point that other Justices would receive--be more receptive to than they might coming from one of their colleagues, that we are not benefited by having six different opinions in a case, that we do need to take a step and think whether or not we really do feel strongly about a point on which a Justice is writing a separate concurrence which only he or she is joining, or whether the majority opinion could be revised in a way that wouldn't affect anyone's commitment to the judicial oath to decide the cases as they see fit, but would allow more Justices to join the majority so the Court speaks as a Court. That is something that the priority should be, to speak as a Court.

Senator Graham. So your goal as Chief Justice is, where you can and as often as you can, to find consensus and unite the Court. Is that true?

Judge Roberts. I think the Court should be as united behind an opinion of the Court as it possibly can. Now, obviously, in many cases it is not going to be possible.

Senator Graham. I applaud you because we are a divided Nation, and the more united we can become at any level of Government, the stronger we will be. So I applaud you for that attitude.

Senator Cornyn. . . . Let me just ask you just as a practical matter, I worry when I see that the Supreme Court's opinions are so fractured and divided as you alluded to, I believe, on the question of the Ten Commandments. The only one that agreed with both decisions that the Ten Commandments could be displayed in Texas but not in Kentucky was Justice Breyer. And there were ten opinions in those two cases, which led the former Chief Justice Rehnquist to quip, "Well, that's more opinions than we have Justices." Ten opinions for nine Justices in that case which decided the constitutionality of the Ten Commandments.

Well, it strikes me that one of the goals of the Court ought to be--of any court ought to be to write decisions that can be read and understood by a person of reasonable intelligence and, frankly, Judge, I have to tell you that lawyers struggle, no doubt circuit court judges, trial court judges such as in the court you serve on now struggle to try to figure out just what in the world the law actually is. And it breeds additional litigation, a lot of money, a lot of time spent just litigating issues that the Court could, if it had the will, clearly decide.

And in some ways, I think it leads some observers to wonder whether the Supreme Court is firmly grounded in the reality of how their decisions will actually be read and understood and implemented, either by lower courts or by litigants who are trying to figure out what is the law, so how can I conform my behavior and how can I make plans in a way that I can rely upon is legal.

I would be interested in your observations.

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I hope we haven't gotten to the point where the Supreme Court's opinions are so abstruse that the educated lay person can't pick them up and read them and understand them. You shouldn't have to be a lawyer to understand what the Supreme Court opinions mean. One of the reasons I've given previously for admiring Justice Jackson is he was one of the best writers the Court has ever had, and I think you didn't have to be a lawyer to pick up one of his opinions and understand exactly what his reasoning is and why he is saying that, and if he is citing and relying on precedents, he cites them and explains them. They are not written in jargon or legalese, but an educated person whose life, after all, is being affected by these decisions can pick them up and read them, and you don't have to hire a lawyer to tell you what it means. I hope we haven't gotten to a point where that is an unattainable ideal.

Now, I'm not suggesting that I've always lived up to that, and I'd hate to have somebody go back and look at my opinions and critique them under that exacting standard. But I do think that's something that it's worth shooting for, at least in most cases, that opinions should be accessible to educated people without regard to whether they're lawyers or not.

Senator Cornyn. Well, I think your experience as both a lawyer practicing before the Supreme Court and advising clients, as well as being a circuit court judge and trying to apply those as an intermediate appellate court, will help you understand that and the importance of that.

Senator Brownback. . . . I want to talk on a separate hat you would carry as the Chief Justice of the United States, and that is as the head of the Judicial Conference of the United States, and it is about court reorganization. There have been proposals put forward to split the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, the far western circuit, very large circuit. There is discussions in the Congress about splitting that circuit in two because of its size, its caseload, a number of other reasons that have been proffered or put forward.

You would agree that under Article I, section 8, that Congress has the power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator.

Senator Brownback. And that these inferior courts would include such things as the circuit court and the lower district courts of the Federal Government?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

DOJ_NMG_0035858

Senator Brownback. So that Congress would have the power, its power--Congress has the power under the Constitution to split the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals?

Judge Roberts. I know that Congress did just that with respect to the old Fifth Circuit, which used to run from Florida out through Texas, and they split it into the new Fifth Circuit and the 11th Circuit. I don't think any questions have been raised about Congress's authority to do that.

Senator Brownback. And you do not raise those here as the head of the Judicial Conference of the United States?

Judge Roberts. Well, I wouldn't want to--

Senator Brownback. Some potential role there.

Judge Roberts. --just yet, but I'm not aware of any objections to Congress's authority. I don't think that's the issue. I know the judges have various views on whether it's a good idea of not, and since it affects them, I know some of the judges have expressed those views. But the question of congressional authority to do that is not something I've seen raised.

Senator Brownback. I thank you.

Senator Leahy. Let me switch gears again. Senator Grassley, who is not here right now, and Senator Specter and I have worked for several years to shed some light on the FISA Court, the Foreign Intelligence Court. A lot of Americans are affected by the decisions. Most Americans do not know how it works, do not know whether civil liberties are being curtailed or violated. We added some sunshine provision. The Attorney General now submits a biannual report to four congressional committees, details how many people are targeted for electronic surveillance and so on. It still is inadequate in the fact it doesn't get public reporting. If you are confirmed as Chief Justice, you are the overseer of the FISA Court. Most do not even look at that role of the Chief Justice. I think it is probably one of the most important ones if you are going to talk about our liberties and how they are protected. Would you be willing to work with Members of Congress to add more transparency, or do you believe there is enough transparency in the work of the FISA Court now?

Judge Roberts. Senator, you said you think this is something most Americans aren't aware of. I'd suggest probably most judges aren't aware of it. It is a specialized court. I will tell you when I became aware of it, it's a surprising institution. It's an unusual set-up.

Senator Leahy. Certainly different than what we think in our system of courts.

Judge Roberts. That was exactly my reaction. On the other hand, Congress, in setting up the court, obviously concluded there were reasons to do it that way. I was asked a question about appointing the judges to it, and my response was that given the unusual nature of it, very unusual nature, given the usual traditions of judicial processes, that the people appointed to it have to be people of the highest quality, undoubted commitment to all the basic principles, both of the need for the court and the need to protect civil liberties. That I think is very important.

Beyond that I would just tell you I don't know enough about the operations of the court at this point and how it functions to be able to make any representations about what

I would do other than that I certainly appreciate that it's an unusual establishment and in many respects doesn't have the sorts of protections that the normal judicial process has, and that I would be sensitive to those concerns.

Senator Leahy. I realize my time is up and I apologize, but I hope that if you are confirmed that you might be willing--and I think Senators Grassley, Specter and myself could put together some suggestions--to at least keep an open mind on.

Judge Roberts. Certainly, Senator.

Senator Leahy. Because in an electronic age, in a digital age, when more and more information is being pulled in on Americans that we sometimes do not even know about, it is frightening. We want security, but we want to be like--as Benjamin Franklin said, that people who give up their liberties for security deserve neither.

Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge Roberts. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Kennedy. At the outset of my questions I talked about Earl Warren, and you were enormously complimentary about Earl Warren, about him understanding not only the law, but also understanding the importance of the Chief Justice bringing other Justices together in a very important way in terms of dealing with a societal issue and a question, and I think we are a fairer country and a fairer land because of this.

This was really the bringing together of the mind and the heart. Oliver Wendall Holmes said: It's dangerous to think about legal issues can be worked out like mathematics. And another nominee who was here not too long ago, had this to say about the head and the heart. "What you worry about is someone trying to decide an individual case without thinking out the effect of that decision on a lot of cases. That is why I always think law requires both a heart and a head. If you do not have a heart, it becomes a sterile set of rules, removed from human problems and it will not help. If you do not have a head, there is the risk that in trying to decide a particular person's problem in a case, that may look fine for that person, but you cause trouble for a lot of other people, making their lives yet worse."

In the remaining moment, recalling Justice Warren, just thinking through what other nominees have said about the importance of a heart and a legal mind, and you as a Chief Justice together, in telling the American people how you were inspired by Chief Justice Warren at a very important and critical time in our Nation's history, what could yo tell them now that could give them the assurance that you might be a similar kind of Chief Justice should you be approved by the Senate?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, my point with respect to Chief Justice Warren was that he appreciated the impact that the decision in Brown would have, and he appreciated that the impact would be far more beneficial and favorable and far more effectively implemented with the unanimous Court, the Court speaking with one voice, than a splintered Court. The issue was significant enough that he spent the extra time in the reargument of the case to devote his energies to convincing the other Justices--and obviously, there's no arm-twisting or any of that. It's the type of collegial discussion that judges and justices have to engage in of the importance of what the Court was doing, and an appreciation of its impact on real people and real lives.

I recognize as a judge, and I recognized as a lawyer, that these cases have impact on real people and real lives. I always insisted when I was a lawyer about getting out into the field and seeing it. If I was arguing a case involving Native villages in Alaska, I went to the villages. If I was arguing a case about an assembly line, I went to the assembly line. You had to see where the case was going to have its impact and what its impression was going to be on people.

Now, none of those cases were as important as Brown v. Board of Education, but the basic principle is the same. I think judges do have to appreciate that they're dealing with real people with real cases. We obviously deal with documents and texts, the Constitution, the statutes, the legislative history, and that is where the legal decisions are made, but judges never lose sight, or should never lose sight of the fact that their decision affect real people with real lives, and I appreciate that.

Senator Kennedy. My time is up, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

Senator Feingold. A topic we touched on in our meeting in my office in July was the issue of judges going to judicial education conferences at sometimes fancy resorts which are put on by ideologically oriented groups and paid for by private corporations sometimes that even have cases pending before the judges in attendance. And when we spoke, of course, you had been nominated for the Associate Justice position, and our conversation concerned your personal interest in attending such events. As I remember, your answer was that you said you would rather spend your free time with your family, which I thought was a pretty good answer.

But now you have been nominated for Chief Justice, and one of your duties is to head the Judicial Conference which, among other things, sets the ethics policies for the Federal judiciary. And this is one area where I think Chief Justice Rehnquist might have taken a different course. He took a number of steps to essentially leave this ethical question up to the personal decision of individual judges and appointed a judge to head the Committee on Codes of Conduct who had been prominently featured in a "20/20" expose of these junkets. Not surprisingly, the Committee weakened the judicial ethics rules on this question of privately financed trips.

Chief Justice Rehnquist strongly opposed congressional efforts to put a halt to these judicial junkets that I believe sometimes reflect poorly on the independence and impartiality of the judiciary.

So I would like to know, Judge Roberts, if confirmed, whether you will use your power as Chief Justice to set a high ethical tone for the Federal judiciary by putting in place new codes of conduct that would prohibit judges from participating in privately funded "judicial education" that lets special interests essentially lobby Federal judges?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't think special interests should be allowed to lobby Federal judges. Stated that way, I think the answer is clear.

I don't know enough about how these things operate. As I said, I have not been on one of them. I don't know how the funding is set up. I don't know what the situation is. If confirmed, I'm certainly happy to examine it. I know that there is a conflict of interest or ethical standard review group, I think, within the Judicial Conference. I believe they addressed that question and issued an opinion on it recently. But, again, I am just sort of recollecting something I read.

DOJ_NMG_0035861

I would say more generally, though--and maybe it is off topic, in which case feel free to cut me off. But I do think it is important for judges and Justices to get out, particularly get out of Washington a little bit. I've always enjoyed going to the law schools, participating in the moot courts or, you know, functions where you get to visit with the law students. I've done that a few times--not a lot, a few times. I wouldn't call that by any stretch of the imagination "a junket." But I do think it's important for the Justices to get out around the country and particularly visit the law schools. That is probably not the same sort of thing you are talking about.

Senator Feingold. Fair enough, and I think you would agree that there is nothing wrong with judges or Senators golfing. That is not the question.

Judge Roberts. It may not be good for the game of golf, but...

[Laughter.]

Senator Feingold. In 2000, Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote a letter supporting repeal of a provision of the Ethics Reform Act of 1989 that bans honoraria for judges. Do you believe that the law should be changed to permit judges to take honoraria for speeches or appearances?

Judge Roberts. There again, Senator, that's not an issue I've looked at. I know the law prohibits that. I know that there was a case about that, and the Supreme Court decided that, to some extent, that prohibition was unconstitutional as applied to lower-level officials but constitutional as applied to others. It's not a question that I've addressed.

Senator Feingold. Just to return for the record for a moment, the item that the judge referred to in terms of Judicial Conference policy is actually the policy that I was concerned about that I thought was a step backward, and I just wanted that reflected in the record.

Senator Feingold. . . . On a different subject, after the passing of Chief Justice Rehnquist, a number of news articles discussed his legacy and noted that early in his tenure as Justice, he had been a dissenting voice, but the Court seemed to shift in his direction over time. Recently, Professor Cass Sunstein recalled that over lunch with a group of Supreme Court clerks when he was an Associate Justice, Chief Justice Rehnquist described his own role on the Court. He said the Court was like a boat that had tilted way over to one side, and his task was to put it upright again.

Do you believe that the Chief Justice has the duty to influence the overall philosophical direction of the Court through his personal leadership or through opinion-writing assignments or any other means? And do you think that it is appropriate for the Chief to do that?

Judge Roberts. I don't think using opinion-writing assignments as a way to try to promote a particular view or agenda is a good idea. And I don't think Chief Justice Rehnquist did that. I do think if you go back and look at every year that he was the Chief Justice and just pick out what you think are the 10 or 12 biggest cases of that year, I think you will find that those cases are distributed very evenly among the nine Justices. And one reason I think relations among the Justices were so collegial under Chief Justice

Rehnquist's leadership--at a time when, of course, the Court had very marked philosophical differences and sharp dissents in some areas, but everybody got along well--is because the Chief made a priority of being fair in his opinion assignments. I think that is the more important priority.

Senator Feingold. Can you imagine ever changing your vote in order to be able to assign the majority opinion to yourself or to another Justice? And do you think that such a practice is appropriate?

Judge Roberts. No, I don't, in answer to both questions.

Senator Feingold. So you would not do that.

Judge Roberts. I wouldn't do that. I think that, again, sort of trying to use that assignment power in a tactical way, it causes tension on the Court and I think undermines the ability of the Chief Justice, to the extent he has that ability--and it's obviously limited--to act as a force to help bring about some cohesiveness and collegiality.

Senator Feingold. Thank you. Thank you for that answer.

Miscellaneous Questions (Basic questions about law, the appellate process, and the Court; Katrina aftermath; gender of SOC's replacement; importance of pro bono; Reagan revolution; role of lawyers; greatest threat to rule of law; independence of the judiciary; Bob Jones; Bork nomination; HMO; natural law; favoritism toward corporations; etc.)

Senator Kyl. I appreciate that. You said in response to another question, you used the phrase "as applied." Most of the lawyers appreciate what you meant by that, but I wonder if you could elucidate, particularly for those who are not learned in the law, what the difference is between dealing with a case, an issue of constitutionality, per se, or as in "as applied" context, and how it is possible, for example, in Case No. 1 to uphold the constitutionality of a law on its face, for example, and yet in Case No. 2, it comes down a few years later to declare that in that situation the statute is unconstitutional as it is applied to the facts of that case. How can that be?

Judge Roberts. Well, the distinction is a basic one in constitutional law. If you have a facial challenge to a law, as we call it, or a per se challenge might be another way to put it, you're basically saying the law is unconstitutional without regard to the facts of the case, without regard to the record, whatever the application might be, whoever the parties challenging it might be, there's something about the law so fundamentally flawed that it's unconstitutional however it's going to be applied. That's a fairly narrow category of cases.

The other category is so-called as-applied challenge. You have a law that you know is not facially unconstitutional, but it may be applied in an unconstitutional manner. An easy example, you have a normal statute that's perfectly constitutional. If it's applied in a discriminatory manner, it may be unconstitutional as applied in that case. If it can be applied in a constitutional manner, you know, so long as the facts are a certain way, and if the facts turn out in the record not to meet those requirements, then it can be unconstitutional as applied, and in those situations you do need to know what the record is, you do need to know what the facts are, because the challenge might be, this law may be fine for other cases, but when you apply it to this case, when you apply it to this record or these facts, then it's unconstitutional. So a statute that is constitutional on its face can always be applied in an unconstitutional way, and so you can't give a categorical determination that there is no way in which that statute could ever be unconstitutionally applied.

Senator Kyl. This is another reason why, when you are asked, "Well, would you agree that a certain decision is a good decision and should be maintained as part of our jurisprudence and so on?" In addition to not wanting to give a hint as to how you might rule on a case, to some extent it is impossible to say because you do not have the facts of the case before you and the facts of Case A could cause you to render a different decision than the facts of Case B.

Judge Roberts. Well, that's right, and particular precedence obviously could be applied to variations on the fact situation that gave rise to that precedent, and sometimes those facts lead to a different results, sometimes those facts don't. And it makes sense to continue to apply it in a particular manner. But again--and I think most judges are of this view--that the fact are a critical part of the resolution of any dispute.

Senator Kyl. I know perhaps to non-lawyers this can cause frustration, "just tell me one way or the other," but judges have got to be fair to make sure that they do not treat all cases as the same because the fact differences could make the difference between your ruling one way or another in a case, and every litigant probably feels that their case is a little bit unique. Judges need to think about that and certainly need to be willing to consider that this person's case might be unique, and therefore, it has to be looked at in a way different than a similar but perhaps not identical case.

Judge Roberts. And of course, that's a lot of how the law develops, and as lawyers arguing in court, a lot of what I used to spend my time doing was saying, "This precedent doesn't apply," and the reason it doesn't apply is because these facts are different, and so you should reach a different result, or arguing that this precedent does apply even though these facts are different. The reasoning still covers that situation, and then that leads to the next case and so on, and it's that sort of gradual development of the law that helps shape the rule of law.

Senator Kohl. Judge, in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, we all saw that those who suffered the most were those who have not been able to take advantage of the great opportunities that our great country has to offer. As we found out, those without employment opportunities and educational opportunities simply did not have the means to escape the storm and the flooding.

As you seek to become the head of the judicial branch, as you seek the position of Chief Justice of the United States of America, what role would you play in making right the wrongs revealed by Katrina? And what role do you and the judicial branch play in making sure that we as a Nation keep on moving forward towards providing equal opportunity to all Americans?

Judge Roberts. The last part of your question, Senator, is, of course, really what's carved on the entrance to the Supreme Court: "Equal Justice Under Law." That is the commitment physically embodied in the Supreme Court, and it's the commitment in the Constitution. And I think the most important thing the Supreme Court can do and the judicial branch can do is to uphold the rule of law. That is the--I tried to point this out in my statement yesterday. That is the key to making all the rights that are in the Constitution, all the rights that legislators may confer on citizens, that's the key to making them meaningful. The difference between our system and our Constitution and the Soviet constitution that President Reagan used to talk about--it has wonderful rights in it, too. It didn't mean a thing because there was not an independent Supreme Court, an independent judiciary to enforce those rights.

We do have that, and that's the reason that we have been able to make progress in the area of rights and not had just empty paper promises.

So to the extent you're talking about the injustices in society and the discrimination in society, the best thing the courts can do is enforce the rule of law and provide a level playing field for people to come in and vindicate their rights and enforce the rule of law.

Senator Kohl. But in spite of all of our laws and all of our rules, we still saw what happened down in New Orleans, and the people who were left behind were people who had not had educational or employment opportunities. And the question I asked was whether you as a person who aspires to become the Chief Justice of the United States see a particular role other than continuing the role that you observe we are following now, a particular role for improving our ability to respond to the needs of those people who live under those circumstances.

Judge Roberts. Well, the courts are, of course, passive institutions. We hear cases that are brought before us. We don't go out and bring cases. We don't have the constitutional authority to execute the law. We don't have the constitutional authority to make the law. Our obligation is decide the cases that are presented.

Now, I'm confident, just in the nature of things, that there will be cases presented arising out of that horrible disaster of all sorts, and many of those will be Federal cases, I'm sure. Others will be in the State courts, and, again, the obligation of the Federal judiciary and the State judiciary is to make sure they provide a place where people can have their claims, their litigation decided fairly and efficiently according to the rule of law. That's the appropriate role for the judicial branch.

Senator Kohl. I appreciate that.

Judge, as we all know, you were originally nominated to replace the first woman ever to sit on the Supreme Court, Sandra Day O'Connor. There was a lot of speculation when she announced her retirement that the President might choose a woman to replace her, and she even suggested a little disappointment, not with you but with the fact that a woman was not chosen.

Had the President told you that the selection was down to you and an equally qualified woman for the post but that he thought a woman was needed, would you have seen that as a reasonable conclusion on his part?

Judge Roberts. I certainly think Presidents have and will consider a broad range of issues and characteristics and qualifications in selecting their nominees, and that's certainly one for a President to consider.

Senator Kohl. All things being equal in terms of qualifications, would you be pleased if the President chose a woman to replace Sandra Day O'Connor?

Judge Roberts. For the upcoming vacancy?

Senator Kohl. Yes.

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. I just wanted to make clear we weren't talking about this one.

I don't think it's appropriate for me to comment in any way about the President's future selections, other than to say that I'm happy with his past ones.

Senator Kohl. All right. Judge, as you know, confronted with a legal problem, most American families, unlike wealthy families and very large businesses, lack the resources to hire the largest and most preeminent law firms to do their bidding. Do you agree that for our Nation's working people securing civil justice is often rendered substantially much more difficult because it simply does cost too much? Do you have suggestions for addressing this issue? Do you worry that captivating national events, such as the O.J. Simpson and Michael Jackson trials, reinforce the view that in this country justice can be for sale and available to those who can afford it?

Judge Roberts. You know, I do think that the availability of legal services is not as broad and widespread as it should be. There are so many things and areas where I think lawyers could make a valuable contribution, but it's too expensive. And there are a number of responses that I think the bar should be taking. Obviously, for those at the lowest end of the income scale, I think there's an obligation to provide pro bono legal services. I think the big firms, little firms, medium firms--everybody needs to get involved in that. There's not enough appreciation about how you can do that.

For example, everybody thinks in terms of bringing a big case, litigation. You know, lawyers who do estate work can provide extremely valuable pro bono services. Lawyers who do tax work can provide extremely valuable pro bono services, the whole range of services, corporate work. I know lawyers in my old firm would do a lot of pro bono services helping set up nonprofit organizations, ensuring that they're complying with the law. People need to be a little more creative in the ways in which they can help.

I regard that as an obligation of the bar and I do think--in fact, in many cases, the situation you get is the people at the lowest end have access to pro bono services. People at the highest end can pay. It's the people in the middle who are left without legal services that could be extremely valuable, and I do think the bar needs to do more. I think firms need to do more. Individual lawyers need to do more.

Senator Sessions. . . . Judge Roberts, I tried a lot of cases in Federal District Court. I have written appeals to the Federal Appellate Courts and argued a few times in the Court of Appeals. I would like for you to help explain to us how this court system works and what an appellate judge does. I mean appellate judges do not go about to set policy in America. They do not go out to supervise and superintend the Legislative and Executive Branches. They decide cases that come before them. So is it not true that normally a case would be initiated in a Federal District Court of a State trial court, and a trial would be held, often with a jury, and a judgment is rendered?

Judge Roberts. That's what most people, most of us think of when we think of going to court. You're there. You know, you bring in the witnesses. They testify, they're cross-examined by the other side. There's one judge supervising the trial. If it's a jury case the jury is there. That's where most of the fact finding takes place. People have different versions of events, you know, who was there, what did they do? And people tell different stories, and that is where you try to sort that out, either before the jury or the single judge.

Senator Sessions. And a judge has to rule, he has to rule on evidentiary matters or legal matters,a nd sometimes a judge is in the midst of trial and maybe he makes an error maybe he does not make an error. But every word of that trial is put down, is recorded. And so after the trial if the losing party is unhappy, they can take an appeal, and when they do that, it goes to the Federal Court of Appeals for that Circuit, and they point out to the Court of Appeals where they think the judge made an error. And they say, this was wrong and we want a new trial judge, or remittitur, or some other remedy. Is that not what happens?

DOJ_NMG_0035867

Judge Roberts. That's right. The big difference, when you get up to the Court of Appeals, is that the facts are not really in play any more. Somebody's been determined--they think you're guilty or they buy your version of events. The Court of Appeals usually just looks at the legal issues. Somebody says, "The judge made a mistake. He shouldn't have let that witness testify, or he should have recognized that the police had no authority to conduct that search" in a criminal case. And that's appealed to the Court of Appeals, where in the Federal system there are three judges, and they're just looking at that legal question. And they just go back and look at the law, the precedents, and determine whether or not the law was correctly applied in the trial court of if mistake had been made and they need to do it over again.

Senator Sessions. And if they appeal, the lawyers write sometimes beautiful, carefully written briefs that point out the reasons why they think an error may or may not have occurred; is that not correct?

Judge Roberts. As a Court of Appeals judge, that's exactly the kind of brief you're looking for, and every now and then you get one.

[Laughter.]

Senator Sessions. And sometimes when you read the first brief, you are persuaded, and when you read the second brief you think maybe it was not as clear as you thought it was when you read the first one.

Judge Roberts. Not just sometimes, Senator, quite often that's my reaction. That's part of the adversary system, and you need to have lawyers doing a good job presenting the best arguments on either side so you can feel comfortable that you're making as good a decision as you can.

Senator Sessions. So the lawyers in the case and the clients and the parties want a judge who will carefully read those briefs and be fair and careful in analyzing whether or not they got a fair trial to ensure justice took place.

Judge Roberts. That's what I was always looking for when I was a lawyer, Senator, yes.

Senator Sessions. Mr. Chairman, I see the clock is going around in circles down there, I think. What do you want to do about time?

Chairman Specter. Well, they have not started the vote, and we all know that that is not totally predictable even when they say 4:30. Would you care to continue until the vote starts?

Senator Sessions. I would be pleased if the Chairman--do you know what my time is now?

Chairman Specter. You can run the red to--well, it just went off.

Senator Sessions. This is like a football referee, put so much time back on the clock. It says a minute left.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. You can run the red till 7 minutes and 30 seconds.

Senator Sessions. All right, very good.

[Laughter.]

Senator Sessions. Who am I to disagree with the Chairman?

Chairman Specter. Senator Sessions, if you would--

Senator Sessions. I will have 15 minutes after this?

DOJ_NMG_0035868

Chairman Specter. You have 15 minutes left, yes. Start the clock back at 15 minutes.

Senator Sessions. Okay, good. Thank you. The doctor down here is good at mathematics.

[Laughter.]

Senator Sessions. Businessman too.

But it is even more complicated than that in doing justice, and on the Supreme Court if a case comes up to you, you will probably have briefs from both parties. You will receive the transcript of the trial that the issue arises from, and you will study that. And you have several law clerks who will help you study that. And every one of the 9 Supreme Court Justices are also studying this same record and all these briefs. Is it not true that friends of the Court can submit briefs?

Judge Roberts. At Supreme Court level that's very common, and in some cases there are quite literally hundreds of so-called "friends of the Court" or amicus briefs. Different organizations that are interested in a particular ruling and have a particular perspective, a few of them are even helpful.

Senator Sessions. So you review that, and then you frequently set the case, or normally set the case for oral argument.

Judge Roberts. If the Supreme Court decides to--this is of course a very big part of their function. They get some 10,000 petitions every year, people saying, "I want you to hear my case." You know, all lawyers say they're going to take it all the way to the Supreme Court, 10,000 people try to do that every year. These days the Court hears about 80 of those, 80 of those 10,000. And the selection of which 80 to take is obviously a big part of the Court's function.

But once they have selected those 80 cases, then they go in and have new briefs on the merits, and all these amicus briefs are filed from different organizations presenting their arguments or their particular perspective, and then it's set for argument.

Senator Sessions. So the lawyers from both sides then appear before the Court over in the Supreme Court Building, and they answer questions and make their presentations as to why they think the Court should rule the way they would like it to.

Judge Roberts. They usually get an hour for the whole case, so each side gets a half-hour, and that half-hour is taken up almost entirely by the Justices' questions. I went back once and counted the questions during my half-hour, and there were over a hundred questions. Obviously some of them are rapid-fire questions, and if you follow the Court, you could probably guess who was asking those, and others were more elaborate questions, but more than a hundred in a half-hour.

So the job of the lawyer there is to be totally prepared to answer all of those questions. And, of course, some of them are going to lead into traps, and you have to be careful about that. Others are going to be the very difficult questions that the Court is eventually going to base its decision on. But it's a very both exhilarating and demanding process to go through an oral argument before the Supreme Court.

Senator Sessions. And I think there is little doubt that you are the best practitioner of it in the country. But with regard to that, you then finish, and do the judges then meet in conference to discuss the case?

Judge Roberts. They do. The Justices, each of whom has prepared the case by not only reading all these briefs and attending the argument, talking it over with their law clerks, but also reading back over the cases, the precedents that the lawyers have been arguing about, they go back and look at those, and then just the Justices in the conference room--no clerks, no staff, just the nine Justices sit in the conference room and talk about it, thrash out the case, eventually get to a point where they take a vote on what they think the disposition should be, the decision should either be affirmed or reversed, or sometimes something else in between, half affirmed, half reversed, sent back, whatever. And then the opinion is assigned, and that's still very much part of the process, the writing of the opinion, because quite often--or maybe not quite often, but often enough, the Justices find out that as they try to write a particular opinion, different problems come up. It doesn't seem as--it's not writing as they thought it would, and sometimes they have to go back and revisit the case because the Justice assigned the opinion decides that it's not--it should come out the other way or there should be a different reason, a different basis for the decision.

And then once the Justice who's writing it is comfortable with the opinion, they send it around to all the other chambers, and the individual Justices, if they agree with it, they send a memo around to everybody else that says, "Please join me." That's just the jargon the Justices use. It means, "Please join my name to your opinion." And sometimes they will have suggestions. You know, I'd be happy to join your opinion, but I disagree with this section, or I disagree with this footnote, or I disagree with this line of reasoning. If you could change that, I'd be able to joint.

Well, if you're a Justice who's getting--this is the first reaction you've gotten, the first vote back, you might be a little more willing to make a change to accommodate that suggestion. If you've got seven votes already in the bank and somebody says please change this or change that, maybe you're a little less willing because maybe then some of the others say, well, now I'm not happy with that change. And it can obviously get to be a very complicated process as the memos fly back and forth and the Court tries to come to some consensus around an opinion.

Often, maybe too often, there's not total agreement, and somebody will write a dissent and send that around. And others will join that.

Concurrence, you know, I can't agree with your reason, but I agree with the result, and so I'm writing separately to give you my reasons.

And the balance changes. Somebody can write a concurrence, and all of a sudden they've got five votes, and it's the majority, and the other majority, the original majority becomes the concurrence. But it's a--the analysis is done at--and this has been my experience on the court of appeals as well--a very high level, and I think it's critically important that it's just the Justices alone who go into the conference room, just as on my court now it's just the judges who go into their conference room, because judges and Justices in that situation can be a lot more open with their views. And it's been quite common in my experience over the past more than 2 years to have a judge say, "This is how I view the case," and then another judge say, "Well, what about this?" And the judge can say, "Well, I hadn't thought about that" or "The record says this." And you get out the record, put it out there and look at it.

Senator Sessions. But at some point you agree to sign on an opinion, one way or the other.

Judge Roberts. Right.

DOJ_NMG_0035870

Senator Sessions. And that becomes a decision of the judge and maybe the majority of the Court, or maybe a dissent, but that is a decision that is made. Isn't that why you should not in this hearing today blithely start expressing opinions on complex matters when you haven't been through that process and start prejudging matters before you have read the briefs, before you have read the transcript, before you have heard the arguments, before you have talked to your clerks, before you have discussed it with other judges? Isn't that the essence of what justice is, this careful process that leads us to as fair a result as humanly possible?

Judge Roberts. I think that's perfectly accurate, and if you've had the experience, as I know every judge and every Justice has, of having your original view changed when you read either the other side's brief in a case, after reading the opening brief, or had your view changed as a result of the discussion at conference, or had your view changed when you tried to write the opinion one way and it came out the other way, then you appreciate the significance of that process. And it's a total distortion and a perversion of that process to start out by saying, well, you know, I testified under oath that I thought this decision was correct, so I'm done, you know, no need to read the briefs, no need to listen to the arguments, no need to go into conference and talk with the other judges on the bench, I've already given my view under oath. Or even if you are going to be open to reconsideration, to start with that barrier, I testified under oath that this is the correct approach, that this is the right result, now maybe you can persuade me otherwise, well, that's not the burden that the litigant should have to take. The litigant should be able to know that all of the judges, all of the Justices that that person is arguing before have an open mind and are fully open to the process.

Senator Sessions. You wouldn't want to call Senator Biden and ask his permission to change the commitment you made, would you? Just a joke there a little bit.

[Laughter.]

Senator Sessions. You don't want to have to read a transcript of this hearing about the time when you try to decide how to rule on a case to make sure you didn't make some commitment. I mean, I think that is all I wanted to--the point I would like to make there.

Senator Graham. Now, from a 30,000 foot view of things, it seems to be that we are going to have a referendum on the Reagan era here, which I welcome. I sort of enjoyed it. He won 49 States. He did pretty good. You were a part of the Reagan era as a young lawyer. When I use the word, term, "Reagan revolution," what does it mean to you?

Judge Roberts. Well, it means to me generally a change in attitude. President Reagan always presented an optimistic view. He always told us that the best days of our country were ahead of us, and he reasserted basic fundamental truths in areas like foreign relations. We were going to stand up to the Soviet Union. We're proud of our system of Government. That's the right approach, not the Soviet approach. And people who have come of age after the Berlin Wall has fallen sometimes don't understand what it meant at that time.

Senator Graham. When it comes to the law, what does the term "Reagan revolution" mean to you?

DOJ_NMG_0035871

Judge Roberts. I think it means a belief that we should interpret the Constitution according to its terms, that judges don't shape policy, that judges interpret the law, and that legislators shape policy. The Executive Branch executes the law.

Senator Graham. Does it also mean that when you talk about affirmative action and you set up a quota system, that is not right?

Judge Roberts. President Reagan's policy was opposed to quotas, which were much more rigid at the time. People need to appreciate, 24 years ago the idea of a quota was a rigid set aside. We now have the recent Supreme Court decisions talking about consideration of particular factors as one factor in an affirmative action program. President Reagan was in favor of affirmative action, and he was opposed to quotas.

Senator Graham. Another line of inquiry that's been disturbing to me is that we talk about the clients you represent, whether it be the Ronald Reagan administration or some private sector client, and we tend to hold that maybe unpopular position against the lawyer. There is more and more of that happening. We have had court of appeals nominees that were accused of being insensitive to the disabled population when they won their case nine-to-nothing in the Supreme Court defending a university from the idea that they were not covered under the Americans with Disabilities Act.

I really do worry that in the future, that if we up here start holding who you represent against you, that young lawyers in the future will pass on the hard cases. What are your thoughts about that?

Judge Roberts. You know, it's a tradition of the American Bar that goes back before the founding of the country that lawyers are not identified with the positions of their clients. The most famous example probably was John Adams, who represented the British soldiers charged in the Boston Massacre. He did that for a reason, because he wanted to show that the Revolution in which he was involved was not about overturning the rule of law, it was about vindicating the rule of law.

Our Founders thought that they were not being given their rights under the British system to which they were entitled, and by representing the British soldiers, he helped show that what they were about was defending the rule of law, not undermining it, and that principle, that you don't identify the lawyer with the particular views of the client, or the views that the lawyer advances on behalf of the client, is critical to the fair administration of justice.

Senator Graham. Do you believe it is being eroded?

Judge Roberts. I do think there is an unfortunate tendency to attack lawyers because of the positions they press on behalf of clients and I think that's unfortunate.

Senator Graham. . . . What is your biggest concern, if any, about the rule of law as it exists in America, and what are the biggest threats to the rule of law as we know it today?

Judge Roberts. Well, you know, the rule of law is always vulnerable because the Supreme Court, as has been pointed out often in history, has only the persuasive power of its opinions to command respect. There have been famous episodes in the past, you know, President Jackson, Chief Justice Marshall has given his opinion, let's see him enforce it, other episodes of that sort. But over time, the legitimacy of the Supreme Court has been established and it's generally recognized across the political spectrum that it is the obligation of the Court to say what the law is and that the other branches have the obligation to obey what the Supreme Court says the law is.

The one threat, I think, to the rule of law is a tendency on behalf of some judges to take that legitimacy and that authority and extend it into areas where they're going beyond the interpretation of the Constitution, where they're making the law. And because it's the Supreme Court, people are going to follow it even though they're making the law. The judges have to recognize that their role is a limited one. That is the basis of their legitimacy.

I have said it before and I will just repeat myself. The Framers were not the sort of people, having fought a revolution to get the right of self-government, to sit down and say, let's take all the difficult issues before us and let's have the judges decide them. That would have been the farthest thing from their mind. The judges had the obligation to decide cases and the authority to interpret the Constitution because they had to decide cases and they were going to decide those cases according to the law, not according to their personal preferences.

Judges have to have the courage to make the unpopular decisions when they have to. That sometimes involves striking down Acts of Congress. That sometimes involves ruling that acts of the executive are unconstitutional. That is a requirement of the judicial oath. You have to have that courage. But you also have to have the self-restraint to recognize that your role is limited to interpreting the law and doesn't include making the law.

Senator Schumer. . . . So you will be Chief Justice. We have not talked about your role much here as Chief Justice. The Chief, the leader of the courts, the head of the judiciary, and I think one of your important roles is to defend the independence of the judiciary. So I am going to read you a few statements that were made about Federal judges in recent months.

Televangelist Pat Robertson has claimed that "an out-of-control judiciary is the single greatest threat to democracy," that judges are creating a "tyranny of oligarchy," and that the threat posed by the Federal judiciary is "probably more serious than a few bearded terrorists who fly into buildings."

Do you find that--do you disagree with that statement?

Judge Roberts. I do disagree with that conclusion, Senator. I think it's perfectly appropriate for people to criticize decisions of judges. That comes with the territory. It's a healthy thing. That type of criticism and analysis, saying the judge got it wrong, the court got it wrong, is healthy and good. And the only thing I would say is I'm not sure whether that criticism is along that line or--but personal attacks on judges for doing their best to live up to the judicial oath, that is something that I don't think is appropriate.

Senator Schumer. Well, isn't this language--I am asking about this language. This does not seem to be a legal didaction about a court case. When somebody says--

Judge Roberts. Oh, it's not an analysis--

DOJ_NMG_0035873

Senator Schumer. --judges are probably more serious--the threat posed by Federal judges is "probably more serious than a few bearded terrorists who fly into buildings," isn't that kind of quote abhorrent and inimical to our system?

Judge Roberts. I don't agree with that, and all I'm saying is that I think people have a right to be critical of judges, but attacks on judicial independence are not appropriate because judges--and certainly even judges with whom I disagree on the results or particular merits, they should not be attacked for their decisions. The decisions can be criticized, but attacking the judges I think is not appropriate.

Senator Schumer. Would you be a little stronger than that in terms of language like this? I mean, "not appropriate" is kind of mild in these kinds of sort of inflammatory type statements about the judiciary that you may soon be entrusted with protecting.

Judge Roberts. Senator, I said yesterday that, if confirmed, I would be vigilant to protect the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court and the judicial branch, and that is true. An independent judiciary is one of the keys to safeguarding the rule of law. Again, I said that yesterday, and I believe that. And to the extent the judiciary is attacked, I will be vigilant to respond and defend it.

Senator Schumer. Let me read you two more and just tell me how you would characterize them. Conservative lawyer and author Edwin Vieira suggested that Justice Kennedy, an appointee of Ronald Reagan, ought to be impeached for his decisions and quoted Stalin's infamous problem-solving solution of "no man, no problem." And Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council said, "The Court has become increasingly hostile to Christianity, and it poses a greater threat to representative government more than anything, more than budget deficits, more than terrorist groups."

Do you strongly disagree? Don't those statements turn your insides a little bit?

Judge Roberts. You know, again, I don't agree with them, but it's a free country. They're free to say what they wish. But the issue of impeachment was resolved in the Salmon Chase hearings. The basic principle was established. You don't impeach judges if you disagree with their decisions. That's not what the impeachment provision is.

Senator Schumer. I take it--and just answer. If you became Chief Justice, you would do whatever you could to dispel these kinds of notions and oppose people who said things like this when they say these things?

Judge Roberts. Well, I would do what I can, Senator, to make it clear to people--and I do think it's an important educating function that what judges do promotes the rule of law and that the rule of law preserves liberties for all Americans. I'm obviously not going to infringe anybody's First Amendment rights. People are free to say what they--

Senator Schumer. I am not asking that. I am asking just your First Amendment opinion of these kinds of things, and the most I guess you said is you disagree.

Judge Roberts. Senator, people from all across the political spectrum have attacked judges. They do it now. I've seen some very virulent attacks from all over the political spectrum, and certainly throughout history. Again, judges can stand the criticism of their opinions, but personal attacks I think are beyond the pale.

Senator Durbin. But there was one case, one case in particular that hasn't been mentioned today that I would like to ask you about, and that was the case involving Bob Jones University. That was one of the most troubling decisions of the Reagan administration. It was a decision to argue before the Supreme Court that Bob Jones University should keep its tax-exempt status within the IRS even though it had an official policy that banned interracial dating, denied admission to any applicants who engaged in interracial marriage, or were known to advocate interracial marriage or dating.

When the Reagan administration took that position, it reversed the position of three previous administrations, including two Republicans, all of whom argued that Bob Jones was not eligible for this tax-exempt status. This sudden reversal by the Reagan Justice Department, which you were part of at the time, led to the unusual step of the Supreme Court appointing a special counsel, William Coleman, as a friend of the Court, to argue in support of the IRS. In 1983, the Supreme Court ruled 8-1 against the Reagan administration and against Bob Jones University.

Judge Roberts, there was a heated debate within the Justice Department about whether or not to defend Bob Jones University and its racist policies. More than 200 lawyers and employees of the Civil Rights Division, representing half of all the employees in that division, signed a letter of protest. William Bradford Reynolds, the head of the Civil Rights Division, strongly supported defending Bob Jones. Ted Olson, another person well known in Washington, opposed this defense of Bob Jones.

Which side were you on? What role did you play in the decision to defend Bob Jones University policy?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I was ethically barred from taking a position on that case. I was just coming off of my clerkship on the Supreme Court, which ended in the summer of 1981. Supreme Court rules said that you could not participate in any way in a matter before the Supreme Court for a certain period of time--I think it was 2 years, or whatever it was--and it was within that period. This involved an issue before the Supreme Court. So I was ethically barred from participating in that in any way.

Senator Durbin. The memo that you wrote about the Bob Jones University position, the memo of December 5, 1983, that summarized it, leads one to believe in reading it that you were present during deliberations on this policy. Is that true?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator.

Senator Durbin. You were not.

Judge Roberts. I was not involved in the policy because of the bar on the participation.

Senator Durbin. There appears to be another memo which I am going to send to you dated September 29, 1982, with your handwriting in it relative to this same issue, and I just--I don't want to surprise you with it. I will send it to you and if tomorrow we get a chance, we can revisit it.

Let me ask you this. When--

Chairman Specter. Senator Durbin, may we have the numbers there? The staff needs those in order to put the document into the record.

Senator Durbin. Sure. I would be happy to. This is dated September 29, 1982.

Chairman Specter. And it has a number on it?

Senator Durbin. No number, but we will give you a copy.

Chairman Specter. Okay. Thank you.

Senator Durbin. We will share it with the Judge. I want you to have--this is not a surprise.

Judge Roberts. Sure.

DOJ_NMG_0035875

Senator Durbin. I just want you to take a look at it.

We had a nominee for the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, Carolyn Kuhl. Do you know her personally?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Durbin. Served in the Justice Department with her?

Judge Roberts. Right.

Senator Durbin. When she came before this committee, Senator Leahy asked her several questions and she said when she testified, quote, "I regret having taken the position I did in support of the government's change of position on Bob Jones. The nondiscrimination principle and the importance of enforcement of civil rights laws by the Executive Branch should have taken sway and should have been primary in making that decision." I appreciated her candor on that.

What is your belief? Was the Reagan administration position on Bob Jones University the right position to take?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator. In retrospect, I think it's clear. The people who were involved in it, as you say, themselves think that it was the incorrect position. I certainly don't disagree with that.

Senator Kohl. Judge Roberts, one of the most important constitutional events of our lifetime was the nomination of Robert Bork to the Supreme Court. Congress chose to exercise its role to advise, and in this case not to consent, based upon judicial philosophy and the strongly held opinions of the nominee. In effect, Congress told the President that we have an important role to play in the process as well. Do you believe that the Senate's rejection of Judge Bork in 1987 was a reasonable and respectable act, or instead do you view it as a period of unfair partisanship? What were your thoughts about that case as it unfolded?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I don't think it's appropriate for me as a nominee to comment on the Senate's treatment of other nominees, and I would respectfully decline to do that.

Senator DeWine. Appreciate the explanation, Judge. Let me ask you a more personal question. Last time you appeared before our Committee you were a lawyer in private practice. Since that time you have spent approximately two years on the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, a new experience for even a experienced practitioner like you. What surprised you about the last two years of judging?

Judge Roberts. Well--

Senator DeWine. If anything.

Judge Roberts. Well, I think I had the biggest surprise on the first day that I heard cases. Obviously, it's opening day and the first day of my career, so I prepared as well as I could. And the arguments were great. And went into the conference room, and I had my notes and all the books. It's just the judges, you know, just the three judges. We bring the record in. We're surrounded by the U.S. reports, by our Court of Appeals reports, by the United States Code that you folks have written.

DOJ_NMG_0035876

And I was ready. I'm sitting there, and I remember the Chief Judge, who by tradition sits on a new judge's first day, and he was there and another judge. And I waited a while, and I looked and they were still waiting. I waited a while longer, and they were still waiting. And finally, the Chief Judge advised me that the tradition was that the junior judge goes first at these discussions, and so I was kind of put on the spot right off the bat.

And part of what that conference was like and throughout, really has--I don't know if I'd say a surprise, but it's been illuminating to me. The judges really do roll up their sleeves and try to find the right answer. It's just the judges. But as we say, "Well, we think this case is controlled by the Smith case," we get out the Smith case. We open it up and look at it, reading over each other's shoulders and seeing exactly what it says. If somebody says, "Well, but in this case under the record there was no evidence about this or there was no objection raised about that," well, you get out the record and you look, and there at page 223, you point to it and say, "Well, here's where the objection was raised."

And the judges are very open. It's a very encouraging part of the process from my point of view. Nobody goes in there with set views. They want the benefit of the collegial process, the benefit of each other's views, and yo have to be able to substantiate your position. There's no place for rhetoric. People are pointing to the law, and I found that a very encouraging part of the process, what goes on in the conference room, which was of course a part of the process that I hadn't participated in before.

Senator DeWine. That is something that we do not see either.

Judge Roberts. Right.

Senator DeWine. No way of seeing that.

Judge Roberts. Right. And the positive part of that process to me was that nobody was invested in anything other than getting the right result, and they are prepared to be convinced, contrary to initial impressions, and I was as well. It's, I found, a very encouraging part of the process.

Senator Durbin. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And thank you for your fairness. Judge Roberts, good to see you again, Mrs. Roberts, friends and family.

Yesterday and again today, you have continued to prove your legal talents. I remember law students with your talents when I was in law school. I had to get to know them in the first year because they were then off to the Law Review, and I was off to buy another Gilbert's Outline. I didn't see them again.

But today I have noticed that the questions have changed some. The questions now are more--they have gone beyond your resume and beyond your legal skills. And I think it relates to the fact that so frequently, when asked, you have said, appropriately, that you will be driven and inspired by the rule of law, which is an appropriate term but a hard and cold term by itself. We know you have the great legal mind and have proven it with the questions here. But the questions that have been asked more and more today really want to know what is in your heart, and I think those are appropriate.

When you look down from the bench or read a trial transcript, do you just see plaintiffs and parties and precedents, or more? Do you see the people behind the precedents, the families behind the footnotes? I think that is what many of us are driving at with these questions.

You have lived a comfortable life. Court cases often involve people who have not. Many times contests between the powerful and the powerless, as someone said in the opening statement, the powerless just with the rule of law and the Constitution on their side, praying for relief for their day in court.

Aside from a few pro bono cases, as important as they are--and I salute you for being involved in them--what would the powerless, the disenfranchised, minorities, and others see in your life experience that would lead them to believe that they would have a fighting change in your Court?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I think there are many things that people could look to. You said I had a comfortable life. I think that's a fair characterization. I had a middle-class upbringing in Indiana. As part of that, I worked in the steel mills outside of Gary during the summers, as soon as I was old enough to do that, and throughout my life have been exposed to and mixed with at school, learned and played with people of a wide variety of backgrounds. Comfortable, yes, but isolated, in no sense.

I was, I would say, a typical middle-class kid growing up in Indiana and had, I think, a great upbringing. I was privileged in the sense of having my parents and sisters contributing to my upbringing and education. And I think people looking at my life would see someone in that experience, and obviously with limitations. I wasn't raised in other places in the country. I might have a different perspective if I were. I wasn't raised in different circumstances and would have different experiences if I were. If you look at the Supreme Court, the people there come from widely different backgrounds and experiences, and I think that's a healthy thing.

But as far as someone going into Court and looking to se why they would expect to get a fair hearing from me, I think--and I can answer this with respect to the court I am on now. It's hard for me to imagine what their case is about that I haven't been on their side at some point in my career. If it's somebody who's representing welfare recipients who have had their benefits cut off, I've done that. If it's somebody who's representing a criminal defendant who's facing a long sentence in prison, I've done that. If it's a prosecutor who's doing his job to defend society's interest against criminals, I have been on the side of the prosecution. If it's somebody who's representing environmental interests, environmentalists in the Supreme Court, I've done that. If it's somebody who's representing the plaintiffs in an antitrust case, I've been in that person's shoes; I've done that. If it's somebody representing a defendant in an antitrust case, I've done that as well.

It's one of the, I think, great benefits of the opportunity I've had to practice law as I have, is that it has not been a specialized practice. I have not just represented one side or the other. I've represented all of those interests. And I think those people will know that have had their perspective. I've been on the other side of the podium with a case just like theirs, and that should, I hope--and I hope it does now--encourage them that I will be fair and that I will decide the case according to the law, but I will have seen it from their perspective.

Senator Durbin. So let me follow through on that because I think that is what people need to hear, but we need to apply it to your real life and legal experiences. Let me talk to you about a case that you were a private attorney and involved in.

Today, there are about 45 million uninsured people in America. Too often Americans with insurance can't receive coverage for medically necessary procedures and have to fight the insurance companies. In my home State of Illinois, we have a law called the Illinois Health Maintenance Organization Act. I think you are familiar with it. It provides that if a patient's primary care physician deems a proposed procedure to be medically necessary but their HMO disagrees and denies coverage for the procedure, the patient may have the HMO's decision reviewed by an outside physician, the determination of that outside physician binding on the HMO.

You challenged this law on behalf of an HMO that refused to pay $95,000 for the shoulder surgery of Deborah Moran of my State of Illinois. The case went to the Supreme Court in 2002. You argued for Rush Prudential, and you argued they weren't subject to the Illinois law governing HMOs because, you said, they weren't really an insurance company.

You claimed that since the HMO was not providing health care but merely a promise to pay for health care, it was exempt. Thankfully, from my point of view, you lost the case. If you had won it, it would have put millions of American consumers and families at risk of losing coverage for necessary health care.

Judge Roberts, did you have any reservations about taking this case?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator, I did not. The result in the case, I did lose. I lose 5-4, if I'm remembering correctly. In other words, four of the Justices on the Supreme Court thought the argument we were--I was making on behalf of my client was correct. It has always been my position that I do not sit in judgment other than once I've satisfied myself that the legal arguments are reasonable ones, within the mainstream, if you will, that I don't decide whether that's the way I would rule as a judge or whether I would rule the other way.

My practice has been to take the cases that come to me, and if the other side in that case had come to me first, I would have taken their side.

Senator Durbin. So you didn't step back at any point in your practice and say, "No, I am not going to do this. I can't be associated with a case or a cause, even though it may be legal and ethical, that might cause so much harm to so many innocent people"?

Judge Roberts. That's a judgment for the legal system to make. They're asserting legal rights. Lawyers aren't judges when they're representing clients. They don't sit there and say--or maybe some do. I don't. I think it's a basic fundamental principle of the legal system and the bar that you take clients who have reasonable arguments--now, I'm not talking about frivolous arguments. I don't take cases in which those are raised. But the lawyers aren't the judges. The judges are.

Now, the case you mentioned, you've explained the arguments on one side. There were legal arguments on the other side, and four Justices agreed with those. This isn't an extreme case when it's decided 5-4. And that's one of the very points I was making earlier, that I take cases on all sides of the issue. You can go through and find cases. For example, when I was asked to assist an inmate on Florida's death row, I didn't step back and say, Well, is this really a good thing for me to assist this individual guilty of--convicted of particular murders? I took the case. When the various pro bono activities in which my firm was involved, I didn't sit in judgment and say, Is that something I agree with? Is it not something I agree with?

I was a lawyer involved in that area of the law, and I thought it my obligation to take the cases that come in.

Senator Coburn. . . . And I don't want you to feel committed to me at all. And I don't want to influence. I am very pleased that every time you are going to look at the law, look at the precedents, look at the facts, look at the litigants, and then work with the other Justices to try to do what is under the law, the Constitution, our Constitution, and our statutes.

So the only question I would have for you is this one final one, and I will finish, I hope, before 10 minutes are consumed. Where did our law--would you teach the American public where our law came from? I mean, there was law before the American Revolution. What did our law come from? What did--where did it come from?

Judge Roberts. Well, before the Revolution, of course, we were under the British legal system.

Senator Coburn. And before that?

Judge Roberts. Go back under the legal system in Britain to the Magna Carta and the dispute between the King and the lords there as they tried to establish their rights against the King or the central Government, was a key part of the development of English law since that time.

Senator Coburn. And prior to that? Some of the input to that was what some people--these very people who are worried--these very people who have lost confidence--call natural law. The ideas came from somewhere, didn't they? Like don't kill somebody, don't steal from them, be truthful. Where did those come from? Those came from the natural tendencies of what we were taught in beliefs through the years that would best support a society. There is a theological component to that to many people. But the fact is there is a basis for the laws that we have, and it has proven consistent through the years, even as it comes to America, that if we enforce those tenets, we all are better off.

Senator Feinstein. . . . I would like to kind of finish up some questions I have. Let me, in trying to sort of get at you the man, as opposed to you the jurist--Senator Simon, Paul Simon, in questioning Justice Ginsburg, said this: Theodore Roosevelt, in a 1913 speech--this is after he had been President--said this: Our judges have been on the whole both able and upright public servants. But their whole training and the aloofness of their position prevent their having, as a rule, any real knowledge or understanding, sympathy with the lives and needs of the ordinary hard-working toiler.

I think that is a danger for jurists. And probably no place is it a greater danger than on the United States Supreme Court, where you really are isolated and where, when you meet people, they will tend to be people of power and wealth and not people who are unemployed, not people who have many of the problems that Americans face. Have you reflected on this at all, either in your present tenure in the district court--excuse me, on the Circuit Court, or future tenure? How can you make sure that you stay in touch with the problems real people have out there?

Judge Roberts. That is something that I thought about, Senator, at greater length before I came onto the Court of Appeals as little more than two years ago. I think it's a common concern, that judges are isolated. There's some natural tendency to that. You find that lawyers that you used to socialize with don't feel they can talk to you anymore, and other people, again, a certain distance develops. And it is something that my wife and I talked about at the time. And I concluded, and she made the point, that it was a great blessing to me to have our children. They will obviously keep us in touch with things outside of the isolation of the law. There are a lot of soccer games and swim meets and things of that sort in my future for the next 15 years and I'll be seeing people not just involved with the law, not just involved with the Court, but other parents and other children in those activities. And I think that will be a very healthy part of an effort to keep in touch with things outside the isolated marble palaces.

Senator Feinstein. But I would hypothesize that if it is just through your children, it is still going to be a very limited segment of society.

Judge Roberts. Well, sure, Senator, but there have always been areas in which I've continued to be active that keep me involved with other people. I mentioned, I think yesterday, the Street Law Program that I've been a part of for more than 15 years, which--

Senator Feinstein. And you will continue that?

Judge Roberts. I certainly will. I continued that when I became a judge and plan on continuing it as well. It's jointly sponsored by the Supreme Court Historical Society, and that brings high school teachers. And I've always found that extremely rewarding because they have a very different perspective. They're obviously dealing with children a little further along at that stage, but they're not lawyers. And they're here to try to understand the law. And I have always enjoyed very much their questions and sharing with them why the Supreme Court is so important to the rule of law, and allowing them the opportunity. They go in and they see the Court in action, as it were, and then they go back. And it helps them talk to their students about something that I think is critically important for those students to know.

Senator Feinstein. Do you see yourself mixing with people in some of the harder places in our country?

Judge Roberts. Well, it's hard to look ahead and see how that would work. I have as--I know, for example, when I was a lawyer and handling a case about native village rights in Alaska, I went to the native villages. I've always thought that was an important part about understanding the real-world consequences of any case--to get on the ground. When I handled a case involving people on the assembly line, I went to the assembly line and saw what it was like. I went to these villages that you could only reach by boat or by plane, where they make do with so little because of the remoteness. And I've always viewed that as an important part of understanding any case that I've been involved in.

Senator Schumer. . . . As I have said, I would like to vote for you. To me, as I said in my opening statement, the test is: Are you a mainstream person, conservative mainstream but mainstream, or an ideologue? Now, this is my view, and I am not going to ask you yours. I think there are a couple of ideologues, too, on the Court who want to use the law to change America dramatically in their vision. And so I am going to try a few other ways to try and figure out who you are so I feel comfortable with it.

Justice Rehnquist in his hearings to become Chief Justice 19 years ago was asked where he sat on the ideological spectrum of the Court. Justice Rehnquist replied, "On the conservative side. In fact, on the basis of the Court's opinions," he said, not their personal preferences--he had been on the Court I guess, 16 years? You would know better than me. But a good number of years--13, I think.

Judge Roberts. Thirteen.

Senator Schumer. Yes. He said, "I think the Chief"--Warren Burger--"and I are probably the most conservative, and it may be that I am more so than he." That doesn't involve any previous case or bias. So let me ask you the parallel question about the D.C. Circuit upon which you sit now. Where, Judge, do you place yourself on the ideological spectrum of the D.C. Circuit?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I think that's a very hard question to answer for a number of reasons. One, as you know, almost all of our opinions are unanimous. We don't parse ourselves out according to an ideological spectrum.

Senator Schumer. Most are technical--yes, many are tech or commercial, you know, governmental, technical. But on the tough ones they are not.

Judge Roberts. I don't know where I fall. I do know that I saw recently a study that was done that indicated I agree more with some judges appointed by Democratic Presidents than I do with judges appointed by other Republicans Presidents, and it's not simply lined up according to the President who appointed you. There are judges there that I've joined in opinions where I've found myself--where we have had dissents. There are some--I know one case we were talking about earlier, the Bombardier case, Judge Rogers and I were in one position, Judge Rogers appointed by President Clinton, and Judge Garland was in a different position.

I know in another case that was decided that we have talked about, Barber, Judge Garland and I were on one side and Judge Sentelle dissented.

So to the extent there have been divisions, I think you could go and see and they would be completely non--

Senator Schumer. So you are saying you are somewhere in the middle--

Judge Roberts. --political. I am saying that judges don't think of themselves along an ideological spectrum.

Senator Schumer. Justice Rehnquist did.

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't.

Senator Schumer. Okay.

Judge Roberts. And the judges, I think, on the D.C. Circuit generally don't either.

Senator Schumer. So I guess you wouldn't want to place yourself on the current Supreme Court either.

Judge Roberts. No, I think that would be--

Senator Schumer. Okay. Let's try another route. I didn't think that one would get too far, although as I said, Justice Rehnquist did answer it. He is your mentor, and he answered it openly, fully, directly. He and Burger were the two most conservative, and he is more conservative than Burger.

DOJ_NMG_0035882

Senator Durbin. I am running out of time, but I do want to give you an opportunity. Last night I passed a memo along to you relative to the Bob Jones University case. I don't know if you have had a chance to look at it and can tell me whether that is your handwriting on that memo, whether you were in fact in a meeting involving the Bob Jones University decision with the Reagan administration. Did you provide any input in the meeting or have any conversations with Justice Department personnel about the case?

Judge Roberts. It is my handwriting. It's a list. It's a apparently a meeting to discuss a number of civil rights issues, six of them, I see. I did not participate in any way in the Bob Jones case. It was apparently discussed, according to this memo, at the meeting. The recusal rule that was at issue says that I shouldn't participate by way of consultation or advice, and I did not.

Senator Durbin. Thank you for clarifying that.

Senator Feinstein. . . . Now, Duke Law School Professor Katherine Fisk examined nine cases heard by you while you were on the court of appeals. Her review concluded that you ruled in favor of a corporation each time. Consequently, she made this prediction: "You're going to be a fairly reliable vote against workers' rights across the board."

Would you respond to that, please?

Judge Roberts. I think the conclusion is wrong. I would suggest that any examination of nine cases is too small of a statistical sample to draw any conclusions of that sort. I know that I've ruled against corporations on a regular basis on the D.C. Circuit. I think I just saw a study, a more comprehensive one, that suggested I tended to rule against corporations more than the average judge. I don't want to--I just skimmed the article, but it is quite often the case, for example, a lot of the business on the D.C. Circuit involves regulatory issues, agencies regulating corporations. Are you ruling in favor of the corporation or the agency? And I know I regularly rule in favor of the agency. Sometimes I rule against the agency. I like to think it depends upon the particular law and the particular facts. But I haven't seen that study, but, again, nine cases, I am sure you could fine nine cases going the other way as well.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you. I want to move on.

Senator Feinstein. . . . A number of people on our side are very concerned about Executive power and what we perceive, either rightly or wrongly, to be greatly expanded Executive authority in recent years, causing enormous concern in a number of different ways.

Let me go back into your past. In trying to get Senate documents, one of the documents withheld was a draft memo titled, "Establishment of NHAQ," the Nicaraguan Humanitarian Assistance Office. This office was used by President Reagan to give aid to the Nicaraguan contras following the passage of the Boland amendment, and that was a prohibition on providing funding to the contras.

What involvement did you have with the Nicaraguan Humanitarian Assistance Office?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I'm not familiar with the memorandum. If it was withheld, it was probably withheld from me as well, and I don't recall any involvement. So, you know, I don't recall any--

Senator Feinstein. Okay. Fair enough.

Judge Roberts. I do know that there was an issue--an issue was raised. I have seen memoranda that I know have been released about private fundraising activities, and I do know that I gave advice in order to make sure that they didn't engage in lobbying activities in order to be consistent with the Boland amendment. I've seen those, but beyond that, I'm not recalling anything.

Senator Feinstein. Do you believe that the administration's provision of funds to the contras exceeded the Executive's power in light of the Boland amendment's prohibition on funding the contras?

Judge Roberts. You know, it's not something I've--I just sort of know what I've read in the papers about it. And, you know, it seemed to me that it did. But, again, that's just based on--it's not based on a study or a legal analysis, just sort of--I think a lot of it--

Senator Feinstein. Well, it's a pretty simple question. I mean, when the Congress passes a law that says don't fund and the Executive finds a covert way to fund, and as you know, one of the great redeeming qualities of President Reagan was that he did an admission of wrongdoing, and I think the American people accepted that. He was able to admit a mistake, which I tend to think, you know, is hard to do in this arena. But in a way, it is a sign of a big person to be able to come forward and say, "I was wrong." So on its face, what you are saying, if I understand you, you do believe that the provision of funds exceeded the Executive power in this instance.

Judge Roberts. Well, again, I haven't done a legal study, but based on what I know, which is just what every citizens knows from reading--I think it all took place after I was no longer in the Government, or at least came to light after that. It seemed to be inconsistent with the law.

Senator Feinstein. Let me ask you a general question then. If an Executive exercises power in direct violation of an act of Congress, is such an act unconstitutional?

Judge Roberts. Well, the answer depends, Senator, and this is where you get back to the Youngstown analysis, where Justice Jackson said there are three categories: you can act with Congress' support, being unclear what Congress' position is--and he recognized a third category where you can act--the Executive may act in the face of a congressional prohibition. And there are certain areas where the Executive does have authority to the exclusion of Congress. You know, without stating a legal view, for example, one that law professors regularly talk about is the pardon power. In other words, that's given expressly to the President in the Constitution. And restrictions, if Congress were to pass a restriction on the pardon power, does the President nonetheless have the authority to act under the Constitution? That's a difficult question. But it may be that the President's authority would trump Congress' authority.

So I can't answer a question in the abstract without knowing exactly what the record is and what the situation is. What Justice Jackson said in Youngstown, though, is obviously true, that if the President is acting in the face of congressional opposition, his power is at its lowest ebb. As Jackson put it, it includes his powers less whatever powers

Congress has. So if it's in an area in which Congress has legitimate authority to act, that would restrict the Executive's authority.

Senator Feinstein. Which this case was. All right.

Senator Feingold. . . . On a different subject, some people blame plaintiffs' lawyers for various problems with the economy and the legal profession. Do you believe that lawyers who represent indigent persons in product liability and medical malpractice cases are harming America?

Judge Roberts. No.

Senator Feingold. Having worked on the defense side for most of your non-Government career, can you be fair in your rulings to plaintiffs seeking redress for injury?

Judge Roberts. I'm going to disagree with your premise. I've represented plaintiffs' interests. I think if you look, for example, at the antitrust cases I've argued, more of them have been on the plaintiff side than on the defendant side. One of my co-clerks, when I clerked for Justice Rehnquist, is a very prominent personal injury lawyer, and I think he does a wonderful job.

I know there are abuses in this area. There are abuses in the area of defense representation as well. I certainly don't have any biases one way or the other.

Senator Feingold. Thank you, Judge.

Senator Schumer. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

First, just a little housekeeping. I think tomorrow is the day that it is due for us to submit written questions, and you will have no problem getting those back to us before we have to vote, which I think by the agreement of the Chairman and the Ranking Member will be next Thursday, will you?

Judge Roberts. Well, it depends how many there are.

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. My answers will be fuller the fewer questions there are, but I will certainly--

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. I will certainly obviously make every effort to get them in as soon as possible.

Senator Schumer. Thank you. Next question: We have had a great debate here in the Senate and with the administration about the documents--there were 16 cases, I think, led by Senator Leahy, that the eight of us requested when you were Principal Deputy Solicitor General. Now, we know the administration has said they will not relinquish those documents. I just wanted to know--and I am not asking your view on the law. Do you have a personal objection if they were to give us those documents? Because you wrote them.

DOJ_NMG_0035885

Judge Roberts. Senator, I don't think it's appropriate for me to take a position. If the client is asserting a privilege, I don't think the attorney should be stating a position on it, because in these situations the privilege is that of the client. And for the attorney to take a position would, could, might put pressure on the client and--

Senator Schumer. I may not get--

Judge Roberts. --I think that's inappropriate.

Senator Schumer. I may not get this. Aren't they the attorney and you the client this time?

Judge Roberts. Well, when the memos were prepared, I was the attorney.

Senator Schumer. I see.

Judge Roberts. And they were the client.

Senator Schumer. So you won't take a position on that.

Judge Roberts. I don't think it's appropriate for a lawyer to do so.

Senator Schumer. Yesterday, as I told you, I was sort of confounded by the refusal to answer certain questions. I do not think any of us expected you to answer every question or answer the--give us the answer the way we want it. But we did hope that you would answer enough questions with enough specificity so that we and the American people would get a clear picture of the kind of Chief Justice you will be, not just rely on your assurances.

So I want to try this another way because I really want to find out. You are one of the best litigators in America. You know how to convince people. That is what you have been paid to do for a long time. So let me ask you, if you were sitting here, what question would you ask John Roberts so that you or us could be sure that we were not nominating what I call an ideologue, someone who you might define as somebody who wants to make law, not interpret law? And then how would you answer the question you asked yourself?

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. I'd begin by saying, "Well, that's a good question, Senator."

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. I think, with respect, I would ask a lot of the questions that have been asked, a lot of the questions that were asked in the questionnaire that I completed earlier, and it begins with the most important question, What is your view of the proper role of a judge in our system? And people have different answers to that question. I've given an answer to that question.

How do you approach particular cases in areas of particular interest? And I've been asked that question and I've given an answer. I've explained, for example, in the area of Executive power, as issues arise what the framework that I would use would be, and I've talked about the Youngstown opinion and Justice Jackson's framework there.

I've talked about how I would approach cases involving the right to privacy under the Liberty Clause. I've talked about how I would approach cases involving Government enforcement in the antitrust--

Senator Schumer. How about something that you have not--a question that has not been asked since some of us are still unsure?

DOJ_NMG_0035886

Judge Roberts. But in other areas people talk about--and it is personal views on issues, and there again, I think it is important. There may be some nominees who want to share personal views on issues. My reaction has been to emphasize--and I think this tells you about what kind of a judge I hope I am on the Court of Appeals and what kind of a Justice I would be if confirmed, and my reaction has been that I set those personal views aside, and so don't consider them pertinent. Other nominees might take a different approach in response to those types of questions.

People have asked about particular decisions, and I've talked about decisions in which I've been involved. We've talked about--with Senator Grassley about the Totten case in which I was involved, others about the Barber case involving Congress's power under the Spending Clause.

People have asked very probing questions about my legal positions. What did you--what was the position you were advocating in this case and why? I think it's fair to talk about the record.

Senator Schumer. Any question that you would ask that has been left out?

Judge Roberts. There have been a lot of questions asked and a lot answered. I can't think of any that--you know, I expected people to ask me about this and it hasn't been asked.

Senator Schumer. So I guess we did a better job than we think we did, right?

Judge Roberts. I think the Committee has been very effective over the last several days in learning a lot about me. I think in the process of meeting with the Senators before--and I was quite serious when I said I appreciated how accommodating everyone had been in sitting down with me. I think people learned a lot about me. I think you can learn a lot about me from looking at the 50 opinions I've written. You can learn about—

Senator Schumer. . . . What I would like to do is say a few concluding words here with a final request. First I want to thank you for holding up so well during the three days of grueling questions. Many of us on this Committee, probably every one of us, some more than others, has been wrestling with how to vote on your nomination since well before the hearing started, and of course now that process is accelerated. I, for one, have woken up in the middle of the night thinking about it, being unsure how to vote. I think my colleague from Delaware was onto something when he called this a roll of the dice.

But this is a vote on the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. You will in all likelihood affect every one of our lives in many ways for a whole generation, so this is not just rolling the dice, it is betting the whole house.

I thought I would share with you some of the thoughts of some of us with important questions; there are pros and cons. On the pro side first of all is your brilliance. You have an amazing knowledge of the law. You spent three days here talking on so many aspects of it without any paper in front of you, without a single aide coming over and whispering in your ear or passing you a note. Your knowledge of law and the way of presenting it is a tour de force. You may very well possess the most powerful intellect of any person to come before the Senate for this position.

Second on the pro side is that you seem to be a lawyer above all. You have devoted your entire life to the law, and it is clear that you love it. Most people in that position tend not to be ideologues. They will follow the law wherever it takes them, regardless of the consequences, and you have repeatedly professed that to be true for you. But given that you have spent most of your legal life representing others, and your limited tenure on the Court of Appeals did not allow you to run on very many non-technical cases, there is not a long enough track record to provide that point.

The third and perhaps the most important, at least to me, is your judicial philosophy of modesty and stability. Such a theory respects precedent, the Congress and other judges' opinions. Modest jurists tend not to be ideologues, and many of us on this side of the aisle would like the Court to maintain, and in cases related to the Commerce Clause like Morrison increase its modesty.

But in complicated decisions like this one, there is always a counterpoint even on the modesty question. Yesterday you said that the decision of Brown v. Board could be described as modest. Brown v. Board was breathtaking. It was wonderful. It reversed 80 years of accepted but bad law, yes, but modest? So I ask myself could overturning Wickard or Roe also be modest by your definition?

Nonetheless, I think the philosophy of modesty is an appealing, important and unifying philosophy to many of us.

Let me go to the con side here. First is the question of compassion and humanity. I said on the first days of these hearings it is important to determine not just the quality of your mind, but the fullness of your heart, which to I think a good number of us at least on both sides of the aisle really, mean the ability to truly empathize with those who are less fortunate and who often need the protections of the Government and the assistance of the law to have any chance at all. I did not seem much, for instance, to concede that the wording "illegal amigos" was unfortunate, yet you refused to say so. America has moved in the 21st century beyond what Senator Kennedy called "the cramped view of civil rights professed in the early Reagan administration." But you would not admit now in 2005 that any of those views you argued for in the early '80s were misguided, with the hindsight of history. That is troubling.

Second is the refusal of the administration to let us see any documents you wrote when you served as Deputy Solicitor General, when you were not simply following policy, which you have reminded us in your earlier days there and in the Counsel's office, but making it. This would have given us tremendous insight into who you are, international knowing who you are and what kind of justice you would make. But for what seemed to be self-serving reasons they were refused. Now this was not your decision, but you carry its burden, and I think we all have to consider it when weighing how to vote.

Third, and most important on the con side, is your refusal to answer so many of our questions. I know you feel you were more forthcoming than most any other nominee to the high Court. I must disagree. You certainly were more forthcoming than a few. Now, for instance, I do not know Justice Scalia's opinion on "Dr. Zhivago," but most answered more relevant questions than you did. Your refusal to comment on any issue that you thought may come before the Court, we learned a lot about your views on older, completely discredited cases like Lochner and Plessy and Korematsu, but they are not of much help to us. What we need to know are the kinds of things that are coming before the Court now, and it makes it hard to figure out what kind of Justice you will be, particularly in light of the fact we have little else to go on.

You did speak at length on many issues and sounded like you were conveying your views to us, but when one went back and read the transcript each evening, there was less than met the ear that afternoon. Perhaps that is the job of a good litigator, but in too many instances it did not serve the purpose of the hearing.

Having said that about documents and questions, obtaining documents and answering questions are a means to an end, not an end in itself. In some cases like Miguel Estrada's nomination, we had no knowledge of his views so we could not vote. But here there is clearly some evidence. So now we must take the evidence we have and try to answer the fundamental question: what kind of Justice will John Roberts be? Will you be a truly modest, temperate, careful judge in the tradition of Harlan, Jackson, Frankfurter and Friendly? Will you be a very conservative judge who will impede congressional prerogatives but does not use the bench to remake society like Justice Rehnquist? Or will you use your enormous talents to use the Court to turn back a near century of progress and create the majority that Justices Scalia and Thomas could not achieve? That is the question that we on the Committee will have to grapple with this week.

And over the next week, if you have any more information that could help us answer this question, I think every one of us would welcome it. Thank you, Judge.

Senator Feinstein. Mr. Chairman?

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Schumer.

Senator Feinstein. Mr. Chairman?

Chairman Specter. Wait just a minute. I will recognize you in a moment.

Judge Roberts, Senator Schumer has postulated quite a number of questions in his last soliloquy, but--

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. --they are summarized in what kind of a Justice you would be, and I think you are entitled to respond to that if you care to do so.

Senator Feinstein. That was going to be my request. I think it would be very important.

Chairman Specter. In that case, go ahead and make your request.

[Laughter.]

Senator Feinstein. Yes. I think--

Chairman Specter. Better the request comes from you than from me, Senator Feinstein.

Senator Feinstein. I think that Senator Schumer really summed up the dilemmas, and not only he has them on our side. I would very much like if you would respond, particularly to the con side. The pro side speaks for itself. Many of us are struggling with exactly that, what kind of a Justice would you be, John Roberts?

Chairman Specter. No time limit, Judge.

Judge Roberts. Well, I appreciate the comments very much, Senator Schumer, and I very much appreciate the pro side of the ledger.

On the con side, the issue of documents, it is hard for me to comprehend that there could be more documents. The numbers been ranging from 80,000 to 100,000, and there is a lot of paper out there.

DOJ_NMG_0035889

I have tried to be as fully responsive as I thought consistent with my obligations as a sitting judge and a nominee. And I appreciate that this is not a new issue. You have gone back and read the transcripts and of course participated. I have gone back and read the transcripts. It comes up at every nomination. In some instances Members of the Committee want more information than the nominee feels that he or she can give in good conscience. That is nothing new. I have tried to be as fully expansive as I can be, and drawn the line where as a practical matter I think it is necessary and appropriate.

The basic question, Senator Feinstein and Senator Schumer, what kind of a Justice would I be? That is the judgment you have to make. I would begin, I think, if I were in your shoes, with what kind of a judge I have been. I appreciate that it has only been a little more than two years, but you do have 50 opinions. You can look at those.

And, Senator Schumer, I don't think you can read those opinions and say that these are the opinions of an ideologue. You may think they're not enough. You may think you need more of a sample. That is your judgment. But I think if you've looked at what I've done since I took the judicial oath, that should convince you that I'm not an ideologue, and you and I agree that that's not the sort of person we want on the Supreme Court.

Beyond that I have the few days that I've been here, all the documents, the questionnaire. You have not just my opinions but my briefs. I think those also help show what kind of a judge I would be. You of course appreciate that that's presenting a position and I'm just an advocate, but advocates deal with the law in different ways. You can look at other people's briefs, I think, and conclude that that person may not be a good judge because of the way they argue the law. I would hope you would look at my briefs and my arguments before the Supreme Court and conclude that that's a person who respects the law, respects the Court before whom he is arguing, and will approach the law in a similar way as a judge.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Judge Roberts.

Senator Cornyn. If I might have three minutes. I would just want to ask the witness to explain the rationale as he understands it for the privilege--

Chairman Specter. Senator Cornyn, you are recognized for three minutes.

Senator Cornyn. Thank you. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me as odd, having been on the Committee last year when we had an unfortunate theft of internal documents that were written by staffers of individual Senators, and which were then published to the outside world, and there was bipartisan outrage over that. And we, as I recall, referred that matter for investigation and possible prosecution.

But surely if the Legislative Branch is entitled to confidential communications between our lawyers and us so we can do our jobs and get candid advice, the Executive or the President is entitled to the same sort of confidential and candid communications,

And, Judge, this is the question. I do not want anybody to be under the misapprehension that, number one, it is within your power to produce additional documents. It is hard to imagine there are in addition to the 100,000 that have already been produced. But I want to give you a chance to articulate the reasons why the law recognizes this importance of a confidential, candid communication between a client and the lawyer that cannot be readily overrun or trumped. Would you give that a shot, please?

Judge Roberts. Well, I mean certainly the basic attorney/client privilege goes back centuries, and there have been eloquent expressions of its value in the Supreme Court. I think of the Upjohn opinion from 1981 in the Supreme Court and other classic expressions. And the idea is that if we want people to benefit from the advice that lawyers can give, we have to ensure that they feel perfectly free to communicate and exchange their views with their lawyer without fear that that would be reviewed and used to their prejudice.

Carried forward to the point that we are talking about now, you have to have a candid exchange among lawyers in presenting cases to the Court in order to effectively represent your client whether your client is the Government of the United States or a private company. And that type of debate, which often involves pointing out inconsistencies in the decision, even flaws in your own legal position, say, "This is the argument, but this part of the argument is really quite weak and we have to be worried about that." Those sorts of things you do need to thrash out and discuss and elaborate on. And yet if that was then revealed to your adversary or to the Court, it would obviously prejudice the presentation.

And if those things were going to be regularly revealed, people wouldn't make those types of analyses and judgments. They wouldn't say, "This is a weak argument. What are we going to do about that? Should we really make that argument?" They would not commit those to writing and the adequacy of the legal counsel and advice would suffer, and the role of the advocate before the court in vindicating the rule of law on which the courts rely, would also suffer.

Senator Cornyn. Mr. Chairman, it may already be part of the record, but if it is not, I would ask unanimous consent at this point in the record that we would make the letter of former Solicitor Generals, appointed both by Democrat Presidents and Republican Presidents who agree that these Solicitor General memos should remain protected by the privilege, part of the record.

Chairman Specter. Without objection, so ordered.

[Senator Durbin follow-up comments:]

Senator Durbin. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Judge Roberts, again, thank you, and you may be nearing the end of the process, which I am sure is a great relief to you and your wife and friends.

Let me first address Senator Cornyn's point. The memos that were stolen from offices of the Senators on this Committee, stolen by a Republican staffer who was discharged, that case was turned over to the Justice Department. I sent a letter to the Attorney General yesterday applauding the fact that the Justice Department had in fact successfully prosecuted in Massachusetts a person who had hacked in and stolen the telephone records of Paris Hilton. And I asked the Attorney General to please ask our Special Counsel in this case to take a look at the precedent of the Paris Hilton case and see if he can perhaps protect our records as much as want to protect that poor young lady's telephone records.

[Laughter.]

DOJ_NMG_0035891

Senator Durbin. The second aspect I would like to raise is this. Many of these documents we are talking about have been given before. Justice Rehnquist offered similar documents to the Committee for consideration, so it is not unprecedented for us to ask, nor for the Government to produce them on a voluntary basis, no theft involved.

Senator Durbin. . . . If I could I would like to return to a discussion that we had yesterday about a very fundamental question. I asked you yesterday about a case that you handled as an attorney involving a large HMO, in which you advanced a very narrow reading of an Illinois State Law. Had your position prevailed, millions of American families stood the risk of losing coverage for their health insurance. You did not prevail, and as you mentioned, closely divided Court, which again underlines the importance of each new Justice as we consider them, but your position did not prevail.

Let me read what you said to me in response. You told me you had no reservations about taking the case, and here is what you said, quote: "My practice has been to take the cases that come to me, and if the other side in that case had come to me first, I would have taken their side," end of quote. I want to follow up on this.

You have taken some pride in the pro bono cases that yo have taken, and I am glad you have. I think that is part of being a professional, accepting pro bono cases. You were asked the other day about your participation in the 1996 case of Romer v. Evans, a landmark case that struck down a Colorado law that would have taken away the rights of gay and lesbian Americans. You gave some legal advice to the lawyer in this case who was trying to uphold the rights of those with different sexual orientation. So I will ask you, if the other side had come to you first and said, "Mr. Roberts, we would like you to defend the State amendment that took away the rights of gays and lesbians." Would you have taken the case?

Judge Roberts. It's a hypothetical question. Of course, I think I probably would have, Senator. I actually have done pro bono assistance for States on a regular basis through the National Association of Attorneys General, and if I'm remembering right, the State would have been the other party in that case. I think that's right. And through the State and Legal Center, I participate in moot courts for the States on a regular basis. And a big part of my practice was representing States, so if a State, in that case, Colorado, had come to me and said, "We have a case in the Supreme Court, would you defend it?" I might--again, I can't answer without knowing the full details and all that, and I have to look at the legal issues. And I would not, and never have, presented legal arguments that I thought were not reasonable arguments, doesn't necessarily mean they're going to prevail, and I have certainly lost my share of cases.

But it has not been my general view that I sit in judgment on clients when they come to me. I viewed that as the job of the Court when I was a lawyer. And just as someone once said, you know, it's the guilty people who really need a good lawyer, I also view that I don't evaluate whether I as a judge would agree with a particular position when somebody comes to me for what I did, which was provide legal advice and assistance, particularly before the Supreme Court.

Senator Durbin. I have a long series of hypotheticals that I will not get into, such as, all right, would you have represented that D.C. Government against the welfare families? You took pride--you spoke to me of your pride in representing the poor people in the District of Columbia on their welfare rights. I could ask you whether you would have taken the side of the Board of Education in the Brown case. Would you have taken the side of the State of Virginia in Loving. I could have gone through all of those hypotheticals. The purpose is, and the purpose of my original question was this: all of us are trying to get down to what are your core values, where would you draw lines, saying "I do have principles and values. There are certain things I would not use my legal skills to do because they conflict with those values."

If this is just a process, a legal contest, and you will play for any team that asks you to play, it raises a question about where would you draw the line if you would ever draw the line? And I think that is why I have asked this question, and I want to give you an opportunity now to tell us.

Senator Feinstein asked a little earlier today about the Plyler case. You came a little bit further than you did last night in saying--and I think this is a very safe assertion--"Children deserve an education." That is not a headline. But I think that what I would like to get to is the original question here. As a lawyer, do you have standards and values as to the causes and beliefs that are so important to you where you would draw a line?

Judge Roberts. Well, let me try to answer it this way, Senator. People become lawyers for different reasons, all perfectly good and noble, and legitimate. People who are interested, for example, in protecting the environment often will go into the law and practice environmental law because they think that is an effective way to advance a cause in which they passionately believe.

People who are committed to the cause of civil rights may become lawyers and become civil rights lawyers and present and press those causes because they are causes in which they passionately believe.

I became a lawyer or at least developed as a lawyer because I believe in the rule of law. The point I was trying to emphasize in my opening statement, that all of these other areas--you believe in civil rights, you believe in environmental protection, whatever the area might be, believe in rights for the disabled, you're not going to be able or effectively to vindicate those rights if you don't have a place that you can go where you know you're going to get a decision based on the rule of law. It was the point I was making with respect to the Soviet constitution, filled with wonderful-sounding rights, absolutely meaningless, because people who suffered under that system had no place they could go in court and say, "My rights have been violated." So that's why I became a lawyer, to promote and vindicate the rule of law.

Now, that means that that's at issue and play regardless of what the cause is, and that's why, as we were talking yesterday, you can go in my record and you'll see, yes, I've advanced cases promoting the cause of the environment. As I was discussing earlier, I've been on both sides of the affirmative action issue. Take even technical areas like antitrust. I've defended corporations; I've sued corporations. In each case, I appreciated that what I was doing as a lawyer, particularly as a lawyer before the Supreme Court, was promoting the rule of law in our adversary system. And I viewed that as--I appreciate that to some they may say, well, that sounds like you're a hired gun, to be disparaging, you are going to take the side of whoever comes in the door first. I think that's a disparaging way to capture what is, in fact, an ennobling truth about our legal system that lawyers serve the rule of law, above and beyond representing particular clients. That's why when the Chief Justice welcomes new members to the Supreme Court bar, he welcomes them as members of the bar and as officers of the court, because that is the important role that they play. That has significance for what types of arguments they can present and how they can present them.

Senator Durbin. Well, if I might say, Judge, if you have made one point many times over during the course of the last 3 days, it is that as a judge you will be loyal and faithful to the process of law, to the rule of law. I think that is without question from what you have said. I accept that on its face.

But the questions which we continue to ask you really try to go beyond that, because I said at the outset that I thought one of the real measures as to whether or not you should be on the Supreme Court goes back to a point Senator Simon had made: Would you restrict freedom in America or would you expand it?

When you are defending gays and lesbians who are being restricted in their rights by the Colorado amendment, you are trying, from my point of view, to expand freedom in America. That to me is a positive thing. That is my personal philosophy and point of view.

But then when you say, "If the State would have walked in the door first to restrict freedoms, I would have taken them as a client, too," I wonder, Where are you? Beyond loyalty to the process of law, how do you view this law when it comes to expanding our personal freedom? Is it important enough for you to say in some instances, "I will not use my skills as a lawyer because I don't believe that that is a cause that is consistent with my values and belief"? That is what I have been asking.

Judge Roberts. Well, and the--I had someone ask me in this process--I don't remember who it was, but somebody asked me, you know, "Are you going to be on the side of the little guy?" And you obviously want to give an immediate answer, but as you reflect on it, if the Constitution says that the little guy should win, the little guy is going to win in court before me. But if the Constitution says that the big guy should win, well, then, the big guy is going to win, because my obligation is to the Constitution. That's the oath. The oath that a judge takes is not that I will look out for particular interests, I'll be on the side of particular interests. The oath is to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that's what I would do.

Senator Durbin. Would you at least concede that you would take into consideration that in our system of justice the race goes to the swift, and the swift are those with the resources, the money, the lawyers, the power in the system, and that many times the powerless, the person who has struggled and clawed their way to your courtroom, went through a wall of adversity which the powerful never had to face, is that part of your calculation?

Judge Roberts. Absolutely, and it is, again, what's carved above the doors to the Supreme Court: "Equal Justice Under Law." And the judicial oath talks about doing justice without regard to persons, to rich and to poor. And that, of course, is critically important. You do have to appreciate that there are going to be interests who, for one reason or another, don't have the same resources as people on the other side. The idea is not to give the case to the side with the best resources, the side with the best lawyers, the side with the most opportunity to prepare and present. It is to decide the case according to the law and according to the Constitution. And as case after case in the Supreme Court shows, that's often the prisoner who's sitting in his cell and writes his petition out longhand. Sometimes the Constitution is on that person's side and not on the side of the corporation with the fancy printed brief. But the judge's obligation is to appreciate that the rule of law requires that both of those be treated equally under the law.

Senator Durbin. Judge Roberts, thank you very much.

Mr. Chairman, thank you.

[follow-up comments by Senator Graham:]

Senator Graham. Just for a couple minutes. I am trying to compile questions from the past where the answers were very similar to the answers of Judge Roberts about "I can't comment," "I can't answer your question because it may compromise my integrity," the judge in the future. And I would ask for permission of the Committee to get a chance to organize this because there are so many volumes. And what I would like to be able to demonstrate to the Committee is that the pattern that he has displayed in terms of saying "I can't give you an answer because it may disqualify me" is not unique to the Senate and very similar to past nominations, and I have got some examples of that.

But if I may--and I know we have been here--and Lord knows this guy has been through the wringer--I just want to comment a little bit about an unhealthy area I think we find ourselves in, in the last hour. Most of us are lawyers, and I would hate to be judged by the people I have represented in the past, totally. I have represented some people that are not very nice. But I gave them my all. I have represented people on Air Force bases that were so unpopular, Judge Roberts, that no one would eat with me, because it was my job as the area defense counsel to represent that person.

Your heart. Nobody can question your intellect because it would be a question of their intellect to question yours.

[Laughter.]

Senator Graham. So we are down to the heart. And is it all coming down to that? Well, there are all kinds of hearts. There are bleeding hearts, and there are hard hearts. And if I wanted to judge Justice Ginsburg on her heart, I might take a hard-hearted view of her and say she is a bleeding heart. She represents the ACLU. She wants the age of consent to be 12. She believes there is a constitutional right to prostitution. What kind of heart is that? Well, she has a different value system than I do, but that doesn't mean she doesn't have a good heart. And I want this Committee to understand that if we go down this road of putting people's hearts in play, and the only way you can have a good heart is adopt my value system, we are doing a great disservice to the judiciary.

Thank you.

Miscellaneous Questions re: Memos (Maintaining beliefs in 1980s memos; judicial term limits; regretting language in the memos; HIV/AIDS)

Senator Kohl. You have today suggested on numerous occasions that the things that you represented in writing or in opinion back in the 1980s and into the 1990s, working for the Reagan administration and working for the Attorney General and then finally working as Deputy Solicitor General, were in many cases the opinions of people for whom you worked, not necessarily your own. I assume, therefore, there are those opinions that you are prepared to disavow.

Judge Roberts. My view in preparing all the memoranda that people have been talking about was as a staff lawyer. I was promoting the views of the people for whom I worked. In some instances, those were consistent with personal views; in other instances, they may not be. In most instances, no one cared terribly much what my personal views were. They were to advance the views of the administration for which I worked.

Senator Kohl. Well, I appreciate that, and not that we are talking about you in an entirely different situation, of course, our curiosity is which of those positions were you supportive of or are you still supportive of and which would you disavow?

Judge Roberts. Well, at this point, of course, we are now 23, 24 years later. I would not--I would have to address each of those positions anew. I wouldn't try to transport myself back 24 years and say, What did you think 24 years ago? And that would require me to look at and examine all those things. And, of course, it's not how I would look at the issue if I were a judge. If I were a staff lawyer advancing a particular view, it's one thing. As a judge, I would want to confront the issue with an open mind, to fully and fairly consider the briefs and arguments of all parties, to consider the record--we've talked today about how important a record is in a particular case--consider the law and the precedents. And, of course, the law and the precedents have changed in many of these areas dramatically over the past 24 years.

I'd have to consider all those before reaching a conclusion in any of those particular areas.

Senator Kohl. Sure. It would be helpful to many of us to know which of those positions you took then no longer represent the position that you would take today. I think that would show a change as we grow and develop and experience life. That would be illuminating and enlightening to many of us to hear what some of those position you took then no longer are represented in your thought process today.

Judge Roberts, in an October 3, 1983, memo, you wrote that while you served as Associate White House counsel for the Reagan administration, you expressed support for judicial term limits. You did specifically support the idea of limiting judicial terms to 15 years, and you said, I quote, "to ensure that Federal judges would not lose all touch with reality through decades of ivory tower existence." And do you still support in theory the idea of judicial term limits?

Judge Roberts. You know, that would be one of those memos that I no longer agree with, Senator.

[Laughter.]

DOJ_NMG_0035896

Judge Roberts. I didn't fully appreciate what was involved in the confirmation process when I wrote that.

You know, the sentiments that were expressed there I think are certainly something that's worth discussing, perhaps. My basic point was when the Framers establish a system of life tenure, people didn't live as long as they do now. You know, I do think there are concerns, though, that I may be a little more, a bit more sensitive to now than I was then, and they have to do with sort of a definite cut-off point. I'm not sure that's healthy for the institution of the judiciary, for people to know, for example, well, it's sort of like--as you say, term limits--that if we wait another year, this judge will be gone or that Justice will be gone. I'm not sure today from where I sit that that is a good or healthy thing for the Judiciary.

Senator Kohl. So you do not support term limits anymore?

Judge Roberts. I have to say I do not because I do think that that restriction at the end, so litigants could look and shape their litigation in light of who they think the judges or Justices might be, I think that's not a healthy development.

I would note that, if I'm remembering the memo correctly, I think it was a proposed constitutional amendment, which I am not sure, but I think that obviously is a policy choice that the Constitution allows to be pursued through that process.

Senator Kohl. All right. Judge, since your nomination, literally, as you know, tens of thousands of pages of your writings as a young White House aide have been released and looked at very carefully. In some of these writings, you took very pointed positions, as we discussed, some political, some constitutional, and some that have raised eyebrows.

I also think about myself when I was in my 20s and then when I was at the age which you are now and who I have become today and how I have changed, matured, and hopefully grown as I have gotten older. I am sure when you have had a chance to review some of your old work as part of this process that there are things that you wrote back then that make you cringe, perhaps, today.

Are there positions you took back then as a 20-something lawyer that you would not take today? Can you give us a couple of examples of positions that you took then that, as you have grown and developed, and as you are now sitting before us to be the Chief Justice of the United States of America, that you are today not the person that you were back when you were 20-something?

Judge Roberts. Well, we've talked about the term limits for judges. More generally, as I look at all of these documents, and the numbers, somebody said 80,000 pages. It's a little daunting. I don't know that there are particular issues. I mean, you have to remember, this is 23, 22, 24 years ago. In many of these cases, not only have I changed, the law has changed dramatically in more than two decades.

You know, I'm sure--and again, of the many that have been released, I will say that it's really only a handful that have attracted attention for one reason or another, and I do think if you look at the whole body of work, that I would hope people would leave that with a favorable impression.

Certainly, there are many areas where it appears that I knew a lot more when I was 25 than I think I know now when I'm 50. I had a lot of different experiences in the intervening period that give you valuable perspective. In that intervening period, for example, I left the government, went out in the private sector, litigated a lot of cases against the government. You do get a different view of things when you're on the other side. I think that's extremely valuable.

I hope, as you suggest, I've grown as a person over that period, as well, and that that also gives you some perspective and that type of a perspective might cause somebody to moderate their tone with respect to some issues and in some areas, and I'm sure that's the case. I certainly wouldn't write everything today as I wrote it back then, but I don't think any of us would do things or write things today as we did when we were 25 and had all the answers.

Senator Schumer. … The other thing that troubled me was the issue of civil rights. Many of us consider racism the Nation's poison. De Toqueville wrote about that since 1832. And we know you wrote these series of memos 20 to 25 years ago. Some of them are written in a tone that suggests you may have been insensitive to discrimination and hostile to equal rights. And I have talked to people who might have felt just that. People have said that.

So my question is not the substance, but do you regret the tone of some of these memos? Do you regret some of the inartful phrases you used in those memos or reference to illegal amigos in one memo?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, in that particular memo, for example, it was a play on the standard practice of many politicians, including President Reagan, when he was talking to a Hispanic audience, he would throw in some language in Spanish. Again, the memos were from me to Fred Fielding. I think Mr. Fielding always found the tone--

Senator Schumer. You don't regret using that term? Could you think that some people might find it offensive?

Judge Roberts. It was meant to convey the notion--again, as I've described--that when politicians speak to a particular audience in that language, is that offensive to the audience? It was meant to convey that. It was an issue concerning a particular radio interview.

You know, the tone was, I think, generally appropriate for a memo from me to Mr. Fielding, and I know that he never suggested that it was anything other than appropriate.

Senator Schumer. I would have to disagree with you, but we will leave it at that.

On a more substantive level, in light of where we are in 2005--admittedly we have progressed in civil rights since 1982--can you identify any policy or piece of legislation you argued for or supported in the Reagan era that you now believe went too far, that you now believe would not be good enough for America? I am not challenging that you were representing somebody else than, as you have said to us before, but I am asking in hindsight--it is now 2005, you are almost double the years on this Earth. Any of those policies that you think now, using hindsight, shouldn't have been done?

DOJ_NMG_0035898

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I think some 80,000 pages have been released of memoranda that I wrote--

Senator Schumer. You can just pick one or two.

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't--you know, I have not gone back and re-evaluated all those policies, no. I do know, though, for example, in the area of civil rights, people have talked about memos I wrote about the administration's policy against busing or the administration's policy against quotas. Being against busing and being against quotas is not the same as being against civil rights. President Reagan was against busing. President Reagan was against quotas. But he was in favor of civil rights, and that was the administration position that I was advancing in those memoranda.

Senator Schumer. I understand you were advancing someone else's position. I was asking your own view, if there were any regrets or changes in viewpoint of you personally. But we will leave it at that if you don't want to mention any.

Senator Feingold. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge, let me start off by taking a couple of new topics. In September 1985 when you were in the White House Counsel's Office, you recommended deleting the following line from the presidential briefing materials, quote: "As far as our best scientists have been able to determine, the AIDS virus is not transmitted through casual or routine contact." You said at the time that the conclusion was in dispute. We now know of course that the line is completely accurate, but I would say we also knew that then.

The Center for Disease Control guidelines issued the month before you wanted to delete that line said the following, "Casual person-to-person contact as would occur among schoolchildren appears to pose no risk." Major news organizations had reported the CDC's conclusion. In fact, the CDC had said as early as 1982 that it was unlikely that HIV could be spread through casual contact.

Judge Roberts. I'm sorry. As early as when?

Senator Feingold. As 1982, that it was unlikely that HIV could be spread through casual contact. Why did you recommend that that line be deleted?

Judge Roberts. Well, for the reason I gave in the memorandum. This was a statement by the President, and I just wanted to--didn't want the President giving out medical advice if it was the subject of some uncertainty. I obviously was not a medical expert, and you said the CDC had issued a report a month before. Well, earlier in your commentary--I don't know what the 1982 issue was--but I just thought it was--it's purely a matter of caution and prudence to have the President make a pronouncement on a--you have to remember this was at the very beginning of the AIDS coming into public consciousness, and I was just concerned that the President not be giving out medical statements if people weren't absolutely sure that it was correct.

Senator Feingold. Let me follow that a little bit. It certainly was an early time and also a critical time. I am wondering what you did to check or have someone check on these facts. I mean you must have known that the issue was so important the President was saying something like this, that it could have given great reassurance to people all over the country, as well as helping children infected with the AIDS virus to live happier and more normal lives to know that this was the medical conclusion. So I am just wondering why you would not check it out a little bit.

Judge Roberts. I mean I--the flip side of that, Senator, of course, is if it turned out to be wrong, it could have been disastrous to have the President announcing--because the President wasn't a medical expert either--and I'm sure my suggestion would have caused the people drafting the President's speech to go back, and if they thought they were convinced and they were sure, then that's what would have gone in there. It was just a question of concern. I wanted to make sure that they were 100 percent confident that what the President was going to be saying about a medical issue was they had complete confidence in it. I don't know actually whether they took it our or left it in, but at least it caused them to focus--

Senator Feingold. I do not want to belabor it, but I think that was a great opportunity for presidential leadership and reassurance, and I would just respectfully disagree with your judgment there.

Judge Roberts. Well, my judgment--just so I could--it wasn't my medical judgment. The impact of my suggestion was, obviously to cause to people who wanted that in there to go back and make sure they were sure that they wanted the President of the United States issuing a medical statement.

Senator Feingold. I think it was pretty certain at that time what the medical view as, as indicated by the medical community of our Government, but I will leave it at that.

Reliance on Foreign Law

Senator Kyl. Now, you have seen that each one of us have a couple of soap boxes that we like to mount, and after about 5 minutes of our opinion, then we ask you a question. I have one of those for you, something that has been bugging me.

There has been a lot of discussion about the Supreme Court's reliance, or even reference to foreign law to determine the meaning of the United States Constitution. I just wanted to note a couple of the cases in which this was done recently.

A case this year, Roper v. Simmons, in which the Supreme Court reversed a prior precedent and decided that it would be unconstitutional to execute a man who was 17 at the time that he brutally murdered a woman by throwing her off a bridge. In deciding the case, the Supreme Court not only, in my view, engaged I questionable analysis of American law, it spent perhaps 20 percent of its legal analysis discussing the laws of Great Britain, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Iran, Pakistan, Nigeria and China. The Court claimed that we ought not to "stand alone" on this issue, and that we should pay attention to what other nations do when we interpret our Constitution.

In 1999 Justice Breyer argued that the Court should consider whether a long delay in executing a convicted murderer, a delay, by the way, caused by his repeated and arguably frivolous appeals, should be deemed cruel and unusual under the Eighth Amendment. And it relied on the legal opinions of courts in Zimbabwe, India, Jamaica and Canada.

The trend, if it is to become one, is greatly troubling to me and to many of my colleagues. Our Constitution was drafted by the Nation's Founders, ratified by the States and amended repeatedly through our constitutional processes that involve both Federal and State legislators. It is an America Constitution, not a European or an African or an Asian one, and its meaning, it seems to be, by definition, cannot be determined by reference to foreign law.

I also think it would put us on a dangerous path by trying to pick and choose among those foreign laws that we liked or didn't like. For example, many nations have a weak protection for freedom to participate in or practice one's religion. Iran and some other Middle Eastern nations come immediately to mind, but even a modern western nation like France has placed restrictions on religious symbols in the public square. That would be highly unlikely to pass muster in U.S. Courts. Should we look to France to tell us what the Free Exercise Clause means, for example?

Even nations that share our common law tradition, such as Great Britain, offer fewer civil liberty guarantees than we do, and the press has far less freedom. Nations such as Canada have allowed their judges to craft a constitutional right to homosexual marriage.

There is a lot more to say on this subject, but I wanted to hear from you, so my question is this: what if anything is the proper role of foreign law in U.S. Supreme Court decisions? Of course we are not talking about interpreting treaties or foreign contracts, but cases such as those that would involve interpretations of the U.S. Constitution?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't want to comment on any particular case, but I think I can speak more generally about the approach. I know Justices Scalia and Breyer had a little debate about it themselves here in town, and it was very illuminating to get both of their views. And I would say as a general matter that a couple of things that cause concern on my part about the use of foreign law as precedent--as you say, this isn't about interpreting treaties or foreign contracts, but as precedent on the meaning of American law.

The first has to do with democratic theory. Judicial decisions in this country--judges of course are not accountable to the people, but we are appointed through a process that allows for participation of the electorate, the President who nominates judges is obviously accountable to the people. The Senators who confirm judges are accountable to the people. In that way the role of the judge is consistent with the democratic theory. If we're relying on a decision from a German judge about what our Constitution means, no President accountable to the people appointed that judge, and no Senate accountable to the people confirmed that judge, and yet he's playing a role in shaping a law that binds the people in this country. I think that's a concern that has to be addressed.

The other part of it that would concern me is that relying on foreign precedent doesn't confine judges. It doesn't limit their discretion the way relying on domestic precedent does. Domestic precedent can confine and shape the discretion of the judges.

In foreign law you can find anything you want. If you don't find it in the decisions of France or Italy, it's in the decisions of Somalia or Japan or Indonesia or wherever. As somebody said in another context, looking at foreign law for support is like looking out over a crowd and picking out your friends. You can find them, they're there. And that actually expands the discretion of the judge. It allows the judge to incorporate his or her own personal preferences, cloak them with the authority of precedent because they're finding precedent in foreign law, and use that to determine the meaning of the Constitution. I think that's a misuse of precedent, not a correct use of precedent.

Senator Coburn. I want to go to something that Senator Kyl talked with you about, and I was very pleased with your answer. He asked you about referencing and using preference to select and pick precedents from foreign law yesterday. I thought you gave a very reassuring answer to the American public.

You based your answer on two points. One is that the democratic theory is that in this country, with our law, the people are involved in that, both through the Senate, the House, and the President who appoints you. The other point you made is that relying on foreign precedent does not confine judges.

I just want to kind of ask a couple of questions. Number one, the oath that you took for your appellate position and the oath that you will take states the following, that I, John Roberts, do solemnly swear that I will administer justice without respect to persons and do equal right to the poor and to the rich, and that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent upon me, John Roberts, under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, so help me, God.

My question relates to the Constitution and what is said in Article III, that judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior. My question to you is, relying on foreign precedent and selecting and choosing a foreign precedent to create a bias outside of the laws of this country, is that good behavior?

Judge Roberts. Well, I--for the reasons I stated yesterday, I don't think it's a good approach. I wouldn't accuse judges or Justices who disagree with that, though, of violating their oath. I'd accuse them of getting it wrong on that point, and I'd hope to sit down with them and debate it and reason about it.

I think that Justices who reach a contrary result on those questions are operating in good faith and trying, as I do on the court I am on now, to live up to that oath that you read. I wouldn't want to suggest that they're not doing that. Again, I would think they're not getting it right in that particular case and with that particular approach and would hope to be able to sit down and argue with it, as I suspect they'd like to sit down and debate with me. But I wouldn't suggest they're not operating in good faith to comply with--

Senator Coburn. Can the American people count on you to not use foreign precedent in your decision making on the Supreme Court?

Judge Roberts. You know, I will follow the Supreme Court's precedents consistent with the principles of stare decisis, and there are cases in this area, of course. That's why we're having the debate. The Court has looked at those. I think it's fair to say, in the prior opinions, those are not determinative in the sense that the precedent turned entirely on foreign law, so it's not a question of whether or not you'd be departing from these cases if you decided not to use foreign law. For the reasons I gave yesterday, I'm going to be looking--

Senator Coburn. I understand that, and I respect that and I know that you can't be in a position to make a judgment on that. But again, for the record, I want to read what the Constitution says, that judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior and that the oath that they take references only the Constitution and the laws of this country. If anything, I would like to send a message that that is what their oath says and this judicial restraint that you have spoken of, I believe includes that oath and the definition that our Founders believed when they said, here is what you should base your decisions on, is the Constitution of the United States and the laws.

DOJ_NMG_0035903

Right to Privacy and Abortion (including Roe v. Wade; Casey; Griswold; Rust v. Sullivan; Glucksberg; Cruzan; etc.)

Chairman Specter. But there is no doctrinal basis erosion in Roe, is there, Judge Roberts?

Judge Roberts. Well, I feel the need to stay away from a discussion of particular cases. I'm happy to discuss the principles of stare decisis, and the Court has developed a series of precedents on precedent, if you will. They have a number of cases talking about how this principle should be applied. And as you emphasized, in Casey they focused on settled expectations. They also looked at the workability and the erosion of precedents. The erosion of precedent I think figured more prominently in the Court's discussion in the Lawrence case, for example, but it is one of the factors that is looked at on the other side of the balance.

Chairman Specter. Well, do you see any erosion of precedent as to Roe?

Judge Roberts. Again, I think I should stay away from discussions of particular issues that are likely to come before the Court again. And in the area of abortion, there are cases on the Court's docket, of course. It is an issue that does come before the Court. So while I'm happy to talk about stare decisis and the importance of precedent, I don't think I should get into the application of those principles in a particular area.

Chairman Specter. The joint opinion then goes on, after the statement as to sexual activity, to come to the core issue about women being able to plan their lives. The joint opinion says, "The ability of women to participate equally in the economic and social life of the Nation has been facilitated by their ability to control their reproductive lives."

Do you agree with that statement, Judge Roberts?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator, as a general proposition. But I do feel compelled to point out that I should not, based on the precedent of prior nominees, agree or disagree with particular decisions, and I'm reluctant to do that. That's one of the areas where I think prior nominees have drawn the line when it comes to do you agree with this case or do you agree with that case. That's something that I'm going to have to draw the line in the—

Chairman Specter. Judge Roberts, the change in positions have been frequently noted. Early on in one of your memoranda you had made a comment on the so-called right to privacy. This was a 1981 memo to Attorney General Smith, December 11th, 1981. You were referring to a lecture which Solicitor General Griswold had given six years earlier, and you wrote, Solicitor General Griswold "devotes a section to the so-called 'right to privacy,' arguing as we have that such an amorphous right is not to be found in the Constitution." Do you believe that the right to privacy--do you believe today that the right to privacy does exist in the Constitution?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I do. The right to privacy is protected under the Constitution in various ways. It's protected by the Fourth Amendment, which provides that the right of people to be secure in their persons, houses, effects and papers is protected. It's protected under the First Amendment, dealing with prohibition on establishment of a religion and guarantee of free exercise, protects privacy in matters of conscience. It was protected by the Framers in areas that were of particular concern to them that may not seem so significant today, the Third Amendment, protecting their homes against the quartering of troops.

And in addition, the Court has, with a series of decisions going back 80 years, has recognized that personal privacy is a component of the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause. The Court has explained that the liberty protected is not limited to freedom from physical restraint, and that it's protected not simply procedurally but as a substantive matter as well. And those decisions have sketched out over a period of 80 years certain aspects of privacy that are protected as part of the liberty in the Due Process Clause under the Constitution.

Chairman Specter. So that the views that you expressed back in 1981, raising an issue about "amorphous" and "so-called" would not be the views you would express today?

Judge Roberts. Those views reflected the Dean's speech. If you read his speech, he's quite skeptical of that right. I knew the Attorney General was, and I was transmitting the Dean's speech to the Attorney General. But my views today are as I've just stated them.

Chairman Specter. So they were not necessarily your views then, but they certainly are not your views now.

Judge Roberts. I think that's fair, yes.

Chairman Specter. [After a question about Chief Justice Rehnquist's change of position over Miranda in Dickerson.] Well, that is the analogy I am looking for in Roe v. Wade. Might disagree with it at the time it was decided, but then his language is very powerful when he talks about it becoming "embedded in routine police practices to the point where the warnings have become a part of our national culture." The question, by analogy, whether a woman's right to choose is so embedded that it has become a part of our national culture. What do you think?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think that gets to the application of the principles in a particular case, and based on my review of the prior transcripts of every nominee sitting on the Court today, that's where they've generally declined to answer, when it gets to the application of legal principles to particular cases.

I would repeat that the Court has already applied the principles of stare decisis to Roe in the Casey decision, and that stands as a precedent of the Court as well.

Chairman Specter. Let me move to two more points before my time is about to expire, 2 minutes and 35 seconds.

There is a continuing debate on whether the Constitution is a living thing, and as you see Chief Justice Rehnquist shift his views on Miranda, suggests that he would agree with Justice John Marshall Harlan's dissent in Poe, where he discusses the constitutional concept of liberty and says, "The traditions from which it developed, that tradition is a living thing."

Would you agree with that?

Judge Roberts. I'd agree that the tradition of liberty is a living thing, yes.

DOJ_NMG_0035905

Senator Hatch. . . . Now, my friend, the Chairman, held up a chart with the number of cases that he said relied on Roe v. Wade. In fact, if I heard him correctly he called Roe a super duper precedent. Now, I am not sure that a super duper precedent exists, between you and me, but some have said that Planned Parenthood v. Casey, a very important case, reaffirmed Roe. But let me just ask you, am I correct that Casey reaffirmed the central holding in Roe, but substantially changed its framework?

Judge Roberts. That's what the joint opinion of the three Justices said, it was reaffirming the central holding, it revisited and altered the framework.

Senator Hatch. There were only a few votes to simply reaffirm Roe, were there not, in the Casey case?

Judge Roberts. Well, the plurality opinion is regarded I think as the opinion of--it's the opinion of the plurality, but as the leading opinion of the Justices of the majority, it's the one that judges look to in the first instance. There were separate opinions that disagreed with some of the ways in which that plurality revisited Roe. It reaffirmed the central holding in Roe v. Wade. It dispensed with the trimester framework, and it substituted for the strict scrutiny that Roe had established the undue burden analysis that since the time of Casey has governed in this area.

Senator Hatch. As I recall it, there were only a few votes, as you have mentioned, to simply reaffirm Roe, but does this suggest that Casey itself noted the troubling features of Roe and indicated that Roe's framework has not been workable?

Judge Roberts. Well, the question of the workability of the framework is I think one of the main considerations that you look to under principles of stare decisis, along with the settled expectations, whether a precedent has been eroded. That was one of the factors that the Court looked at in Casey in determining I think to alter the framework of Roe, the trimester framework and the strict scrutiny approach, at least in the terms that were applied by the joint opinion.

Senator Hatch. Our Chairman asked if former Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion in the Dickerson case, upholding Miranda, would apply to Roe v. Wade, and if I recall correctly, you properly declined to answer. But am I right that Chief Justice Rehnquist repeatedly believed that Roe should be overruled?

Judge Roberts. That was his view, yes.

Senator Hatch. Does that not mean that Rehnquist himself did not believe that his Dickerson holding should apply to Roe? Would that be a fair conclusion?

Judge Roberts. Based on his published opinions--now, I don't remember--well, certainly he wrote in Casey, I don't know if he's written since then, so I just hesitate to ascribe views from 1992 to current.

Senator Biden. . . . Now, you have already said to the Chairman that you agree that there is a right to privacy. And you said that the Supreme Court found such a right, in part, in the 14th Amendment. My question is do you agree that there is--not what settled law is. What do you think? Do you agree that there is a right of privacy to be found in the Liberty Clause of the 14th Amendment?

Judge Roberts. I do, Senator. I think that the Court's expressions, and I think if my reading of the precedent is correct, I think every Justice on the Court believes that to some extent or another. Liberty is not limited to freedom from physical restraint. It does cover areas, as you said, such as privacy, and it's not protected only in procedural terms but it is protected substantively as well. Again, I think every member of the Court subscribes to that proposition. If they agree with Bolling v. Sharpe, as I am sure all of them do, they are subscribing to that proposition to some extent or another.

Senator Biden. Do you think there is a liberty right of privacy that extends to women in the Constitution?

Judge Roberts. Certainly.

Senator Biden. In the 14th Amendment?

Judge Roberts. Certainly.

Senator Biden. Now, I assumed you would answer it that way. Let me suggest to you also that I asked--I asked Justice--or I am not sure whether I asked or one of our colleagues asked Justice Ginsburg the question of whether or not it would be a ball or a strike if in fact a State passed a law prohibiting abortion. And she said that's a foul ball. They can't do that. And let me quote her. She said, in response to Senator, former--I was going to say "Brownback"--Senator Brown when he was here, when she was up, of Colorado. She said, quote: "Abortion prohibition by State controls women and denies them full autonomy and full equality with men. It would be unconstitutional."

What is your view, according to the Ginsburg rule?

Judge Roberts. Well, that is in an area where I think I should not respond.

Senator Biden. Why?

Judge Roberts. Because--

Senator Biden. You said you would abide by the Ginsburg rule.

Judge Roberts. Then-Judge Ginsburg and now Justice Ginsburg explained that she thought she was at greater liberty to discuss her writings. She'd written extensively on that area and I think that's why she felt at greater liberty to talk about those cases.

In other areas, where she had not written, her response was that it was inappropriate to comment. In particular I remember her response in the Mayer and the Harris cases. She said those are the Court's precedents; I have no agenda to overrule them, and I will leave it at that.

And I think that's important to adhere to that. Let me explain very briefly why. It's because if these questions come before me, either on the court on which I now sit or, if I am confirmed, on the Supreme Court, I need to decide those questions with an open mind on the basis of the arguments presented, on the basis of the record presented in the case, and on the basis of the rule of law, including the precedents of the Court, and not on the basis of any commitments during the confirmation process. The litigants have a right to expect that of the judges or Justices before whom they appear.

And it's not just Justice Ginsburg who adhered to that rule. I've gone back and read--

Senator Biden. Well, she obviously didn't adhere to it with regard to-- Judge Roberts. Well, I explained why she felt at liberty to comment--

Senator Biden. Well, how is that different? That, I would suggest, Judge, is a distinction without a difference in terms of litigants, the way you just explained it. Does a litigant in fact say because a judge wrote about it and then spoke to it as a judge that somehow I am going to be put at a disadvantage before that judge on the court? That is a stretch, Judge.

DOJ_NMG_0035907

Judge Roberts. Well, that's how Judge Ginsburg explained it at her nomination hearings. She said she could talk about the issues on which she had written.

Senator Biden. Did that make sense to you?

Judge Roberts. I think it does make sense that she can be questioned about the articles that she'd written because they raised certain questions and she felt at liberty to discuss those. I think it's something entirely different if you talk about an area that could come before the Court. This is an area that cases are pending before the Court and they will be pending in the future.

Senator Biden. Well, let's try some things she didn't write about that she talked about. Let's see if you can talk about them.

One is she talked about Moore v. East Cleveland. You are much more familiar with the case than I am. That is a case where the city came along--and I am going to do this shorthand in the interest of time--and said a grandma living in an apartment with her blood grandchildren who were cousins, not brothers, violated the law. And the Chief said, in the minority opinion, your mentor, he said, "The interest of that grandmother may have in permanently sharing a single kitchen and a suite of contiguous rooms with some of her relatives simply does not rise to the level of a constitutional right. To equate this interest with fundamental decisions to marry and to bear and raise children is to extend the limited substantive contours of the Constitution beyond recognition."

Do you agree with his statement?

Judge Roberts. You know, I have no quarrel with the majority's determination and-- Senator Biden. Not my question, Judge.

Chairman Specter. Let him flesh his answers out.

Judge Roberts. I understand that. And I'm concerned about ramifications in which the issue could come up. But I have no quarrel with the majority's determination--

Senator Biden. Justice Ginsburg answered the question. She never wrote about it. She answered it specifically.

Judge Roberts. Well, I think--

Senator Biden. She went on to say that--and let me quote. She said, "Yes, he goes on--" This is quoting Justice Ginsburg. "He goes on to say history counsels caution and restraint, and I agree with him. He says then--" this is referring to the majority opinion--"But it does not counsel abandonment, abandonment of the notion that people have a right to certain fundamental decisions about their lives without interference from the State. And what he next says is history doesn't counsel abandonment, nor does it require what the city is urging here, cutting off the family right at the first boundary, which is the nuclear family. He rejects that. I'm taking the position I have all the time--" and she goes on to say--

She says uh-uh. She thinks your old boss was dead wrong. She said so. And she said the majority was dead right. Ginsburg rule. What do you think? She never wrote about it.

Judge Roberts. Senator, I think nominees have to draw the line where they're comfortable. It's a matter of some--

Senator Biden. Well, you are admitting you are not applying the Ginsburg rule.

Chairman Specter. Senator Biden, let him finish.

Senator Biden. I don't have much time. But go ahead.

DOJ_NMG_0035908

Judge Roberts. It's a matter of great importance not only to potential Justices but to judges. We're sensitive to the need to maintain the independence and integrity of the Court. I think it's vitally important that nominees, to use Justice Ginsburg's words, no hints, no forecasts, no previews. They go on the Court not as a delegate from this Committee with certain commitments laid out and how they're going to approach cases. They go on the Court as Justices who will approach cases with an open mind and decide those cases in light of the arguments presented, the record presented, and the rule of law. And the litigants before them have a right to expect that and to have the appearance of that as well.

That has been the approach that all of the Justices have taken.

Senator Biden. That is not true, Judge. Justice Ginsburg violated that rule, according to you. Justice Ginsburg said precisely what positions she agreed on. Did she in fact somehow compromise herself when she answered that question?

Judge Roberts. She said no hints, no forecasts--

Senator Biden. No, no.

Judge Roberts. --no previews.

Senator Biden. Judge, she specifically in response to a question whether or not she agreed with the majority or minority opinion in Moore v. East Cleveland said explicitly, I agree with the majority. And here's what the majority said and I agree with it.

My question to you is, do you agree with it or not?

Judge Roberts. Well, I do know, Senator, that in numerous other cases--because I read the transcript--

Senator Biden. So did I, Judge.

Judge Roberts. --she took the position that she should not comment. Justice O'Connor took the same position. She was asked about a particular case--

Senator Biden. Aw, Judge, Judge--

Judge Roberts. She said, It's not correct for me to comment.

Now, there's a reason for that, Senator.

Senator Biden. But you are going from--

Chairman Specter. Wait a minute, Senator Biden. He has not finished his answer.

Senator Biden. He's filibustering, Senator.

[Laughter.]

Senator Biden. But okay, go ahead.

Chairman Specter. No, he's not. No, he's not.

Judge Roberts. That's a bad word, Senator.

Senator Biden. That's what we do, too. Go ahead. Go ahead and continue not to answer.

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. Senator, my answer is that the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court requires that nominees before this Committee for a position on that Court not forecast, give predictions, give hints about how they might rule in cases that might come before the Court.

Senator Biden. I got that. Did Justice Ginsburg give a hint?

DOJ_NMG_0035909

Judge Roberts. I'm not going to comment on whether or not a particular nominee adhered to the approach that they announced.

Senator Biden. Well, let's make it clear. She did not. Let's stipulate she did not adhere to the approach. I don't have time because we don't have as much time, but I could list you for half an hour the questions she answered, the questions Kennedy, Souter--all the Justices, almost, with one exception, answered specific questions, which you are not answering and—

Senator Kohl. All right. Judge, do you believe that reasonable people can disagree on Roe v. Wade? Regardless of what you think of the decision, do you believe that there is an intellectually honest approach on the other side that is worth respecting?

Judge Roberts. I certainly agree that reasonable people can disagree about that decision, yes.

Senator Kohl. And you do, obviously, respect people on the other side of the issue?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Kohl. In Rust v. Sullivan, as Deputy Solicitor General you signed a brief in which you wrote, and I quote, "The Court's conclusions in Roe that there is a fundamental right to an abortion and that Government has no compelling interest in protecting prenatal human life throughout pregnancy find no support in the text, structure, or history of the Constitution."

So does this quote jibe with your statement that you understand that reasonable people can disagree?

Judge Roberts. I think so, Senator. The position that you're reading from there was the position of the administration. I was one of nine lawyers on the brief in that case. It was reflecting the position that had been advanced in four prior cases up to that point by the administration, and we were reiterating that position. This was before the Supreme Court issued its decision in Casey. That was the view of the administration and the conclusion.

I don't think there's anything in there that suggests we think or thought that anybody at that time who disagreed was unreasonable. That was our legal position. The other side was obviously presented in those cases.

Senator Kohl. But you are saying here that there is no support in the text, structure, or history of the Constitution for that position. That is pretty flat-out, pretty straight, pretty black and white.

Judge Roberts. And in those cases, the other side argued that there was. And I don't think there's anything in either of those views that suggests you don't think that reasonable people can take different positions on those questions.

Senator Kohl. . . . Judge, as we all know, the Griswold v. Connecticut case guarantees that there is a fundamental right to privacy in the Constitution as it applies to contraception. Do you agree with that decision and that there is a fundamental right to privacy as it relates to contraception? In your opinion, is that settled law?

Judge Roberts. I agree with the Griswold Court's conclusion that marital privacy extends to contraception and availability of that. The Court since Griswold has grounded the privacy right discussed in that case in the liberty interest protected under the Due Process Clause--that's the approach that the Court has taken in subsequent cases--rather than in the penumbras and emanations that were discussed in Justice Douglas' opinion. And that view of the result is, I think, consistent with the subsequent development of the law, which is focused on the Due Process Clause and liberty rather than Justice Douglas' approach.

Senator Kohl. Well, I am delighted to hear you say that because, as you know, many, many constitutional scholars believe that once you accept the reasoning of Griswold and find that the Constitution does contain a right to privacy and a right to contraception, you have essentially accepted--scholars have said this, essentially accepted the basis for the Court's reasoning and decision on Roe, that a woman has a constitutionally protected right to choose. These scholars reason that it follows logically that if a woman's right to privacy and her control over her body includes the right to contraception, it also includes a woman's right to choose to terminate her pregnancy. I am not sure whether you wish to comment on that. I just wanted to point out to you something that I am sure you are familiar with, that there is in constitutional thought a follow from Griswold to Roe.

Judge Roberts. Well, I feel comfortable commenting on Griswold and the result in Griswold because that does not appear to me to be an area that is going to come before the Court again. It was surprising when it came before the Court in 1965, I think, to many people. The other area is an area that is, to quote Justice Ginsburg from her hearings, "live with business." There are cases that arise there, and so that's an area that I do not feel it appropriate for me to comment on.

Senator Kohl. I appreciate that.

Senator Feinstein. In response to the Chairman's question this morning about the right to privacy, you answered that you believe that there is an implied right to privacy in the Constitution, that it has been there for some 80 years, and that a number of provisions in the Constitution support this right, and you enumerated them this morning.

Do you then believe that this implied right of privacy applies to the beginning of life and the end of life?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, first of all, I don't necessarily regard it as an implied right. It is the part of the liberty that is protected under the Due Process Clause. That liberty is enumerated--

Senator Feinstein. Part of liberty.

Judge Roberts. Yes, and the exact scope of it with respect to the beginning of life and the end of life, those are issues that are coming before the Court in both respects. And I don't think I should go further to elaborate upon whether or not it applies in those particular situations. Obviously, it has been articulated by the Court in both contexts, the Cruzan case with respect to the end of life, the Glucksberg case following Cruzan. But I don't think it's appropriate for me, given the fact that cases arise on both of those questions, to go further.

Senator Feinstein. All right. Let's move right along.

This morning, there was a discussion about stare decisis, and you pointed out that there were factors in consideration of stare decisis. And I think one of the things you said was workability of framework is one of the main principles you look for in stare decisis.

Well, in its decision in Casey, the Court specifically affirmed the doctrine of stare decisis as it applies to Roe. The Court reviewed prudential and pragmatic considerations to gauge the respective costs of reaffirming and overruling a case, that case. In doing so, the Court unambiguously concluded that Roe has in no sense proven unworkable.

Do you agree with this conclusion?

Judge Roberts. Well, that is--that determination in Casey becomes one of the precedents of the Court entitled to respect, like any other precedent of the Court, under principles of stare decisis. I have tried to draw the line about not agreeing or disagreeing with particular rulings, but that is a precedent of the Court. It is a precedent on precedent; in other words, it has examined Roe--

Senator Feinstein. So you agree that the Court said that, obviously.

Judge Roberts. Well, it said that, and that is a precedent entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis, like any other precedent of the Court. But in terms of a separate determination on my part whether this decision is correct or that decision is correct, my review of what other nominees have done is that that is where they draw the line and that is where I have drawn the line.

Senator Feinstein. So workability is clearly one thing. Is another one reliance?

Judge Roberts. Certainly, or as it is often expressed in the Court's opinions, settled expectations. People expect that the law is going to be what the Court has told them the law is going to be. And that's an important consideration.

Senator Feinstein. And in Casey, again, the Court stated, and I quote, "The ability of women to participate equally in the economic and social life of the Nation has been facilitated by their ability to control their reproductive lives," and that this ability to control their reproductive lives was enough of a reliance to sustain Roe, correct?

Judge Roberts. That's what the Court--I think you're reading from the plurality, the joint opinion in the case.

Senator Feinstein. That is correct.

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Feinstein. That is correct. Now, unlike my experience, there are now entire generations of women who know a world only where their reproductive rights are protected. Do you agree with the Court that this reliance is sufficient?

Judge Roberts. Well, again, I think that's asking me whether I think the decision was correct or not on that point. It certainly was the analysis of the joint opinion in the Court, entitled to respect as precedent like any other decision of the Court under principles of stare decisis. And that would certainly be where I would begin if any of these issues come before the Court if I were to be confirmed. I would begin with the precedent that the Court has laid out in this area.

Senator Feinstein. One other questions on Casey, and I would like to quote from something that Justice Ginsburg said in the transcript in her confirmation hearing in a discussion with then-Senator Brown. "The Casey majority understood that marriage and family life is not always what we might wish them to be. There are women whose physical safety, even their lives, would be endangered if the law required them to notify their partner, and Casey, which in other respects has been greeted in some quarters with great distress, answered a significant question, one left open in Roe. Casey held a State could not require notification to the husband." Do you agree?

Judge Roberts. That is what Casey held, yes, and that, as I said before, the precedent of the Court, like any other precedent of the Court, is entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you. One other reading from Justice Ginsburg's testimony. "Abortion prohibition by the State, however, controls women and denies them full autonomy and full equality with men. That was the idea I tried to express in the lecture to which you referred. The two strands, equality and autonomy, both figure in the full portrayal." Do you agree or disagree?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think Justice--then Judge Ginsburg felt at greater liberty to discuss that precisely for the reason you noted, that she'd given a lecture on the subject. Those are issues that come up again and again before the Court. Consistent with what I understand the approach to have been of other nominees, I don't think I should express a view on that.

Senator Feinstein. It has been reported that during your meeting with Senator Wyden, while discussing end-of-life issues, you cited the dissent of Justice Brandeis in Olmstead. I would like to quote from it. "The makers of our Constitution undertook to secure conditions favorable to the pursuit of happiness. They recognized the significance of man's spiritual nature, of his feelings, and of his intellect. They knew that only a part of the pain, pleasure, and satisfactions of life are to be found in material things. They sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions, and their sensations. They conferred as against the government the right to be left alone, the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men. To protect that right, every unjustifiable intrusion by the government upon the privacy of the individual, whatever the means employed, must be deemed a violation of the Fourth Amendment."

Do you agree with Justice Brandeis?

Judge Roberts. I agree with his expression that it's a basic right to be left alone and I think that animating principle is a very important one. With regard to particular restrictions he was talking about, wiretapping, or I forget how the interception actually at issue there, I don't think it's appropriate to comment on.

But as a general statement of the principle, and again, it reflects just the basic understanding that it's a free country and the right to be left alone is one of our basic rights. I do agree with that.

Senator Feinstein. I do think the implication of what you said to Senator Wyden, and I have discussed this with him, was that one has the right to make their end-of-life decision.

Judge Roberts. Well, that's an issue that is before the Court in particular cases and I can't comment on a case that's coming before the Court. If I am confirmed, I would have to confront that case with an open mind in light of the arguments presented, in light of the precedents of the Court, and the litigants in those cases are entitled to have judges that haven't expressed views on that particular case.

Senator Feinstein. Well, let me ask you this question, then. In an interview on PBS after the Court ruled in Washington v. Glucksberg, a case involving a State statute that banned assisted suicide, you said, "I think it's important not to have too narrow a view of protecting personal rights." What did you mean by that?

Judge Roberts. Well, I went on to explain that the right--any time there's an assertion of a right, there's quite often an assertion of a contrary right. I think it was similar to a point Senator Kyl was making earlier, that, for example, if you're asserting a right against government regulation, then the right of the people to regulate through their elected representatives that's being struck down, that right is being restricted.

So it's usually not--it's often not, we could view that as a right on one side and there's nothing on the other side. But there's often an assertion of a right on the other side. And what the courts have to do is make sure they provide a level playing field in which people disputing the impact of the Constitution, on whose right prevails, have judges who will decide that case according to the rule of law, and not according to whether they think one right should prevail or another.

Senator Feinstein. But do you believe then that the Federal Court should become involved in end-of-life decisions?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, that is exactly one of the questions that's before the Court, and I can't answer that in the abstract. I have to answer that on the basis of the parties' arguments, on the basis of the record in the case, on the basis of the precedents. An abstract opinion that would prejudge that case would be inappropriate for a nominee to express.

Senator Feinstein. Let me ask it another way. Do you believe that the Court should have a limited role in that situation?

Judge Roberts. I think courts have a limited role in general, and that is that they only interpret the law, they don't make the law, they don't shape the policy. Now, the application of that basic principle, which is very important to me, in a particular case is obviously something that hospital to wait for the litigation of that case, the arguments in that case, the arguments of the lawyers about whether it's consistent with the precedents or inconsistent with the precedents, but the basic principle, the courts should not be shaping public policy--that's for the legislators--is a fundamental principle with which I agree.

Senator Sessions. … You know, Senator Specter came right out of the chute asking you about stare decisis and Roe and other related type matters, and that is an important question. As I understand it, you committed to Senator Specter that you would bring no hidden agendas to this matter, that you would consider any case that came up under Roe or any other case that might impact stare decisis, and that you would apply a reasonable, professional analysis to that, drawing on the history of courts and their opinions in dealing with these cases, and would try to make a fair and honest and objective decision. Is that what I understood you to say?

Judge Roberts. That's what I understood my testimony to be, yes, Senator.

Senator Sessions. And you are not saying one way or the other how you would rule on Roe or some of the other cases that have been--

Judge Roberts. No. I feel that it would be very inappropriate for me as a nominee to tell how I would rule on a particular case that might come before the Court.

DOJ_NMG_0035914

Senator Sessions. Well, I would like to know how you would rule on a lot of those cases, too, but I didn't ask you when you came and talked with me, and I don't think it is appropriate. I don't think those of us who are politically conservative ought to look to the courts to promote our conservative agenda through the manipulation of interpreting words of the Constitution or statutes. I don't think liberals have a right to ask the Court to promote their agenda by twisting the plain meaning of words to accomplish an agenda.

What we need is what you said, an umpire, fair and objective, that calls it like they see it based on the discrete case that comes before the judge. And I think that is most important.

I would just say I don't know the answer to those questions legally, how it will all come out, but I would just offer that polling data continues to show that young people and numbers in general are showing that the people are more hostile to abortion than they used to be. Perhaps it is seeing the sonograms and those kind of things. Seventy-five percent, according to a Harris survey, said that they didn't think an abortion was proper in the second trimester; 85 percent said they didn't think it was proper in the last trimester.

I just saw an interesting article by Mr. Benjamin Wittes. He writes for the Washington Post. He declares he is pro-choice, and he says, "Let go of Roe." And he goes into an analysis of it. He said, "I am not necessarily thinking Roe ought to legally be overturned, but if it does die, I won't attend its funeral, nor would I lift a finger to prevent a conservative President from nominating a Justice who might bury it once and for all." This was in Atlantic Monthly, January of this year. And he goes on to say, "Roe puts liberals in the position of defending a lousy opinion. It disenfranchised millions of conservatives on an issue about which they care deeply, while freeing those conservatives from any obligation to articulate a responsible policy that might command majority support." And he goes on, as have others, to say this: "The right to an abortion remains a highly debatable position, both jurisprudentially and morally." And he also noted that, "In the years since the decision, an enormous body of academic literature has tried to put the right to an abortion on firmer legal ground, but thousands of pages of scholarship notwithstanding, the right to abortion remains a constitutionally shaky proposition. Abortion policy is a question that the Constitution, even broadly construed, cannot convincingly be read to resolve."

So that is one opinion. I am just saying you will have to deal with this, and I just don't think that we ought to take the view that that matter is open and shut, and I hope that you--we will take you at your word that your mind is open and you will evaluate the matter fairly according to the high standards of justice that you can bring to bear to that issue, and any others like it that come up. Will you give us that commitment?

Judge Roberts. Absolutely, Senator. I would confront issues in this area as any other area, with an open mind, in light of the arguments, in light of the record, after careful consideration of the views of my colleagues on the bench. And I would confront these questions just as I would any others that come before the Court.

Senator Schumer. . . . On these first two, you have given answers that I think show that you want to protect those rights, and I just want to repeat them and just make sure that you are on the record for the. To Senator Biden, he asked, "Do you agree there is a right to privacy to be found in the Liberty Clause of the 14th Amendment?" And you responded, "I do, Senator. Liberty is not limited to freedom from physical restraint. It does cover areas, as you said, such as privacy, and it's not protected only in procedural terms, but it's protected substantively as well." That accurately states your view.

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Schumer. And on the Griswold case and the right to privacy there, you said in reference to Senator Kohl's question, "I agree with the Griswold Court's conclusion that marital privacy extends to contraception and availability of that. The Court since Griswold has grounded the privacy right discussed in that case in the liberty interest protected under the Due Process Clause." That is your accurate view.

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Schumer. Okay. Just one question. I know this could take the rest of our time, but if you could answer it succinctly, just tell me how--I am interested in how you will divine what that right to privacy means. I mean, this is going to be an issue in the 21st century that is before us in many, many different ways, and there are no words in the Constitution.

Judge Roberts. Well, the Court, for example, I think most recently in the Glucksberg case, talked about the necessity of considering our Nation's history, traditions, and practices. As Justice Harlan always explained in his opinions, you need to do that with an appropriate sensitivity to the limitations on the judicial role. Again, you need to recognize that it is not your job to make policy, either under the Constitution or under the statutes. You are interpreting the Constitution. And the appropriate judicial role focuses on those considerations, tradition and history and practice, as developed in the Court's precedents. And that's where I would start.

In any case where the issue came up as to whether or not a particular issue was presented under the Due Process Clause, you begin with the precedents. You analyze them under principles of stare decisis, the precedents in this area, just like precedents in any other area, and analyze them in light of those different factors.

All the Justices recognize that in this area they are--you need to be especially careful about the source of the content that you're giving to the right at issue, because it is an area in which the danger of judges going beyond their appropriately limited authority is presented because of the nature of the sources of authority. You're not construing the text narrowly. You're not looking at a particular statute with legislative history.

All of the Justices recognize that it presents particular challenges.

Senator Brownback. [observes at outset of questioning that abortion should be left to political system, not judicial system, then subsequently returns to topic of abortion:] I want to take you to the now probably most contentious social issues of our day, and you have been debating and discussing it a great deal here already, the issue of abortion. . . . [elaborating on contentiousness]

The very root of the issue is the legal status of the unborn child. This is an old debate, and whether that child is a person or is a piece of property, is the root of that debate. . . . I believe everyone agrees that the unborn child is alive, and most agree that biologically it is a life, it is a separate genetic entity. But many will dispute whether it is a person. These may be legal definitions, but that is the way people would define it.

Could you state your view as to whether the unborn child is a person or is a piece of property?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, because cases are going to come up in this area, and that could be the focus of legal argument in those cases, I don't think it would be appropriate for me to comment on that one way or another.

I will confront issues in this area as I would confront issues in any area that come before the Court, and that would be to fully and fairly consider the arguments presented and decide them according to the rule of law. And I don't think it would be appropriate for me to express views in an area that could come before the Court.

Senator Brownback. I would hope that you would agree with me that this is at the core of the issue, obviously the competition between the woman's right to choose and the legal status of the unborn, and it permeates so much of our debate, and that is why a lot of us believe it should be within the political system to discuss.

[discusses Plessy and Brown, observing that Roe is like Plessy and thus should not be given super stare decisis effect; holds up chart showing missed opportunities for overturning Plessy; discusses hearings he held on facts of Roe and Doe v. Bolton; tells anecdote about Jimmy, a Senate elevator operator w/ disability]

. . . 80 to 90 percent of the kids in this country like Jimmy never get here [b/c they are aborted]. . . . I would just ask you, Judge Roberts, to consider, and probably you can't answer here today, whether the individuals with disabilities have the same constitutional rights that you and I share while they are in the womb.

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I appreciate your thoughts on the subject very much. I do think, though, since those precise questions could come before the Court that that is in the area that I have to refrain from answering.

Senator Coburn. Let me go to another area. As I mentioned in my opening statement, I am a practicing physician, kind of an old-time GP. I have delivered 4,000 babies. I take care of people at the end of life, at the beginning of life. In all 50 States, death is recognized and defined as the irreversible cessation of the brain and heart activity. Do you have any reason to dispute that?

Judge Roberts. I don't know the medical terms or definitions, but no. I mean, if that's the law in the States--that's not to say that it has any particular legal significance in cases--

Senator Coburn. Right. I am not asking you about legal significance. Would you agree that the opposite of being dead is being alive?

Judge Roberts. Yes. Again--

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. I don't mean to be overly cautious in answering--

Senator Coburn. You know I am going somewhere.

[Laughter.]

Senator Coburn. One of the problems I have is coming up with just the common sense and logic that if brain waves and heartbeat signifies life, the absence of them signifies death, then the presence of them certainly signifies life. And to say otherwise logically is schizophrenic, and that is how I view a lot of the decisions that have come from the Supreme Court on the issue of abortion.

DOJ_NMG_0035917

I won't press you on this issue. I know you can't. But for the listeners of this hearing, if, in fact, life is the presence of a heartbeat and brain waves, it is important for everybody in the country to know that at 16 days post-conception, a heartbeat is present, and that at 41 days, right now, we can assure ourselves that brain activity and brain waves are present. And as the technology improves, we are going to see that come earlier and earlier.

I make that point because so many of the decisions of the Supreme Court have been made in a vacuum of the scientific knowledge of what life is, when personhood is, when it begins, when it doesn't, when it exists, when it doesn't, and it belies the scientific facts and medical facts that are out there today, and so that was for your information and my ability to put forth a philosophy that I believe would solve a lot of the controversy in this country.

Chairman Specter. . . . Let me refer you to a statement by Chief Justice Rehnquist in dissent in the Casey case, which surprises me. I ask you whether you agree with this. He said, "A woman's interest in having an abortion is a form of liberty protected by the Due Process Clause." Do you agree with that?

Judge Roberts. Well, that does get into an area where cases are coming up. The Chief in that position was referencing of course the holding in Roe v. Wade, and that was what the issue was in Casey. But I don't think I should opine on the correctness or incorrectness of particular views in areas that are likely to come before the Court.

Senator Biden. All right. Great. I would like to follow up on yesterday. I asked you if you agreed there was a right of privacy to be found in the Liberty Clause of the 14th Amendment and you said, and I quote, "I do, Senator. I think that the Court's expression, and I think if my reading of the press is correct, I think every Justice on the Court believes that to some extent or another." Is that correct?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Biden. Now, one of the things that has been amazing--you are one of the best witnesses that I think has come before this committee, and I have been here 30-some years--is that you have convinced the folks who share Senator Brownback's view that you are going to be just right for them, and you have convinced the folks that share Senator Kennedy's view that you are going to be just right for them. And I think I would like to plumb a little bit more closely this notion of how you view this right of privacy.

Now, if you take a look at Justice Scalia's comment about that right to privacy found in the 14th Amendment as it related to the Casey case, he said the issue is whether abortion is liberty protected by the Constitution of the United States. I am sure it is not because of two simple facts. The Constitution says absolutely nothing about it and the longstanding traditions, et cetera.

Then on that same case, the quote coming from--I have got to make sure I get the right Justice here--from O'Connor, Kennedy, and Souter dissent, they said the liberty of a woman is at stake in a sense unique to the human condition and so unique to the law. The mother who carries a child to full-term is subject to anxieties and physical constraints, the pain that only she must bear. Her suffering is too intimate and personal for the state to insist without more upon its own version of the woman's role. Two fundamentally different views of the right to privacy as it relates to that issue.

In Cruzan, the case relating to whether or not fully competent adults have the right to refuse unwanted medical treatment, Justice Scalia said in his opinion that, quote, "that the Federal court have no business in this field, that American law has always accorded the State the power to prevent, by force if necessary, suicide, including suicide by refusing appropriate measures necessary to preserve one's life."

Justice Kennedy in the same case, as you well--I know you know all this, but I just want to try to get a sense where you are. He said, liberty presumes an autonomy of self that includes freedom of thought, freedom of expression, belief. Let me rephrase that, restate it. Liberty presumes an autonomy of self that includes freedom of thought, belief, expression, and certain intimate conduct. The instant case involves liberty of a person both in its spatial and in its tangential dimensions. Obviously, fundamentally different.

And then the same goes when O'Connor says, "I agree that to protect a liberty interest in refusing unwanted medical treatment may be inferred from our prior decisions and that refusal of artificially delivered food or water is encompassed within the liberty interest."

So the point I am making is obvious, that there are very, very, very disparate views. Can you tell me what side you come down closer on?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, first of all--

Senator Biden. I am not asking you to comment on any case.

Judge Roberts. Well, I can say that it is my view that all of the Justices--I think if a case like the Glucksberg case in which a majority subscribe to the view, there is an appropriate mode of analysis to determine the content of the Liberty Clause and it does include protection beyond physical restraint and that that protection applies in a substantive manner.

Now, there are legal theorists, there are judges and jurists who do not agree with that, who do not agree that there is a right of privacy protected under the Due Process Clause, who do not agree that the liberty protected extends beyond freedom from physical restraint. Their view is that it means you cannot be basically imprisoned or arrested without due process and that means only that you get some type of procedural protection.

That is not my understanding of where the Justices on the Supreme Court are and it's not my understanding. I believe that the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause is not limited to freedom from physical restraint, that it includes certain other protections, including the right to privacy. As you know, the Court has tried to map out in a series of cases that go back to Meyer v. Nebraska and Pierce and all that and in various instances as the claims have arisen, and that it's protected not simply from procedural depravation. That is--

Senator Biden. If I may interrupt, that is not the question I asked you. Thank you for that lesson, and I understand what you are saying. I am asking you a specific question.

Judge Roberts. Well, and--

Senator Biden. Do you side more within that context with the views of Scalia and Thomas, which say that consenting adults do not have, if they are both male or female, do not have the right to engage in sexual conduct, the State can determine that--let me put it another way.

My family faced, I am sure many people in this audience's families faced a difficult decision of deciding when to no longer continue the application of artificial apparatus to keep your father or mother or husband or wife or son or daughter alive. It is a great moment to the American public. There is a view expressed by Justice Scalia that there is no right that is absolute on the part--or no fundamental right that exists for a family member, assuming the person is not capable of making the decision themselves, to make that judgment. He says, and I am speaking in layman's terms, he says the State legislature can make that decision.

I firmly believe, unless there is some evidence that the family is incompetent, the husband or the wife, with the advice of the doctor, should be able to make that decision. What do you think?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, that does get into an area that is coming before the Court. There is a case pending on the docket right now that raises the question of whether or not State legislatures have a prerogative to lay down rules on certain end-of-life issues--

Senator Biden. It is suicide, isn't it, Judge?

Judge Roberts. Well, in that case, it's the application of the Federal Controlled Substance law.

Senator Biden. Right.

Judge Roberts. The issue of illness in those cases do come before the Court. The Glucksberg case raised similar question. The Cruzan case that you mentioned, presented it in a very difficult context of an incompetent individual, no longer able to make a decision, and the question of how the State law should apply in that situation. Those cases do come before the Court.

Senator Biden. Do you think the State--just talk to me as a father. Do not talk to me--just tell me, just philosophically, what do you think? Do you think--not what the Constitution says. What do you feel? Do you feel personally, if you are willing to share with us, that the decision of whether or not to remove a feeding tube after a family member is no longer capable of making a judgment, they are comatose, to prolong that life should be one that the legislators in Dover, Delaware should make or my mother should make?

Judge Roberts. No, I'm not going to consider issues like that in the context as a father or a husband or anything else.

Senator Biden. Well, you did--

Judge Roberts. I think--

Senator Biden. Sorry.

Judge Roberts. I think, obviously, putting aside any of those considerations, these issues are the most difficult we face as people, and they are profoundly affected by views of individuality and moral views, and deeply personal views. That's obviously true as a general matter. But at the same time, the position of a judge is not to incorporate his or her personal views in deciding issues of this sort. If you're interpreting a particular statute that governs in this area, your job as a judge is to interpret and apply that according to the rule of law. If you're addressing claims of a fundamental right under the liberty, protected by the Due Process Clause, again, the view of a judge on a personal matter or a personal level is not the guide to the decision, and--

Senator Biden. Right. Well, Judge, let me ask you then, with your permission, about your constitutional view. Do you think the Constitution encompasses a fundamental right for my father to conclude that he does not want to continue, "he" does not want to continue on a life support system?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I can't answer that question in the abstract because--

Senator Biden. It is not abstract, that is real.

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, as a legal matter it is abstract because the question would be in any particular case, is there a law that applies that governs that decision? What does the law apply--

Senator Biden. That is the question, Judge.

Judge Roberts. Well, no.

Senator Biden. Can any law trump a fundamental right to die? Not to commit suicide, a right to decide "I no longer want to be hooked up to this machine, the only thing that's keeping me alive." "I no longer want to have this feeding tube in my stomach," a decision that I know I have personally made, and many people out here have made, and the idea that a State legislature could say to my mom, "Your father wants the feeding tube removed. He's asked me. The doctors heard it," and the State Legislature's decided that, no, it can't be removed. Are you telling me that is even in play?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, what I'm telling you is, as you know, there are cases that come up in exactly that context so that it is in play, and the sense is that there are cases involving disputes between people asserting their rights to terminate life, to remove feeding tubes either on their own behalf or on behalf of others. There is legislation that States have passed in this area that governs that, and there are claims that are raised that the legislation is unconstitutional. Those are issues that come before the Court, and as a result, I will confront those issues in light of the Court's precedents, with an open mind. I will not take to the Court whatever personal views I have on the issues, and I appreciate the sensitivity involved. They won't be based on my personal views. They'll be based on my understanding of the law.

Senator Biden. That is what I want to know about because without any knowledge of your understanding of the law, because you will not share it with us, we are rolling the dice with you, Judge. We are going to face decisions, you are, and the American public is going to face decisions about whether or not, as I said, patents can be issued for the creation of human life. You are going to be faced with decisions about whether or not there is a right to refuse extraordinary medical, heroic medical efforts that you do not want as an individual, and you are fully capable mentally of making that decision. The idea that without a specific fact pattern before you, as keeps getting repeated here, the law is about life, it is about facts. We are not asking you--there is no fact situation before you--about whether or not a person, fully mentally capable about making a decision, chooses to say, "I no longer want this feeding tube in my stomach. Please remove it." And whether or not that is a fundamental constitutional right.

Judge Roberts. Senator, that's asking me for a opinion in the abstract on a question that will come before the Court. And when that question does come before the Court, the litigants before me are entitled to have a Justice deciding their case with an open mind, based on the arguments presented, based on the precedents presented. I have told you with respect how I would go about deciding that case. It begins with the recognition that the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause does extend to matters of privacy, that it is not limited to restraints on physical freedom, and that that protection is protected--it extends in a substantive way, and not simply procedurally.

I have also explained the sources that judges look to in determining the content of that privacy protected by the Liberty Clause. They're the ones that have been spelled out in the Court's opinion, the Nation's history, traditions and practices.

And I have explained how judges apply that history, tradition and practices in light of the limited role of a judge to interpret the law and not make the law. The limited role of the judge in light of the prerogatives of the legislature.

Senator Biden. Judge, I understand that. Justice Scalia says the same thing, and draws a very fundamentally different conclusion, and O'Connor. So you have told me nothing, Judge. With all due respect, look, this is--it is kind of interesting, this kabuki dance we have in these hearings here, as if the public does not have a right to know what you think about fundamental issues facing them. There is no more possibility that any one of us here would be elected to the United States Senate without expressing broadly and sometimes specifically to our public what it is we believe. The idea that the Founders sat there and said, "Look, here's what we're going to do. We're going to require the two elected branches to answer questions of the public with no presumption they should have the job as Senator, President or Congressman, but guess what? We're going to have a third coequal branch of Government that gets to be there for life, never, ever, ever again to be able to be asked a question they don't want to answer. And you know what? He doesn't have to tell us anything. It's okay as long as he is"--as you are--"a decent, bright, honorable man. That's all we need to know. That's all we need to know."

Look, I only have 3 minutes and 45 seconds left, and by the way, I would ask permission for the record to introduce the number of questions asked by Senator Hatch and others, very specific questions as to Justice O'Connor with very specific answers on these very questions. I would like to ask for that to be submitted for the record.

Chairman Specter. Without objection, they will be made a part of the record.

Judge Roberts. Senator, could I--

Senator Biden. I still have the floor, and I will yield to you since you can speak after the clock is out and I cannot, okay? I am sure you understand that. And I am sure if I am ever before the Supreme Court, you will give me more time and you will not interrupt me.

[Laughter.]

Senator Biden. Look, here is the point I want to make. I asked--and I am sure you are not going to answer it--I asked Justice Ginsburg a question about footnote 5 in the Michael H. case, and the whole issue there is, as you well know, whether or not you keep talking--it sounds wonderful to the uneducated ear, the non-lawyer's ear--that I am going to look at history and tradition. You and I both know how you determine history and tradition determines outcomes.

In that case, as you will recall, there was a question of whether or not the natural father--you could prove by a blood test and DNA that he was the natural father--of a child he wanted to see, that happened to be born to a woman who was living with her married husband, so the child was illegitimate. And so in determining whether or not there are any visitation rights, there is a famous footnote there. I am going to do this quickly, I have 2 minutes and 7 seconds.

The Court said, Scalia said in footnote 6, "Look, you go back and look at the specific historical precedent, short--have bastards ever been protected in the law." And--then said, "No, no, no, that's not what you go back. You go back and look at fatherhood. Was fatherhood ever something that is part of the traditions and part of the embraced notions of what we hold dear? Is that worthy of protection?"

Now, Scalia said, No, no, no, no, no. I looked up the record. Bastards have never been protected in English common law; therefore, there is nothing going on here. And, by the way, you should never go back, he says, and look at the general proposition has fatherhood achieved a status of consequence. No, it is have bastards achieved.

So, Judge, how do you--I am not asking you about a case. How do you--do you look at the narrowest reading of whether or not such an asserted right has ever been protected, or do you look at it more broadly? What is the methodology you use?

Judge Roberts. I mean, I think you're quite right that that is quite often the critical question in these cases, the degree of generality at which you define what the tradition, the history, and the practice you're looking at. The example, I think, that I've always found it easiest to grasp was Loving v. Virginia. Do you look at the history of miscegenation statutes, or do you look at the history of marriage?

Senator Biden. Thirty-three seconds left. Do you agree with O'Connor then?

Judge Roberts. Well, I get extra time, you said.

Senator Biden. I know. But I don't. I got to get it in now.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. Judge Roberts, when his red light goes on, you will have as much time as you want.

Judge Roberts. Thank you. The point is that, again, the Court has precedents on precisely that question, about how you should phrase the level of generality. And you look at--

Senator Biden. But which precedent do you agree with? There are competing precedents.

Judge Roberts. Well, you do not look at the level of generality that is the issue that's being challenged. So, for example, in Loving v. Virginia, if the challenge is, it seems to me--and this is what the Court's precedents say. If the challenge is to miscegenation statutes, that's not the level of generality because you're going to answer it's completely circular.

Senator Biden. But that is specific, Judge. The generality was the right to marry. That is the generality.

Judge Roberts. Well, that's what I'm saying. The dispute is do you look at it at that level of specificity or broader. And I'm saying you do not look at the narrowest level of generality, which is the statute that's being challenged, because obviously that's completely circular. You are saying there is obviously that statute that's part of the history. So you look at it at a broader level of generality.

Now, the only point I was going to make earlier--because I do think it is an important one. You make the point that we stand for election and we wouldn't be elected if we didn't tell people what we stand for. Judges don't stand for election. I'm not standing for election, and it is contrary to the role of judges in our society to say that this judge should go on the bench because these are his or her positions and those are the positions they're going to apply.

Judges go on the bench and they apply and decide cases according to the judicial process, not on the basis of promises made earlier to get elected or promises made earlier to get confirmed. That's inconsistent with the independence and integrity of the Supreme Court.

Senator Biden. No one is asking for a promise.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Senator Biden.

Senator Biden. Thank you. Thank you, Judge.

Judge Roberts. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Judge, I subscribe to much of what Senator DeWine said. I want to tell you what I think perhaps a little differently and personally.

Senator Graham last night pointed out that Justice Scalia was confirmed by 98 votes of this body, and I thought then and I think now of how different the days were in 1986. There is so much water under the dam since then. The nation is divided. It is polarized. It is about 50-50. We are at war. Executive authority is very much on people's minds. The law as it relates to war, the Geneva Conventions, Conventions Against Torture, all of these things very much on everyone's minds. We have seen in the last ten years 193 five-to-four decisions of the Court, which suggests that on major questions, the Court is also very divided.

So in comes this young Justice. I was one on our side who voted for you for the D.C. Court. I did so because there were so many testimonials about what a fine lawyer you are, what a fine human being you are. And I voted for you, but there is more in this vote.

Senator DeWine just spoke about the man as opposed to the legal automaton. Yesterday morning, you spoke, I thought eloquently, in answering Senator Specter's questions on Roe. You discussed stare decisis as fully as I have ever heard it discussed. I am not a lawyer. I learned a lot from listening to you. You discussed the right to privacy. You were very full and forward speaking. And then after lunch, it was as if you shut down and became very cautious.

So my first question, did anybody caution you between the morning and the afternoon sessions?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator. No.

Senator Feinstein. Has anyone, when you were being interviewed for this position, ever asked your opinion on Roe?

Judge Roberts. No.

Senator Feinstein. Okay. That is good to know. From 1973 to 2005, 32 years, over three generations of women have come really to feel that finally they have some autonomy over their body. Women are all different. Many of them are very pro-life. Many are pro-choice. People have different religious views, moral views, so it is this big diverse cosmopolitan of women. But the growth has been enormous and the ability of women to succeed, I mean, I went into the workforce at the same time Sandra Day

DOJ_NMG_0035924

O'Connor did with a year's graduate work. The door was closed. It is now open and women are so lucky.

And it seems to me that the living Constitution is that each person in this great country, man or woman, rich or poor, white or black, whatever it might be, can really reach their full potential. And I guess what has begun to concern me a little bit is Judge Roberts, the legal automaton, as opposed to Judge Roberts, the man, because I have heard so many times, "I can't really say because it may come before me," and yet I don't expect you to say what you would do with Roe one way or another.

But I do expect to know a little bit more about how you feel and how you think as a man, because you are a very young man to be Chief Justice. You could be Chief Justice for 40 years. That is a very long time.

And because of the division, and there is also a lot of fear out there where this new Court, now with potentially two new Justices, is going to go, whether you have got the ability to bring that Court together, to end the five-to-four decisions, to see that big decisions are made so that they represent a much greater consensus. I am trying to find out and see, are those qualities really there?

I was interested in a colloquy you had with Senator Biden on the end of life. He used the word--he asked a number of legal questions and then says, okay, just talk to me as a father and tell me. Now, I have been through two end-of-life situations, one with my husband, one with my father, both suffering terrible cancers, a lot of pain, enormous debilitation.

Let me ask this question this way. If you were in that situation with someone you deeply love and you saw the suffering, who would you want to listen to, your doctor or the government telling you what to do? To me, it is that stark because I have been through it.

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, in that situation, obviously you want to talk and take into account the views and the heartfelt concerns of the loved one that you are trying to help in that situation because you know how they are viewing this. You know what they mean when they are saying things like what their wishes are and their concerns are. And, of course, consulting with their physician.

But it seems to me that in that situation, you do want to understand and make sure that you appreciate the views of the loved one, and only you can do it because--

Senator Feinstein. That wasn't my question.

Judge Roberts. I'm sorry.

Senator Feinstein. I'm trying to see your feelings as a man. I am not asking you for a legal view--

Judge Roberts. Well, I wasn't trying to give a legal view. My point was that, obviously, you look to the views of the person involved, and if it's a loved one, you are the one who is in a position to make sure that you understand their views and can help them communicate those--

Senator Feinstein. How would you feel if you were in that position?

Judge Roberts. An end-of-life situation? You know, I do think it's one of those things that it's hard to conceptualize until you're there. I really would be hesitant to say, this is what I would definitely want done or that is what I would definitely want done. You do need to confront that and appreciate all of the different concerns and impulses and considerations--

DOJ_NMG_0035925

Senator Feinstein. And every situation is different.

Judge Roberts. Yes. It's one of those things, I think it's difficult to put yourself in that position and say, well, with any degree of confidence, if I were suffering and confronting the end of life, this is what I would want to do, or that is what I would want to do. I just--you can theorize it and try to come up with your views or how you would--

Senator Feinstein. That is right. All I am saying is you wouldn't want the government telling you what to do.

Judge Roberts. Well, I'm happy to say that as a general matter--

Senator Feinstein. That there should be a basic right of privacy.

Judge Roberts. Well, that's getting into a legal question and you don't want--

Senator Feinstein. Okay. I won't go there. Let me go somewhere else.

Senator Feinstein. Now, yesterday, you said this. "I agree with the Griswold Court's conclusion that marital privacy extends to contraception and availability of that. The Court since Griswold has grounded the privacy right discussed in that case in the liberty interest protected under the Due Process Clause."

Do you think that right of privacy that you are talking about there extends to single people as well as married people?

Judge Roberts. The courts held that in the Eisenstadt case, which came shortly after Griswold, largely under principles of equal protection, and I don't have any quarrel with that conclusion in Eisenstadt.

Senator Feinstein. Okay. Do you think that that same right extends beyond family choices then about a child's education?

Judge Roberts. Well, that's where it actually got started 80 years ago, in the earliest cases. Meyer and Pierce involved questions about how to raise children, whether you could teach them a foreign language, whether you could send them to a private school. And those decisions are really what started that body of law.

Senator Feinstein. I have another question I could ask, but you won't answer it, unless--

Senator Leahy. Give it a try, Dianne. Go ahead.

[Laughter.]

Senator Feinstein. Does it cover the right of a woman to decide whether to continue her pregnancy?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, as I've explained, that is an area--

Senator Feinstein. To come before you and you--right. That message was well conveyed.

Senator Schumer. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and, Judge Roberts, it is nice to talk to you so early in the day.

Yesterday you stated that you "agree with the Griswold Court's conclusion that marital privacy extends to contraception and availability of that." And you noted that the Court's later decisions have based the constitutional right to privacy on the liberty component of the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment.

DOJ_NMG_0035926

Now, Justice Thomas at his confirmation hearing answered in a way very similar to the way you did. During his confirmation hearing, here is what he said: "I believe the approach that Justice Harlan took in Griswold in determining the"--"or assessing the right to privacy was an appropriate way to go."

Now, we all know that Justice Harlan's approach located the right to privacy in the liberty interest of the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment. And Justice Thomas also said at his confirmation hearings, along the same lines, that he agreed with the Court decision in Eisenstadt v. Baird where the Court held that single people have the same right to privacy as married people on the issue of procreation.

However, since he has been confirmed onto the Court, Justice Thomas has not applied the right to privacy to key protections. For instance, in Lawrence in 2003, he declared that there is no general right to privacy in the Constitution.

Now, yesterday you said that, "Liberty is not limited to freedom from physical restraint. It does cover areas," as you said, "such as privacy. It's not only protected in procedural terms, but protected substantively as well." You said that you agreed that, "There is a right to privacy to be found in the Liberty Clause of the 14th Amendment." So that seems directly to contradict Justice Thomas' view once he got on the Court, as I outlined, in Lawrence.

I assume that you disagree with Justice Thomas' view that there is no general right to privacy, as he stated in Lawrence.

Judge Roberts. Well, I think that question depends obviously on the modifier and what you mean by "general." I noted in going over the nomination hearings of Justice Breyer, he also said that the privacy interest is within the--is protected as part of the liberty--protected by the Due Process Clause. I think that is the general approach. Now the--

Senator Schumer. Let's talk about Justice Thomas. He said there is no general right of privacy. You seemed to say yesterday--you didn't seem to say. You said that there was a right to privacy. Let's forget that Justice Thomas said it. You would disagree that there is no general right to privacy in the Constitution.

Judge Roberts. Well, I wouldn't use the phrase "general" because I don't know what that means. I don't know if by saying "general" they are trying to describe the particular scope to the right to privacy or not. I think there is a right to privacy protected as part of the liberty guarantee in the Due Process Clause.

Senator Schumer. A substantive right to privacy.

Judge Roberts. Protected substantively, yes.

Senator Schumer. Is it your reading of Justice Thomas' case in Lawrence that he does not believe in that?

Judge Roberts. No. I think his statement obviously focuses on general, and his conclusion in that case was that the right to privacy protected under the Due Process Clause that you noted he acknowledged at his hearings did not extend to include the activity at issue in Lawrence.

Senator Schumer. Well, this is obviously very important because Justice Thomas seemed to be more full in his view of privacy at his confirmation hearing than later when he was on the Court, at least if you read his decisions. And you are not willing to say that your view is different than the view Justice Thomas stated in Lawrence.

DOJ_NMG_0035927

Judge Roberts. I'm not willing to state a particular view on the Lawrence decision, and that's consistent with the approach that I've taken.

Senator Schumer. Let me ask you a broader question. Do you disagree with Justice Thomas' interpretation of the right to privacy in any decided case?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I'm not going to comment on whether I think particular cases were correctly decided or not in areas--

Senator Schumer. I didn't ask that.

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't know which cases you're talking about.

Senator Schumer. Any. Any one you want.

Judge Roberts. Well, that would be commenting on whether that decision was correctly decided or not. If I'm agreeing or disagreeing with one of the Justices' views in that case, that would be commenting on whether that view was correct or not. If it was in a dissent, it would be disagreeing; if it was in the majority, it would be agreeing. And because those are in areas that could come before the Court, like every other nominee to come before this Committee who is on the Court today, I think it's inappropriate to comment on the correctness or incorrectness of those decisions in areas that could come before the Court.

Senator Schumer. So you are not--you do not have to answer this. It is obvious you will not state where you disagree with Justice Thomas, and it could well be that what he said at his hearing and you said at your hearing might lead to--might lead you to rule in the same way on privacy?

Judge Roberts. Well, again, my view on privacy is as I've expressed, that there is a right to privacy, protected as part of the liberty under the Due Process Clause.

Senator Schumer. Would you say there is a general right to privacy?

Judge Roberts. I don't know what "general" means.

Senator Schumer. Substantive right to privacy.

Judge Roberts. Well, substantive, yes, I have said that, that the protection extends to substantive protection. But when you say general, I don't know what that means. I don't know if that means--

Senator Schumer. Didn't Justice--excuse me. Didn't Justice Thomas disagree with the substantive right to privacy in Lawrence?

Judge Roberts. His conclusion was that the liberty protected by the Due Process Clause did not extend to that right, yes.

Senator Schumer. Thank you. So it would seem to me you disagree with him. I think you just said it without saying it.

Judge Roberts. No, Senator, you're asking me whether the right to privacy protected under the Liberty Clause extends to a particular right, the right at issue in Lawrence.

Senator Schumer. I think what I am asking you, is there a substantive right to privacy? I didn't apply it to a particular case.

Judge Roberts. I have said there is a substantive right to privacy.

Senator Schumer. And in Lawrence, Justice Thomas seemed to say there is no substantive right to privacy.

Judge Roberts. No. As I understand it--and, again, his testimony as a nominee was that there was. What he said is--the quote you read in Lawrence said there's no general right to privacy. Now, I don't know--

DOJ_NMG_0035928

Senator Schumer. But his holding was that there was no substantive right to privacy under the Liberty Clause, wasn't it? Wasn't that the whole thrust of his argument?

Judge Roberts. No, I think, Senator, that his conclusion in Lawrence was that whatever right there was, it did not extend to the activity that was at issue in Lawrence.

Senator Schumer. The bottom line is you are unwilling to differentiate yourself from Justice Thomas' view in Lawrence.

Judge Roberts. Well, it's consistent with the approach I've taken, that I don't think it's appropriate to protect--as necessary to protect the independence and integrity of the Court to comment on whether that decision was correctly decided or not. And that is consistent with the approach that every member of the Court has taken--

Senator Schumer. I just didn't ask you that. I asked you if you would--I asked you if you disagreed with his particular holding, and--but let me ask you a few other questions here, because I think you are cutting back a little on what you said yesterday, at least if you look at the whole picture here and your unwillingness to disagree with Justice Thomas.

[extensive exchange re when/why nominees answer particular questions]

Senator Durbin. . . . Let me ask you one other question. Senators Coburn and Brownback have, I think, sincerely and accurately expressed their views on the issue of abortion. I think they have been very articulate in saying so. Many would argue that it is one of the most divisive legal and political issues we faced in our generation. I would like to ask you this question. Why do you think this issue is so important to so many women in America, the whole question of Roe v. Wade, the question of reproductive freedom, and the question of freedom of choice? Why do you think it is so important?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think it's important, and again, to women on both sides of the issue and also, I think, to men as well, but obviously it's an issue that directly affects women. It's a fundamental question, as the Court has addressed in Roe and in Casey, that obviously affects the lives directly of millions of Americans, and the availability of rights under that decision affects women. But I know there are people of strongly held views on both sides of the issue. And I know that the responsibility of a judge confronting this issue is to decide the case according to the rule of law consistent with the precedents, not to take sides in a dispute as a matter of policy, but to decide it according to the law.

And to the extent that your questions earlier about, you know, causes we agree with, causes we don't agree with, I do want to emphasize that there is a unifying theme in my approach, both as a lawyer and as a judge. And that is the cause that I believe in passionately, the one to which I have devoted my professional career, is the vindication of the rule of law. And I tried to explain in my opening statement on Monday why that's important. Because without it, any other rights that you may agree with as a matter of policy are meaningless. You need to have courts that will enforce the rule of law if you're going to have rights that mean anything.

Senator Brownback. . . . I want to get you--in the limited time I have left--just two quick points. One is on the end-of-life issues. You have had a discussion with several members on end-of-life issues. This was discussed, for instances, Washington v. Glucksburg as the lead recent case, 1997 case, upheld a State statute banning assisted suicide.

Would you agree that that case held that there is not a constitutional right to die, a right to die does not exist in the Constitution?

Judge Roberts. I think that's an accurate conclusion of the holding in that case. Again, without expressing views on correctness or not, since that's where the line has been drawn in terms of what nominees can say, my understanding is that that court rejected the conclusion. It went through the analysis of what liberty interest protected by the Due Process Clause included, and it concluded that there wasn't a right under the Liberty Clause that trumped the regulation that was at issue in that case.

Senator Brownback. I believe even the standard that the Court held in this case was the rationally related standard, the lowest level of review, that the State can find a rational basis, they can limit these assisted suicide bans, efforts across the country.

Judge Roberts. Once the Court concluded that there wasn't a fundamental right that was in conflict with the State regulation, then the Court applied the rational relation test to uphold the State law.

Senator Brownback. And you have--that would be subject to, in your opinion, the continued status of stare decisis as an opinion of the Court, and the deference and the dependency that the society has had on that ruling, would have the same status as any opinion of the us Supreme Court on the basis of stare decisis in your opinion?

Judge Roberts. It would be subject to the same analysis as any other precedent of the Court, yes.

Senator Brownback. Regardless whether it is a recent opinion, later opinion, this has the same standing because it is an opinion of the Court's?

Judge Roberts. Some of the Court's cases talk about how long an opinion has been standing. Some of the Court's cases say that is less of a factor, but it is a decision of the Court, a precedent on that issue. Any question of revisiting it would have to be consistent with the principles of stare decisis, and we have talked about those principles and how they apply.

Senator Brownback. Yes. I wanted to make clear that it doesn't matter the length of time the opinion has set, the number of times it has been revisited, stare decisis is a basic principle that applies to any opinion previously held by the Court.

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Brownback. I would note this is an opinion put forward, as you get from a lot of us, that these are issues that are very difficult, and they are ones that are actually quite well suited for the legislative process to discuss because you have different views of life. Is life sacred, per se, or is it subject to some sort of objective review? It is a very difficult issue here in this body and across the country, and it is one that has a lot of emotion, and it is a very important issue for the society really itself to talk through, and through a lot of discussions we have.

DOJ_NMG_0035930

Second Amendment

Senator Feingold. Let us go to something else then. I would like to hear your views about the Sec ond Amendment, the right to bear arms. This is an amendment where there is a real shortage of jurisprudence. You mentioned the Third Amendment, where there is even less jurisprudence, but the Second Amendment is close. So I think you can maybe help us understand your approach to interpreting the Constitution by saying a bit about it.

The Second Amendment raises interesting questions about a constitutional interpretation. I read the Second Amendment as providing an individual right to keep and bear arms as opposed to only a collective right. Individual Americans have a constitutional right to own and use guns, and there are a number of actions that legislatures should not take in my view to restrict gun ownership. The modern Supreme Court has only heard one case interpreting the Second Amendment. That case is U.S. v. Miller. It was heard in 1939. The Court indicated that it saw the right to bear arms as a collective right. In a second case, in U.S. v. Emerson, the Court denied cert and let stand a lower court opinion that upheld a statute banning gun possession by individuals subject to a restraining order against a Second Amendment challenge. The Appeals Court viewed the right to bear arms as an individual right. The Supreme Court declined to review the Appeals Court decision.

So what is your view of the Second Amendment? Do you support one of the other of the views of what was intended by that amendment?

Judge Roberts. Well, I mean you're quite right that there is a dispute among the Circuit Courts. It's really a conflict among the Circuits. The Fifth Circuit--I think it was in the Emerson case if I'm remembering it correctly--agreed that--with what I understand to be your view, that this protects an individual right. But they went on to say that the right was not infringed in that case. They upheld the regulation there.

The Ninth Circuit has taken a different view. I don't remember the name of the case now, but a very recent case from the Ninth Circuit has taken the opposite view that it protects only a collective right, as they said. In other words, it's only the right of a militia to possess and not an individual right.

Particularly since you have this conflict, cert was denied in the Emerson case, I'm not sure it's been sought in the other one or will be, that's the sort of issue that's likely to come before the Supreme Court when you have conflicting views. I know the Miller case side-stepped that issue. An argument was made back in 1939 that this provides only a collective right, and the Court didn't address that. They said instead that the firearm at issue there--I think it was a sawed-off shotgun--is not the type of weapon protected under the militia aspect of the Second Amendment.

So people try to read into the tea leaves about Miller and what would come out on this issue, but that's still very much an open issue.

Senator Feingold. I understand that a case could come before you. I am wondering if you would anticipate that in such a case that a serious question would be, which interpretation is correct?

Judge Roberts. Anytime you have two different Courts of Appeals taking opposite positions, I think you have to regard that as a serious question. That's not expressing a view one way or the other. It's just saying, I know the Ninth Circuit thinks it's only a collective right; I know the Fifth Circuit thinks it's an individual right; and I know the job of the Supreme Court is to resolve Circuit conflicts, so I do think that issue is one that's likely to come before the Court.

Separation of Powers – Congress and the Executive (including executive authority relating to war on terror and torture)

Senator Leahy. . . . No one doubts you have had a very impressive legal career thus far, and now you have been nominated to be Chief Justice of the United States, but I have concerns as I go back over your career. We have had some discussions about this already, about some of the themes, and in your career some of the goals you sought to achieve using what is permittable skill.

My first area of concern involves a fundamental question of constitutional philosophy, the separation of powers. The last thing our Founding Fathers wanted was to be ruled by a king with absolute power, and the next to the last thing they wanted was to be ruled by a temporary king with absolute powers for four years. So we have got the political system we talked about a great deal yesterday of checks and balances. Each of the three branches of Government constrains the other when they overreach. Americans have relied on this for our fundamental guarantees of freedom and democracy and open Government. And all of us that serve, whether in the Executive Branch, the Judiciary as you do, the Legislative as we do, take an oath to uphold, a very solemn oath to uphold the Constitution.

But there have been times throughout our history where in the separation of powers has been strained to its limits by Presidents claiming power way beyond, what was actually almost imperial powers. So let us focus this now a little bit more on presidential power. Let us go to the President's power as Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces. Certainly he has that power under the Constitution.

I went back to a time when you were a lawyer in the Reagan White House. You objected to a bill that would give certain preference to veterans who had served in Lebanon between August 20th, 1982 and "the date the operation ends." The date would be as either set by presidential proclamation or a concurrent resolution of Congress. And you wrote that the difficulty with such a bill is that it recognizes a role for Congress in terminating the Lebanon operation. And you wrote further, "I do not think we would want to concede any definite role for Congress in terminating the Lebanon operation even by joint resolution presented to the President." And then you explained even parenthetically, that even if the President vetoed such a joint resolution, of course the Congress could override it by a two-thirds majority.

I find that troubling. I will tell you why. Before I read your memo I thought everybody agreed there would be only one answer to the question of whether Congress could stop a war. Your memo suggested Congress is powerless to stop a President who is going to conduct an unauthorized war. I really find that extremely hard to follow, and I imagine most Americans would. I will give you a hypothetical. Congress passes a law for all U.S. forces be withdrawn for the territory of a foreign nation by a said date. The President vetoes the law. The Congress overrides that, and sets into law, you must withdraw by a certain date. Now, is there any question in your mind that the President would be bound to faithfully execute that law?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I don't want to answer a particular hypothetical that could come before the Court, but I'm happy to comment on the memorandum that you're discussing.

DOJ_NMG_0035933

Senator Leahy. No, wait a minute. I mean is this not kind of hornbook law if the--I do not if there would be any cases coming before the Court. I mean this is kind of hornbook. The Congress says to the President, you have to get out, and passes a law which is either signed into law by the President or overridden--or you override a presidential veto. Why would the President not have to--charged as he is under the Constitution to faithfully execute the law, why would he not have to follow that law?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, that issue and similar issues have in fact come up. There were, for example, lawsuits concerning the legality of the war in Vietnam, various efforts, and certainly the arguments would be made on the other side about the President's authority, and that may well come before the Court.

Senator Leahy. Judge, with all due respect, the cases in Vietnam were not based on a specific law passed by Congress to get out. I mean Congress did cut off the funding.

Judge Roberts. Right.

Senator Leahy. In April 1975 by a one-vote margin I the Armed Services Committee. I know because I was the newest member of the Committee at that time, voted to not authorize the war any longer. Are you saying that Congress could not pass a law that we must withdraw forces?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator, I'm not. What I'm saying is that that issue or issues related to that could well come before the Court, and that's why I have to resist answering your particular hypothetical question.

The memo you refer to, I was working in the White House Counsel's Office then. The White House Counsel's office is charged to be vigilant to protect the Executive's authority. Just as you have lawyers here in the Senate and the House has lawyers who are experts and charged with being vigilant to protect the prerogatives of the Legislative Branch. I believe very strongly in the separation of powers. That was a very important principle that the Framers set forth that is very protective of our individual liberty. It makes sure the Legislative Branch legislates, the Executive executes, and the Judicial Branch decides the law.

And it makes--it was part of the Framers' vision that each of the branches would be to a certain extent jealous of what they regarded as their prerogatives, and to the extent there is a dispute between the Legislative Branch and the Executive Branch, it's the job, of course, of the Judicial Branch to resolve that dispute.

Senator Leahy. But your position in this memo, and President Reagan's office, seem to indicate that Congress does not have an ability to end hostilities.

Judge Roberts. With respect, Senator, you're vastly over-reading the memorandum. It concerned--

Senator Leahy. Tell me why.

Judge Roberts. Well, because it had noting to do with terminating hostilities. It had to do with the eligibility for certain pension benefits, and the question then was whether or not--who should be determining when the hostilities ceased or should cease--and there again, a lawyer for the Executive Branch, not a judge who would be considering the issue in an entirely different light, but a lawyer for the Executive Branch--a careful lawyer would say there may be a problem there. Are we conceding anything by saying the legislature gets to determine when the hostilities end?

Senator Leahy. I do not think it is over-reading it at all, as you suggest, to say when you write, "I do not think we would want to concede any definitive role for Congress in terminating the Lebanon operation even by joint resolution presented to the President."

DOJ_NMG_0035934

Judge Roberts. Well, with respect, Senator--

Senator Leahy. You are saying you do not want to concede any ability to the Congress to stop a war.

Judge Roberts. With respect, Senator, the memorandum is about legislation for--if I'm remembering it correctly, it was 20 some years ago--pension benefits or certain additional pay benefits. That's what it was about. And I suspect if you asked any lawyer for any President of any administration whether they wanted to concede that general principle, or if as careful lawyers they would prefer that that provision were rewritten or not in there, I'm fairly confident that regardless of the administration, that a lawyer for the Executive would take the same position.

Now, I am also fairly confident that one of your lawyers here in the Senate would take the opposite position.

Senator Leahy. Let me ask you this question. Does Congress have the power to declare war?

Judge Roberts. Of course. The Constitution specifically gives that power to Congress.

Senator Leahy. Does Congress then have the power to stop a war?

Judge Roberts. Congress certainly has the power of the purse, and that's the way, as you noted earlier, that Congress has typically exercised its--

Senator Leahy. Yes, but we did that in the Bowen amendment, and the Reagan administration, as we found out in the sorry chapter of Iran-Contra, went around that, violated the law, worked with Iran, sold arms illegally to Iran--I think that is part of the axis of evil today--and to continue the war, the Contra War in Central America. So the power of the purse, we have cut off money, the wars sometimes keep going. Do we have the power to terminate war? We have the power to declare war. Do we have the power to terminate war?

Judge Roberts. Senator, that's a question that I don't think can be answered in the abstract. You need to know the particular circumstances and exactly what the facts are and what the legislation would be like, because the argument on the other side--and as a judge, I would obviously be in a position of considering both arguments, the argument for the Legislature and the argument for the Executive. The argument on the Executive side will rely on authority as Commander-in-Chief, and whatever authorities derive from that. So it's not something that can be answered in the abstract.

Senator Leahy. As you said, your answer is that you were just talking about the question of veterans' benefits and all after this. I would note that the memo you wrote was not entitled "Veterans Benefits," it was entitled, "War Powers Problem." I do not think I overstated.

Let me ask you another question. We spoke about this again this morning, and I had told you when we met--in fact, I gave you a copy of the Bybee memo so that this would not be a surprise to you. The Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel issued a secret opinion in August 2002, which argued the President enjoys "complete authority over the conduct of war," and "the Congress lacks authority to set the terms and conditions under which a President may exercise his authority as Commander-in-Chief to control the conduct of operations during war." And then took the argument to the extreme when it concluded, the President, when acting as Commander-in-chief, was not bound, was not bound by the Federal law banning the use of torture. In other words, the President would be above the law in that regard. You did not write that memo, I hasten to add, but you have seen.

I asked Attorney General Gonzales for his view of this memo, in particular this sweeping assertion of executive power which puts a President above the law. He never gave an answer on that, and that is one of the reasons why many had voted against his confirmation.

So now let me ask you this: do you believe that the President has a Commander-in-Chief override to authorize or excuse the use of torture in interrogation of enemy prisoners even though there may be domestic and international laws prohibiting the specific practice?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I believe that no one is above the law under our system, and that includes the President. The President is fully bound by the law, the Constitution and statutes. Now, there often arise issues where there's a conflict between the Legislature and the Executive over an exercise of Executive authority, asserted Executive authority. The framework for analyzing that is in the Youngstown Sheet and Tube Case, the famous case coming out of President Truman's seizure of the steel mills.

Senator Leahy. And the Supreme Court held that unconstitutional.

Judge Roberts. Exactly. And the framework that was set forth in Justice Jackson's concurring opinion, which is the opinion that has sort of set the stage for subsequent cases, analyzes the issues in terms of one of three categories: if the President is acting in an area where Congress is supportive, expressly supportive of his action, the President's powers at its maximum; if the President is acting in an area such as you postulate under the Bybee memo, where the President is acting contrary to congressional authority; what Justice Jackson said is the President's authority is at its lowest ebb, it consists solely of his authority under the Constitution, less whatever authority Congress has; and then, of course, there's the vast middle area where courts often have to struggle because they can't determine whether Congress has supported a particular exercise or not. The Dames & Moore case, for example, is a good example of that.

Senator Leahy. Would you consider--go ahead.

Judge Roberts. I was just going to say the first issue for a Court confronting the question you posed would be whether Congress specifically intended to address the question of the President's exercise of authority or not.

Senator Leahy. Yes. I would think that if you pass a law saying nobody in our Government shall torture, I think that is pretty specific.

But let me ask you this: is Youngstown settled law? Would you consider Youngstown settled law?

Judge Roberts. I think the approach in the case is one that has guided the Court in this area since 1954 or '52, whatever it was.

Senator Leahy. The reason I ask that, when Mr. Bybee wrote this memo, he never cited Youngstown, and I think it was Harold Koh, the Dean at the Yale Law School, who said this was a stunning omission. I tend to agree with that. The President instead went ahead and appointed--nominated Mr. Bybee to a Federal judgeship.

Judge Roberts. Youngstown is a very important case in a number of respects, not least the fact that the opinion that everyone looks to, the Jackson opinion, was by Justice

DOJ_NMG_0035936

Jackson, who was of course FDR's Attorney General, and certainly a proponent of expansive Executive powers.

Senator Leahy. You have also said he is one of the Justices you admire the most.

Judge Roberts. He is for a number of reasons. What's significant about that aspect of his career, is here is someone whose job it was to promote and defend an expansive view of Executive power as Attorney General, which he did very effectively, and then when he went on the Court, as you can tell from his decision in Youngstown, he took an entirely different view of a lot of issues, in one famous case even disagreeing with one of his own prior opinions, and wrote a long opinion about how he can't believe he once held those views.

I think it's very important that--

Senator Leahy. Are you sending us a message?

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. Well, I'm just saying one reason people admire Justice Jackson so much is that although he had strong views as Attorney General, he recognized, when he became a member of the Supreme Court, that his job had changed, and he was not the President's lawyer, he was not the chief lawyer in the Executive Branch, he was a Justice sitting in review of some of the decisions of the Executive. And he took a different perspective. And that's, again, one reason many admire him, including myself.

Senator Leahy. The reason I ask, I thought the memo was outrageous, and once it became public--not until it became public, but after it became public, the President disavowed it and said he is opposed to torture, and I commend him for that. Many wish there had been--the administration had taken that position prior to the press finding out about it. But from the Jackson opinion--and I just pulled it out here--he says: the President has no monopoly of war powers, whatever they are, or Congress cannot deprive the President of the command of the Army and Navy. Only Congress can provide him with an Army and Navy to command. Congress is also empowered to make rules for the Government in regulation of land and naval forces, by which it may to some unknown extent impinge upon even command functions.

Do you agree that Congress can make rules that may impinge upon the President's command functions?

Judge Roberts. Certainly, Senator. The point that Justice Jackson is making there is that the Constitution vests pertinent authority in these area in both branches. The President is the Commander-in-Chief, and that meant something to the Founders. On the other hand, as you just quoted, Congress has the authority to issue regulations governing the armed forces, another express provision in the Constitution. Those two can conflict if by making regulations for the armed forces, Congress does something that interferes with, in the President's view, his command authority, and in some cases those disputes will be resolved in Court, as they were in the Youngstown case.

Senator Durbin. Thank you. The next topic I would like to talk about for a moment is executive power, which has been addressed earlier. It has been a major--has not been a major focus in previous hearings, but obviously is now that we are at war. You have been asked a lot of questions about it because I think there is so much at stake.

We will probably be involved in this war effort, as Senator Leahy said early this morning, for some time.

Throughout American history, even some of our greatest Presidents, including one from Illinois named Lincoln, tried to restrict liberty in an effort to provide more safety and security in our nation. This administration is no exception. It claimed the right to seize an American citizen in the United States and hold him indefinitely without charging him with a crime. They have claimed that the courts have no right to intervene. I think that threatens all of our freedoms.

Just last week, Judge Luttig authored an opinion upholding the administration's position, and if you are confirmed, you may have the final word on this question. You and others have compared the role of a judge to an umpire, and I promised I wouldn't get into the baseball analogy, so that is one thing I will spare you from.

But let me ask you this. When it comes to this use of executive power, you have referred time and again to Justice Jackson in the Youngstown case. Here is what he said. "A judge, like an executive advisor, may be surprised at the poverty of really useful and unambiguous authority applicable to concrete problems of executive powers as they actually present themselves."

So if you are confirmed, you will play a significant role in determining what limits, if any, the Constitution places on a President during times of war. That is why the American people have the right to know what you think about executive power.

There was an exchange earlier today between you and Senator Kyl about a statement I made yesterday about whether, as a Justice, you will expand freedom in America, and Justice Kyl seemed--pardon me, Senator Kyl--I don't know something secret about that--but Senator Kyl seemed to suggest it was a zero-sum approach, that you couldn't enlarge the freedom of one person or group in America without taking away the freedom of another group.

It is a curious point of view. It is the same point of view that Robert Bork had that he tried to defend unsuccessfully before this committee many years ago.

But my point to you is this. I would like to ask you a question. What is it in your background or experience that can convince the members of this committee and the American people following this that you are willing to stand up to this President if he oversteps his authority in this time of war, even if it is an unpopular thing to do?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I would just say that my demonstrated commitment to the rule of law, you can see that, I think, in my opinions over the past two years, you can see it in how I approach my job as a lawyer, arguing, and what types of arguments I make and how I make those arguments and how faithful they are to the precedents, and you can see it in my history of public service.

The idea that the rule of law--that's the only client I have as a judge. The Constitution is the only interest I have as a judge. The notion that I would compromise my commitment to that principle that has been the lodestar of my professional life since I became a lawyer because of views toward a particular administration is one that I reject entirely. That would be inconsistent with the judicial oath, and Justice Jackson is a perfect example of that. He is someone who was a strong advocate for executive power when he was FDR's Attorney General, one of the strongest, and yet he could issue a decision like the Youngstown decision not only concluding that President Truman lacked the authority, even in times of war, to seize the steelmills, but also setting forth the framework with the language of the sort that you just quoted, setting forth the framework about how to analyze these decisions in a way that is particularly sensitive to the role of Congress, as well. That is the key feature of his framework, the examination of where Congress is on the spectrum in determining whether the executive has that authority.

Senator Durbin. I hate to keep referring back to these ancient memos, but it said that if a hammer is the only tool you have, every problem looks like a nail. And in this case, this is the only tool we have to try to find out what is going on in your mind and in your heart. And so in a memo of 1983 to White House Counsel Fred Fielding, you wrote, "The independent prerogative of the Chief Executive to determine that a given law is unconstitutional." You talked about the power of the Executive to determine that a law is unconstitutional.

We are going through this debate that Senator Leahy alluded to earlier relative to this torture memo and the idea that the administration would walk away from commitments that have been made under Geneva Conventions and under the Convention on Torture, and would instead establish a new standard. So my question to you is this: Would the anti-torture statute be unconstitutional simply because it conflicts with an order issued by the President as commander-in-chief?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator, not simply because of the conflict, and I have to say I don't know--that's one of the 80,000 memos I don't know about, so I'd have to understand what the point was, what the issue was, and the language you read in context before I could respond to that.

But, no, the President has an obligation. He takes an oath, as we all do, to uphold the Constitution and to make a determination, and his determination that certain things are either constitutional or unconstitutional can, of course, in an appropriate case be tested in court. And the ultimate arbiter of that under our system is the Federal judiciary.

Senator Durbin. Justice Jackson thought the bottom line on Executive power was clear in Youngstown. He said, "No penance would ever expiate the sin against a free government of holding that a President can escape control of Executive powers by law through assuming his military role." I assume you agree with that statement by Justice Jackson.

Judge Roberts. Yes, I do. It simply reflects the basic principle that no man is above the law, not the President and not the Congress. And that's why courts have the obligation and have had since Marbury v. Madison to say what the law is. And if that means that Congress has acted unconstitutionally, they strike down the law. And if it means that the Executive has acted unconstitutionally, they have the obligation to block the Executive action.

Senator Durbin. We can imagine a hypothetical statute that would clearly intrude on a President's power as commander-in-chief ordering the movement of troops and that sort of thing. On the other hand, the anti-torture statute is clearly within the area, I believe, where Congress can legislate. As you noted this morning, Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution enumerates Congress' powers. Speaking clearly, it says Congress shall have the power "To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces."

I think we have exhausted this topic, and I think we are in common feeling and agreement about it. I hope we are at least close.

Senator Leahy. . . . You suggested I may have over-read your memo following Grenada. You said it was really talking about veterans' rights, but actually your memo, what struck me, it does not say veterans' rights, it says "War Powers" on it. The Constitution vests the power of declaring war in Congress, not the President. I still have a hard time squaring that with your inherent authority argument you advanced in that Grenada memo. Maybe I could ask it that way. Do you continue to believe that the President has inherent authority to invade a sovereign nation absent attack by a foreign power?

Judge Roberts. Senator, that is a very abstract hypothetical. There are situations that arise when an Executive may determine that that type of action is necessary. That may be challenged. I don't think abstract questions like that should be answered. There have been situations in our past where that authority has been claimed, both abstractly and concretely. Certainly Congress has the power to declare war, but as you know, of course, there have been several incidents in our history, the Korean War, the Vietnam War, others where there has been authorization of the use of force, but not a declaration of war.

You know the history, when Madison's original proposal gave Congress the authority to make war, and he thought that should be changed so that the Executive would have the authority to respond to an invasion, and I appreciate that part of your question.

Senator Leahy. You also have George Washington, if you are going to quote people back at that time. George Washington spoke of no offensive expedition of importance can be undertaken until after Congress shall have deliberated the subject and authorized such a measure. So I will go to the flip side, can Congress stop a war?

Judge Roberts. Well, that's of course a difficult question. Now, Congress has always exercised the power of the purse with respect to activities of that sort, and regulated the funding for that type of activity, and that has of course always been the core of Congress's authority. But the question to actually terminate hostilities that the Executive has determined to initiate, either with the authorization of Congress on in the situation of congressional silence or acquiescence, to go back to the Youngstown decision. The issue of what Congress's authorities are to terminate short of exercising its power with respect to the purse, those are unsettled and I think have to be addressed in the context of a particular case.

The memo to which you refer, again, I was a lawyer for the Executive, and any cautious lawyer for the Executive, without regard to the administration, would be alert for any type of suggestion that there are limits on that power, just as--

Senator Leahy. Showing how cautious you were, you wrote, "There's no clear line separating what the President may do on his own and what requires a formal declaration of war," but you conclude the exercise of presidential power in connection with the Grenada incident fell comfortably on the legitimate side of the line. What is a situation that falls on the illegitimate side of the line where a declaration of war would be needed?

Judge Roberts. Well, you know, you take the history anyway, if you have a situation like the Korean War taking place without a declaration of war, the war in Vietnam taking place without a declaration of war, I think it's difficult to articulate in the abstract where the line would be other than the fact that throughout our history there have been those significant types of engagements that I suspect all of the people involved in them thought were a war that did have a congressional declaration of war. So again, where the line is drawn or how it would be drawn in a particular case, or even what the role of the courts would be. As you know in these areas there's often an initial dispute, is this a judiciable question that the Court should entertain in the case of litigation and a conflict between the Executive and the Legislative concerning something like whether a declaration of war was required. That would be a question the Court would have to address before reaching the merits.

Senator Feinstein. . . . A number of people on our side are very concerned about Executive power and what we perceive, either rightly or wrongly, to be greatly expanded Executive authority in recent years, causing enormous concern in a number of different ways.

Let me go back into your past. In trying to get Senate documents, one of the documents withheld was a draft memo titled, "Establishment of NHAQ," the Nicaraguan Humanitarian Assistance Office. This office was used by President Reagan to give aid to the Nicaraguan contras following the passage of the Boland amendment, and that was a prohibition on providing funding to the contras.

What involvement did you have with the Nicaraguan Humanitarian Assistance Office?

Judge Roberts. Senator, I'm not familiar with the memorandum. If it was withheld, it was probably withheld fr om me as well, and I don't recall any involvement. So, you know, I don't recall any--

Senator Feinstein. Okay. Fair enough.

Judge Roberts. I do know that there was an issue--an issue was raised. I have seen memoranda that I know have been released about private fundraising activities, and I do know that I gave advice in order to make sure that they didn't engage in lobbying activities in order to be consistent with the Boland amendment. I've seen those, but beyond that, I'm not recalling anything.

Senator Feinstein. Do you believe that the administration's provision of funds to the contras exceeded the Executive's power in light of the Boland amendment's prohibition on funding the contras?

Judge Roberts. You know, it's not something I've--I just sort of know what I've read in the papers about it. And, you know, it seemed to me that it did. But, again, that's just based on--it's not based on a study or a legal analysis, just sort of--I think a lot of it--

Senator Feinstein. Well, it's a pretty simple question. I mean, when the Congress passes a law that says don't fund and the Executive finds a covert way to fund, and as you know, one of the great redeeming qualities of President Reagan was that he did an admission of wrongdoing, and I think the American people accepted that. He was able to admit a mistake, which I tend to think, you know, is hard to do in this arena. But in a way, it is a sign of a big person to be able to come forward and say, "I was wrong." So on its face, what you are saying, if I understand you, you do believe that the provision of funds exceeded the Executive power in this instance.

DOJ_NMG_0035941

Judge Roberts. Well, again, I haven't done a legal study, but based on what I know, which is just what every citizens knows from reading--I think it all took place after I was no longer in the Government, or at least came to light after that. It seemed to be inconsistent with the law.

Senator Feinstein. Let me ask you a general question then. If an Executive exercises power in direct violation of an act of Congress, is such an act unconstitutional?

Judge Roberts. Well, the answer depends, Senator, and this is where you get back to the Youngstown analysis, where Justice Jackson said there are three categories: you can act with Congress' support, being unclear what Congress' position is--and he recognized a third category where you can act--the Executive may act in the face of a congressional prohibition. And there are certain areas where the Executive does have authority to the exclusion of Congress. You know, without stating a legal view, for example, one that law professors regularly talk about is the pardon power. In other words, that's given expressly to the President in the Constitution. And restrictions, if Congress were to pass a restriction on the pardon power, does the President nonetheless have the authority to act under the Constitution? That's a difficult question. But it may be that the President's authority would trump Congress' authority.

So I can't answer a question in the abstract without knowing exactly what the record is and what the situation is. What Justice Jackson said in Youngstown, though, is obviously true, that if the President is acting in the face of congressional opposition, his power is at its lowest ebb. As Jackson put it, it includes his powers less whatever powers Congress has. So if it's in an area in which Congress has legitimate authority to act, that would restrict the Executive's authority.

Senator Feinstein. Which this case was. All right.

DOJ_NMG_0035942

Separation of Powers – The Executive and the Judiciary (including judicial review during wartime)

Senator Leahy. In his book All the Laws But One, Chief Justice Rehnquist, the late Chief Justice, concluded with this sentence, "The laws will not be silent in time of war, but they'll speak with a somewhat different voice." He offers as a somewhat different voice, of course, the Supreme Court decision, an infamous decision, a horrible decision in my estimation, Korematsu. As we know, in that case the Court upheld the internment of Japanese Americans in detention camps, not because of anything they had done, not because of any evidence that they were at all disloyal to the United States, but solely based on their race. Sometimes this country has legislated very, very cruelly and very wrongly, solely on the question of race.

Now, the Korematsu majority's failure to uphold the Bill of Rights I believe is one of the greatest failures in the Court's history. We cannot, I believe have a Supreme Court that would continue the failings of Korematsu, especially when we are engaged in a war on terror that could last throughout our lifetime, probably will. This country, all the western world, all democracies will face terrorist attacks, whether internal as we had in Oklahoma City, or external, 9/11. I just want to make sure you are not going to be a Korematsu Justice, so I have a couple questions.

Can I assume that you would hold the internment of all residents of this country who are interned just because they have a particular nationality or ethnic or religious group, you would hold that to be unconstitutional?

Judge Roberts. The internment of a group solely on the basis of their--

Senator Leahy. Nationality or ethnic or religious group.

Judge Roberts. I suppose a case like that could come before the Court. I would be surprised to see it, and I would be surprised if there were any arguments that could support it.

Senator Leahy. Let me ask you this. Do you feel that you would be able to interpret the Bill of Rights the same, whether we are at war time or not?

Judge Roberts. I do, Senator. I read the Chief's book that you quoted from, and for someone who sits on the court that I sit on now, we famously look back to one of the first cases decided in the D.C. Circuit. It was the Aaron Burr trial, and it's, if anything, a motto--

Senator Leahy. I thought you might--

Judge Roberts. Well, it's sort of the motto of our court, an opinion that was written out of that, in which the judge explained that it was our obligation to calmly poise the scales of Justice in dangerous times as well as calm times. That's a paraphrase, but the phrase, calmly poise the scales of Justice if, if anything, the motto of the court on which I now sit. That would be the guiding principle for me whether I am back on that court or a different one, because some factors may be different, the issues may be different, the demands may be different, but the Bill of Rights remains the same. And the obligation of a court to protect those basis liberties in times of peace and in times of war, in times of stress and in times of calm, that doesn't change.

DOJ_NMG_0035943

Senator Feingold. But at what point did you start thinking about the implications of this in terms of civil liberties and the challenges--

Judge Roberts. Well, it was when I went back to the office and saw the smoke rising from the Pentagon. As you can imagine, that was a chilling sight. The basic issue of how you address the question of civil liberties in wartime, in times of crisis, is a critically important one.

The Bill of Rights doesn't change during times of war. The Bill of Rights doesn't change in times of crisis. There may be situations where demands are different and they have to be analyzed appropriately so that things that might have been acceptable in times of war are not acceptable in times of peace. I think everyone appreciates that. But the Bill of Rights is not suspended and the obligation of the courts to uphold the rule of law is not suspended.

Senator Feingold. Did you recognize at that moment that this might become a time when it would be harder to protect civil liberties?

Judge Roberts. I think--I don't recall recognizing that in particular, but that is, of course, always the challenge in times of war and in times of stress, whatever the cause. I think it is the obligation of the courts to remember, just as really the model of the D.C. Circuit, from our earliest case, when the treason trial of Aaron Burr, to calmly poise the scales of justice. The emphasis is on calmly. It requires a certain dispassion, a certain separation from the passions of the moment.

Senator Feingold. That is absolutely right and that is why I want to follow on what Senator Leahy asked about earlier, a different time, a different challenge. As a nation, we can now look back at wartime Supreme Court decisions like Korematsu v. United States with something like bewilderment. We talked about it earlier. To me, it seems inconceivable that the United States government would have decided to put huge numbers of citizens in detention centers based on their race and that the Supreme Court would have deferred to the President's decision to do so.

Do you believe that Korematsu was wrongly decided?

Judge Roberts. It's one of those cases that I don't think it's technically been overruled yet, but I think it's widely recognized as not having precedential value. I do think the result in that case--Korematsu was actually the--considered the exclusion and not the actual detention, but the exclusion of individuals based on their ethnic/racial background from vast areas. It's hard for me to comprehend the argument that that would be acceptable these days.

Senator Feingold. It is often included, if you list decisions that are sort of considered some of the worst decisions in the history of the Supreme Court--

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Feingold. --with Plessy v. Ferguson and Dred Scott and others. Is that a fair characterization of your view--

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Feingold. --of Korematsu?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Feingold. Are there any elements of the government's response to September 11 that you think 50 or 60 years from now we as a nation will look back on with regret?

DOJ_NMG_0035944

Judge Roberts. Well, I'm sure there are some, Senator, and when you have the benefit of 50 or 60 years to look back as opposed to the particular demands of the moment and the perceived demands, I'm sure it's a different perspective. I'd hesitate to mention any in particular because so many of these issues are coming before not only the Supreme Court, but the court on which I now sit, and I will have to confront those cases, I think, regardless of what happens here. So I'd hesitate to identify particular areas of concern.

Senator Feingold. I understand your caution. I don't think we need to wait 50 or 60 years for some. For example, do you have any concerns about the practice of extraordinary rendition, of our government secretly sending people to countries that we know use torture?

Judge Roberts. Again, Senator, that is something that could come before the Court in one form or another and I think I have to refrain from commenting on it.

Senator Feingold. How about the Federal Government using immigration laws to round up and detain people for months, often without regard for whether they had any connection to the September 11 investigation, which actually in this case the Justice Department Inspector General later heavily criticized? Does that trouble you?

Judge Roberts. Well, yes, certainly, at a basic level of appreciating that this is a reaction in a particular way that raises serious questions. I'm very hesitant, though, again, to express a view on legality because those issues could come before the Court. They are coming before the Court, and they're coming not only before the Supreme Court, but the court on which I now sit.

Senator Feingold. Let's go to one that has already come before the Court, the Hamdi case. It is one of the most significant recent decisions restraining Executive Branch power. In that case, eight members of the Court found that the government had gone too far in claiming the right to detain and hold a U.S. citizen incommunicado within the United States without access to a lawyer and without charging with a crime. The case actually resulted in four different opinions with four different views on the President's power to detain a U.S. citizen indefinitely and without trial, ranging from Justices Souter and Ginsburg, who found that the President does not have any authority to detain citizens as enemy combatants because such detentions had not been Congressionally authorized, to Justice Thomas, who would defer entirely to the Executive Branch.

Which of the four opinions, in a case that has already been decided in Hamdi, would you say best approximates your views on the executive power to designate enemy combatants, the prevailing opinion, the Souter-Ginsburg opinion, the Scalia-Stevens dissent, or the Thomas dissent?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, that does get into the area of asking me to comment on which opinions I think are correct that I don't feel it's appropriate for me to go. I do know that the approach in this area is the approach set forth by Justice Jackson in his concurring opinion in the Youngstown case. That has set the framework for consideration of questions of executive power in times of war and with respect to foreign affairs since it was decided.

And as you know, the issue in those cases and in many of the cases in the Supreme Court is whether Congress has endorsed the executive action, in which case the President has his powers and the powers of Congress; whether Congress has prohibited the executive action, in which case all he has is whatever residual authority he has less the power of Congress; or what often happens, that vast middle area where it's impossible to tell or there's argument about whether Congress has approved the action or not.

The Dames and Moore case that was decided in 1981 is an example of that, when to resolve the Iranian hostage crisis the President abrogated claims and relegated those with claims to the Iranian Claims Tribunal. The issue there, the Court looked back at a variety of Congressional enactments going way back to the Civil War to try to determine if this type of exercise of authority is something Congress endorsed or opposed.

Senator Feingold. But with regard to these opinions, and I understand you are hesitant to comment on a particular opinion or the nature of the reasoning, but which of the approaches in terms of the actual finding of the opinion, do you find closest to your view?

Judge Roberts. Well, again, I don't remember which of those opinions follows the Youngstown analysis the most closely. My understanding of the appropriate approach in this area is that it is the Youngstown analysis, the one set forth in Justice Jackson's concurring opinion, and I think that is the most appropriate way to flesh out the issues. You do need to understand, because this is an area in which judges need to understand, there is often conflict between the branches and you do need to at least set the table correctly to understand, is the President acting with Congressional support, against it, or do we have to try to determine which of those areas it is? And I think you do need to lay that analysis out before deciding the case.

Senator Feingold. Last month when I was home in Wisconsin, a constituent came up and said to me that he believed the D.C. Circuit decision in the Hamdan case, a different case, which you joined in, to uphold the government's ability to try a Guantanamo Bay detainee by military commission, should disqualify you from being on the Supreme Court. This is apart from the issue that Senator Schumer and I wrote you about, which I will turn to later.

I want to know, with regard to the substance of the decision, why do you think someone would think that your decision in that case--why would somebody come up to me and say that your decision in that case should disqualify you from consideration as a Supreme Court Justice?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, you've touched upon an area in which I cannot comment under the--that case is still pending. It's pending before the Supreme Court. Under the Judicial Canons of Ethics, Canon 3-A(6), I'm not supposed to comment publicly in any way about a case that's still pending.

Senator Feingold. I'm not asking you to comment on the case. I am asking you why you think somebody who I represent would care enough about this issue that they would say this should be a disqualifier--in other words, characterize what is the issue in the case that would make somebody that concerned that they would make such a statement?

Judge Roberts. Well, the issue involves the same sort of issues that you began the discussion with, the question of civil liberties in wartime, and certainly I understand people having strong views on that particular question. But whether the decision on the merits was correctly resolved or not, or anything about it, I'm just absolutely prohibited from talking about it by those judicial canons. There's even an advisory opinion that explains that that canon applies to a Senate confirmation hearing. So my ethical obligation not to comment publicly on a case that's still pending prevents me from saying anything more.

Senator Feingold. Of course, I respect your judgment on these matters, but I believe that it's important that the nominee indicate a sense of why people in this country might have some anxiety at this point.

Judge Roberts. Well, certainly--

Senator Feingold. The difficult events that have occurred since September 11th and how it creates a climate sometimes of fear, in particular, fear of Government power, that I think it is important not only for Members of Congress but even members of the Supreme Court to help minimize, and I am just trying to get a sense if you feel that concern in the Nation.

Judge Roberts. Well, I certainly don't minimize the significance of a decision by a court of appeals or by the Supreme Court about the scope of executive authority in this area, about its impact on individual liberties, about the issues of separation of powers and whether the relation between the Congress and the executive--whether the executive is acting with congressional endorsement and support or in the face of congressional opposition. Those, of course, are very sensitive issues and always have been throughout our history. I certainly appreciate that. Those are significant matters. It's just that I'm prohibited from talking about the substance of the case.

Senator Durbin. Thank you. The next topic I would like to talk about for a moment is executive power, which has been addressed earlier. It has been a major--has not been a major focus in previous hearings, but obviously is now that we are at war. You have been asked a lot of questions about it because I think there is so much at stake. We will probably be involved in this war effort, as Senator Leahy said early this morning, for some time.

Throughout American history, even some of our greatest Presidents, including one from Illinois named Lincoln, tried to restrict liberty in an effort to provide more safety and security in our nation. This administration is no exception. It claimed the right to seize an American citizen in the United States and hold him indefinitely without charging him with a crime. They have claimed that the courts have no right to intervene. I think that threatens all of our freedoms.

Just last week, Judge Luttig authored an opinion upholding the administration's position, and if you are confirmed, you may have the final word on this question. You and others have compared the role of a judge to an umpire, and I promised I wouldn't get into the baseball analogy, so that is one thing I will spare you from.

But let me ask you this. When it comes to this use of executive power, you have referred time and again to Justice Jackson in the Youngstown case. Here is what he said. "A judge, like an executive advisor, may be surprised at the poverty of really useful and unambiguous authority applicable to concrete problems of executive powers as they actually present themselves."

So if you are confirmed, you will play a significant role in determining what limits, if any, the Constitution places on a President during times of war. That is why the American people have the right to know what you think about executive power.

DOJ_NMG_0035947

There was an exchange earlier today between you and Senator Kyl about a statement I made yesterday about whether, as a Justice, you will expand freedom in America, and Justice Kyl seemed--pardon me, Senator Kyl--I don't know something secret about that--but Senator Kyl seemed to suggest it was a zero-sum approach, that you couldn't enlarge the freedom of one person or group in America without taking away the freedom of another group.

It is a curious point of view. It is the same point of view that Robert Bork had that he tried to defend unsuccessfully before this committee many years ago.

But my point to you is this. I would like to ask you a question. What is it in your background or experience that can convince the members of this committee and the American people following this that you are willing to stand up to this President if he oversteps his authority in this time of war, even if it is an unpopular thing to do?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, I would just say that my demonstrated commitment to the rule of law, you can see that, I think, in my opinions over the past two years, you can see it in how I approach my job as a lawyer, arguing, and what types of arguments I make and how I make those arguments and how faithful they are to the precedents, and you can see it in my history of public service.

The idea that the rule of law--that's the only client I have as a judge. The Constitution is the only interest I have as a judge. The notion that I would compromise my commitment to that principle that has been the lodestar of my professional life since I became a lawyer because of views toward a particular administration is one that I reject entirely. That would be inconsistent with the judicial oath, and Justice Jackson is a perfect example of that. He is someone who was a strong advocate for executive power when he was FDR's Attorney General, one of the strongest, and yet he could issue a decision like the Youngstown decision not only concluding that President Truman lacked the authority, even in times of war, to seize the steelmills, but also setting forth the framework with the language of the sort that you just quoted, setting forth the framework about how to analyze these decisions in a way that is particularly sensitive to the role of Congress, as well. That is the key feature of his framework, the examination of where Congress is on the spectrum in determining whether the executive has that authority.

Senator Durbin. I hate to keep referring back to these ancient memos, but it said that if a hammer is the only tool you have, every problem looks like a nail. And in this case, this is the only tool we have to try to find out what is going on in your mind and in your heart. And so in a memo of 1983 to White House Counsel Fred Fielding, you wrote, "The independent prerogative of the Chief Executive to determine that a given law is unconstitutional." You talked about the power of the Executive to determine that a law is unconstitutional.

We are going through this debate that Senator Leahy alluded to earlier relative to this torture memo and the idea that the administration would walk away from commitments that have been made under Geneva Conventions and under the Convention on Torture, and would instead establish a new standard. So my question to you is this: Would the anti-torture statute be unconstitutional simply because it conflicts with an order issued by the President as commander-in-chief?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator, not simply because of the conflict, and I have to say I don't know--that's one of the 80,000 memos I don't know about, so I'd have to understand what the point was, what the issue was, and the language you read in context before I could respond to that.

But, no, the President has an obligation. He takes an oath, as we all do, to uphold the Constitution and to make a determination, and his determination that certain things are either constitutional or unconstitutional can, of course, in an appropriate case be tested in court. And the ultimate arbiter of that under our system is the Federal judiciary.

Senator Durbin. Justice Jackson thought the bottom line on Executive power was clear in Youngstown. He said, "No penance would ever expiate the sin against a free government of holding that a President can escape control of Executive powers by law through assuming his military role." I assume you agree with that statement by Justice Jackson.

Judge Roberts. Yes, I do. It simply reflects the basic principle that no man is above the law, not the President and not the Congress. And that's why courts have the obligation and have had since Marbury v. Madison to say what the law is. And if that means that Congress has acted unconstitutionally, they strike down the law. And if it means that the Executive has acted unconstitutionally, they have the obligation to block the Executive action.

Senator Durbin. We can imagine a hypothetical statute that would clearly intrude on a President's power as commander-in-chief ordering the movement of troops and that sort of thing. On the other hand, the anti-torture statute is clearly within the area, I believe, where Congress can legislate. As you noted this morning, Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution enumerates Congress' powers. Speaking clearly, it says Congress shall have the power "To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces."

I think we have exhausted this topic, and I think we are in common feeling and agreement about it. I hope we are at least close.

Senator Hatch. Now, Judge Roberts, as you know, the war on terror is a unique challenge in American history. As a consequence, many novel issues regarding Presidential authority to prosecute the war on terror will doubtless come before the Supreme Court. I think we all recognize the need to be careful in our questioning so you are not placed in the position of pre-committing yourself to any particular viewpoints on executive power that would compromise your ability to render a fair judgment as cases come before the Court.

But let me ask you a general question on terrorism. It is a question that many in Congress and the administration and the public have had to struggle with, particularly in the aftermath of the events of September 11, 2001. The question is this: What is the best way for our society to protect ourselves against terrorists not affiliated with a nation state, wear no uniforms, and really secrete themselves in ways that have never been done before? On the one hand, there are very specific international rules embodied in the Geneva Conventions that specify how enemies captured during traditional warfare are to be treated. On the other hand, we have the traditional criminal law protections contained in Title 18 of the United States Code that define the rights accorded to criminals such as the famous Miranda warnings--warning, I should say, and the right to obtain counsel.

What everyone is struggling with is how do we apply these two traditional methods against non-traditional enemies who clearly are non-traditional? Let us make no mistake. Their goal is to destroy our society and way of life, and they will use weapons of mass destruction if they can. I don't think anybody doubts that.

Now, let me just ask you this general question. Will you give us assurance that you will keep an open mind as the administration and Congress adopt and implement new policies and legal procedures that govern the apprehension, interrogation, and detention of suspected terrorists?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator, I will. I certainly am not qualified to comment on the best approaches in the war on terror or the most effective approaches. That is the responsibility, obviously, of the other branches. The responsibility of the judicial branch is to decide particular cases that are presented to them in this area according to the rule of law, and that is what I have tried to do, and that is what I will continue to do, either on the court of appeals or another court.

Senator Hatch. Well, thank you.

Senator Feinstein. That is very helpful. You might get it back again someday with that fix.

Let me turn to something else that Senator Leahy asked a number of questions on, and that is the Constitution and executive power. I am looking for the section, but the Constitution very clearly says that any treaty is treated as the supreme law of the land, right, and that no State or official can abrogate it--

Judge Roberts. Right.

Senator Feinstein. --which gives it the total weight of law. Can a President, then, decide not to follow a treaty?

Judge Roberts. As a general matter, the answer is no. The treaty power--as long as it's ratified according to the requirements in the Constitution, by two-thirds of the Senate, you're perfectly correct. It is, under the Supremacy Clause, the supreme law of the land.

Now, I don't know if there are particular arguments about executive authority in that area with which I'm not familiar, and I don't mean to state categorically, but my general understanding is that treaties that are ratified--and, of course, we have treaties that aren't ratified and executive agreements that aren't submitted for ratification and so on, but a treaty that's ratified by the Senate under the Supremacy Clause is part of the supreme law of the land. Now--

Senator Feinstein. So the Conventions Against Torture and the Geneva Conventions would apply?

Judge Roberts. Yes. Now, there are questions, of course, that arise under those and have arisen under those about interpreting the Conventions and how they apply in particular cases to non-parties to the Convention and so on, and as you know, those cases have been coming up and are being litigated. But that's an issue of what the Convention means in a particular case, not whether, as a general matter, a treaty is binding.

DOJ_NMG_0035950

Senator Feinstein. To come before you and you--right. That message was well conveyed.

Could I ask you one question? I think I will have time. In Acree v. Republic of Iraq, this was the case where 17 U.S. prisoners--they were our people--suffered severe beatings, starvation, mock executions, dark and unsanitary living conditions, et cetera, during the First Gulf War. And they sued the Government of Iraq, the Iraqi Intelligence Services, and Saddam Hussein for their brutal and inhumane treatment. The veteran won their case in district court in July of 2003. They were awarded $959 million in damages.

After the judgment, the Justice Department intervened in the suit to contest the district court's jurisdiction. The specific issue involved a statutory interpretation of the Emergency Wartime Supplemental Appropriations Act passed in 2003. Justice argued that the statute gave the President the authority to change Iraq's designation as a state sponsor of terror and thereby relieve it after the fact of its responsibilities for prior acts of terror.

You wrote a concurring opinion in favor of overturning the district court's judgment. Although you agreed with the other two judges on the panel that the judgment should be reversed, you alone adopted the Department of Justice's argument that the statute granted the President total power to absolve Iraq of liability. You reached this conclusion while acknowledging that the question of statutory interpretation is close.

May I ask my question?

Chairman Specter. Yes, you may finish your question.

Senator Feinstein. Do you believe that when, as in Acree, there is a close question of interpretation of a statute touching upon a foreign policy that the Executive deserves total deference?

Judge Roberts. Oh, no, Senator. Whether the question is close or not, I don't think there's any situation where a court concludes that the Executive deserves total deference, and that was not the basis of my decision.

The judges were unanimous that the veterans were not entitled to relief. The panel was chosen from what happened to be appointees of three different Presidents. The view was unanimous that they were not entitled to relief. The other two judges concluded there was no cause of action available to them. I concluded that there was no jurisdiction and wrote separately.

The recognition that it was a close question is also reflected in the view of the other two judges in addressing my concern. They acknowledged that it was a close question, and I agreed with that. But you did have legislation that said that the President can determine that these laws do not apply if he makes a determination under the criteria set forth in the statute, and he had done that, and my conclusion that that extended to the provision that otherwise would have allowed suit.

The other two judges disagreed. They thought there was jurisdiction, but then concluded there was no right of action. So the end result of both of our position was the same. But it was not a question of deference. It was a question of interpreting the legal authority and consequences of an act that this body had passed and the President's finding under that. When it comes to interpreting questions of law, I go back to Marbury v. Madison. That is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial branch. We don't defer to the Executive. We don't defer to the legislature in making that final decision about what the law is.

DOJ_NMG_0035951

Senator Feinstein. If you get confirmed, maybe you will defer to the legislative a little bit. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Judge Roberts. Just to clarify, we certainly defer in the standards of review to make sure that we're not--but the final decision about what's constitutional or not rests with the judicial branch. The policy judgments, we certainly defer to the legislature.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Feinstein.

Senator Feingold. I would like to revisit the Hamdi issue. I asked you which of the four opinions in the case of Hamdi v. Rumsfeld best approximates your view on the Executive's power to designate enemy combatants, and you refused to answer that question because the issue might return to the Court. I want to press you a bit on that. In Hamdi there were four different opinions. And by the way, I checked it because you mentioned Youngstown, and all four opinions cited the Youngstown Sheet and Tube v. Sawyer case. Both Justice Thomas's dissent and Justice Ginsburg and Souter concurring, cited Justice Jackson's opinion in the Youngstown case. And they came to completely different conclusions.

So your answer that you would apply that principle does not help me very much in understanding your view of this. We know where all 8 other members of the Court stand on these opinions. In their opinions, they either wrote of joined one of them, yet all 8 of them will hear the next case that raises similar issues. No one is suggesting that their independence or impartiality in the next case hospital been compromised.

Mr. Hamdi, of course, has left the country, so the precise facts of his case will never return to the Court. Of course, if a member of the Court expressed a view outside of the Court on a specific case that was headed to Court, that might be cause for recusal, as Justice Scalia recognized when he excused himself from the Pledge of Allegiance case a few terms ago after discussing it in a speech. But obviously, Justice Scalia can participate in the next case involving the questions at issue in Hamdi even though we know exactly what he thinks about that decision.

So I guess I want to know why are you different? I am not asking for a commitment on a particular case. I recognize that your views might change once you are on the Court and hear the arguments and discuss the issue with your colleagues, but why should not the public have some idea of where you stand today on these crucial questions concerning the power of the Government to jail them without charge or access to counsel in a time of war? They know a great deal about how each of the other Justices approach these issues. Why is your situation different?

Judge Roberts. Well, because each of the other 8 Justices came to their views in those cases through the judicial process. They confronted that issue with an open mind. They read the briefs presented by the arguments--by the parties, and the arguments the parties presented. They researched the precedents as a judge. They heard the argument in the case. They sat in the conference room, just the 9 of them on the Court, and debated the issues and came to their conclusions as part of the judicial process.

You're now asking me for my opinion outside of that process, not after hearing the arguments, not after reading the briefs, not after the participating with the other judges as part of the collegial process, not after sitting in the conference room and discussing with them their views, being open to their considered views of the case, not after going through the process of writing an opinion, which I have found from personal experience and from observation, often leads to a change in views, the process of the opinion writing. You can't--the opinion turns out it doesn't write. You have to change the result. The discipline of writing helps lead you to the right result.

You're asking me for my views, you know, right here without going through any of that process.

Senator Feingold. What would be the harm, Judge, if we got your views at this point, and then that process caused you to come to a different conclusion, as it appropriately should? What would be the harm?

Judge Roberts. Well, the harm would be affecting the appearance of impartiality in the administration of justice. The people who would be arguing in that future case should not look at me and say, "Well, there's somebody who under oath testified that I should lose this case because this is his view that he testified to." They're entitled to have someone consider their case through the whole process I've just described, not testifying under oath in response to a question at a confirmation hearing.

I think that is the difference between the views expressed in the prior precedent by other Justices in the judicial process and why--as has been the view of all of those Justices--every one of those Justices who participated in that case took the same view with respect to questions concerning cases that might come before them, as I am taking here.

Senator Feingold. I understand your view. I think it is narrow. I had the experience of having one of my bills go before the Supreme Court, and I know I did not have, as we say in Wisconsin, a snowball's chance with a couple of the Justices because of what they had ruled previously, but I did not think that made the process in any way tainted. I knew that they simply were not going to agree with the statute, but I recognize your limitations.

Senator Graham. . . . The war on terror. In my past legal life, I have spent most of my legal career associated with the military, and I am proud to be a military lawyer. I am the only reservist in the Senate. I sat as an Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals judge. I handled the easy cases because I don't have a whole lot of time and I help when I can. But I understand, I think, very well what it means to abide by the judicial canons of ethics, not to tip your hand, not to compromise yourself to get promoted or to get put on the court, promoted in the military or to get put on the court, trying to please your boss, trying to please a Senator. And my respect for you has gone up because you are unwilling to compromise your ethics, and I hope the Senate will understand that in the past other people were not required to do so.

Are you familiar with the Geneva Convention?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator.

Senator Graham. Do you believe that the Geneva Convention as a body of law, that it has been good for America to be part of that Convention?

Judge Roberts. I do, yes.

DOJ_NMG_0035953

Senator Graham. Why?

Judge Roberts. Well, my understanding in general is it's an effort to bring civilized standards to conduct of war, a generally uncivilized enterprise throughout history; an effort to bring some protection and regularity to prisoners of war in particular. And I think that's a very important international effort.

Senator Graham. As Senator Kyl said, this will be the only time we will actually get to talk, and I do not want to compromise your role as a judge, but I do want you to help me express some concepts here that America needs to be more understanding of. And I want to work with my Democratic friends to see if we can find some way to deal with this.

We are dealing with an enemy that is not covered by the Geneva Convention. Al Qaeda, by their very structure and nature, are not signatories to the Geneva Convention and are not covered under its dictates. An enemy combatant--are you familiar with that term in the law?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator, I am.

Senator Graham. What would an enemy combatant be under American jurisprudence? Who would they be?

Judge Roberts. Well, I really have to-- Senator Graham. Fair enough, fair enough.

Judge Roberts. Those cases are both pending, the ones that I have decided are pending before the Supreme Court, and those issues are likely to come before it.

Senator Graham. Fair enough. The Geneva Convention does not cover al Qaeda but our President has said that anyone in our charge, terrorist or not, will be treated humanely. I applaud the President because in fighting the war on terror, we need not become our enemy. Our strength as a Nation is believing in the rule of law, even for the worst of those that we may encounter.

I admire Mr. Adams for representing the Redcoats. I cannot imagine how tough that must have been. But his willingness to take on the unpopular cause in the name of the rule of law has made us stronger.

When the President said that we will treat everyone humanely, even the worst of the worst, I think he has brought out the best in who we are. But we are in a war, Judge Roberts, where the Geneva Convention does not apply, and we have before the courts a line of cases dealing with the dilemma this country faces. When you capture an enemy combatant, non-citizen foreign terrorist, there are three things I think we must do: we must aggressively interrogate them without changing who we are; we must have the ability to keep them off the battlefield for a long period of time to protect our Nation; and we must have a system to hold them accountable for some of the most horrible crimes imaginable.

Justice Jackson was one of your favorite Justices; is that correct?

Judge Roberts. I think that's a fair description, yes.

Senator Graham. He has indicated in the Youngstown Steel case that the Presidency or the executive branch is at its strongest when it has concurrence with the legislative branch. Is that a fair summary of what he said?

Judge Roberts. Yes, he divided up the area basically into three parts, and considering the executive's authority, and said when it has the support of Congress, it's at its greatest. And obviously when it's in opposition to Congress, it's at its lowest ebb, as he put it. And he described a middle area in which it was sometimes difficult to tell whether Congress was supporting the action or not.

Senator Graham. This is me speaking, not you.

Congress is AWOL, ladies and gentlemen, in the war on terror when it comes to detention, interrogation, and prosecution of enemy non-citizen combatants. Justice Scalia has written eloquently that Congress has the power to get involved in these issues, and Congress is solid.

What is the case--is it the Razul case where the Supreme Court in a 5-4 decision has given habeas corpus rights to non-citizen foreign terrorists?

Judge Roberts. I think that's correct, Senator, yes.

Senator Graham. That is an amazing departure from what we have been as a Nation for 200 years. I have been to Guantanamo Bay twice. The people running the prison tell me that 185 of the detainees have lawyers in Federal court. Justice Scalia says we have set up a situation where 94 different jurisdictions can hear habeas cases involving non-citizen foreign terrorists. The people running the jail say this process is undermining our ability to get good information. A habeas corpus petition hearing, would it allow a defense attorney to call a military commander in to answer for how this person was captured?

Judge Roberts. I don't know, Senator, and I hesitate to opine on that without knowing.

Senator Graham. Well, the truth is that we have set up a situation where our military leaders and our military commanders and soldiers in the field can be called from all over the world, all over the country, to answer for why such person is detained.

We had a conversation in our office--in my office. You said something to the effect, as Justice Scalia said in his dissenting opinion, that this would be an area where the courts would welcome some congressional involvement. And right now we have the executive branch carrying the load totally by themselves. We have got several cases before the Court dealing with detention policy, interrogation policy, and prosecution policy.

Do you believe that this is an area, if the Congress acted, as Justice Jackson said, that it would strengthen the hand of the executive in the legal situation?

Judge Roberts. My observation during our meeting, Senator, was not an expression of legal determination, and it doesn't necessarily mean a view that Congress' action or involvement would be determinative or would even be within the scope of legal authority, depending on what the issue and the arguments were.

I do know that when you are in the middle area where it's difficult to determine whether Congress is supporting the President's action or is opposed to the President's action, that the Court often has to try to read the tea leaves of related legislation. If you look at the Dames and Moore decision coming out of the Iranian hostage crisis, what the Court did in that case, applying the middle tier, was look at a vast array of legislation. And it was a very difficult enterprise to try to figure out what Congress' view was. My point was simply that if we'd know what Congress' view was, it might make it easier to apply it in a particular case, and you wouldn't have to go through that process of trying to determine what position Congress was in, if that turned out to be pertinent under the particular legal challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0035955

Senator Graham. Thank you. Justice Scalia said in a very direct way, the courts are ill-equipped to deal with these issues. In the Youngstown Steel case, Justice Jackson says, "When the President acts pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress, his authority is at the maximum, for it includes all that he possesses in his own right plus all that Congress can delegate. A seizure executed by the President pursuant to an act of Congress would be supported by the strongest of presumptions and the widest latitude of judicial interpretation, and the burden of persuasion would rest heavily upon any who may attack."

Do you agree with that?

Judge Roberts. That was read from the Jackson--I do. I agree with the basic proposition that the President's authority is at its greatest when he has the support of Congress.

Senator Graham. To my colleagues, I think it is imperative for this body to get involved in the war on terror when it comes to detaining, interrogating, and prosecuting enemy combatants who are not citizens. It is important that all three branches of Government, in my opinion, feel comfortable with the policies of this Nation, that we will be stronger if the judicial branch, the legislative branch, and the executive branch are working together to come up with policies that will allow for aggressive interrogation, appropriate detention, and serious prosecution in a way that is within the values of our Nation. So that is why I will be introducing legislation on all those topics, and I will not ask you any further what you may or may not do about the legislation if it ever gets to the floor of the Senate and passed.

Senator Leahy. . . . You suggested I may have over-read your memo following Grenada. You said it was really talking about veterans' rights, but actually your memo, what struck me, it does not say veterans' rights, it says "War Powers" on it. The Constitution vests the power of declaring war in Congress, not the President. I still have a hard time squaring that with your inherent authority argument you advanced in that Grenada memo. Maybe I could ask it that way. Do you continue to believe that the President has inherent authority to invade a sovereign nation absent attack by a foreign power?

Judge Roberts. Senator, that is a very abstract hypothetical. There are situations that arise when an Executive may determine that that type of action is necessary. That may be challenged. I don't think abstract questions like that should be answered. There have been situations in our past where that authority has been claimed, both abstractly and concretely. Certainly Congress has the power to declare war, but as you know, of course, there have been several incidents in our history, the Korean War, the Vietnam War, others where there has been authorization of the use of force, but not a declaration of war.

You know the history, when Madison's original proposal gave Congress the authority to make war, and he thought that should be changed so that the Executive would have the authority to respond to an invasion, and I appreciate that part of your question.

Senator Leahy. You also have George Washington, if you are going to quote people back at that time. George Washington spoke of no offensive expedition of importance can be undertaken until after Congress shall have deliberated the subject and authorized such a measure. So I will go to the flip side, can Congress stop a war?

Judge Roberts. Well, that's of course a difficult question. Now, Congress has always exercised the power of the purse with respect to activities of that sort, and regulated the funding for that type of activity, and that has of course always been the core of Congress's authority. But the question to actually terminate hostilities that the Executive has determined to initiate, either with the authorization of Congress on in the situation of congressional silence or acquiescence, to go back to the Youngstown decision. The issue of what Congress's authorities are to terminate short of exercising its power with respect to the purse, those are unsettled and I think have to be addressed in the context of a particular case.

The memo to which you refer, again, I was a lawyer for the Executive, and any cautious lawyer for the Executive, without regard to the administration, would be alert for any type of suggestion that there are limits on that power, just as--

Senator Leahy. Showing how cautious you were, you wrote, "There's no clear line separating what the President may do on his own and what requires a formal declaration of war," but you conclude the exercise of presidential power in connection with the Grenada incident fell comfortably on the legitimate side of the line. What is a situation that falls on the illegitimate side of the line where a declaration of war would be needed?

Judge Roberts. Well, you know, you take the history anyway, if you have a situation like the Korean War taking place without a declaration of war, the war in Vietnam taking place without a declaration of war, I think it's difficult to articulate in the abstract where the line would be other than the fact that throughout our history there have been those significant types of engagements that I suspect all of the people involved in them thought were a war that did have a congressional declaration of war. So again, where the line is drawn or how it would be drawn in a particular case, or even what the role of the courts would be. As you know in these areas there's often an initial dispute, is this a judiciable question that the Court should entertain in the case of litigation and a conflict between the Executive and the Legislative concerning something like whether a declaration of war was required. That would be a question the Court would have to address before reaching the merits.

Separation of Powers – Congress and the Judiciary

Senator Hatch. All of your experience has been either in the Judicial Branch from your service as a clerk to then-Justice Rehnquist, and from your current role on the D.C. Circuit, or in the Executive Branch, where you worked in the White House Counsel's Office, Assistant to the Attorney General and Deputy Solicitor General. In contrast, I would note that Justice Breyer brought to the Court his experience as Chief Counsel to this Committee. As many commentators during the oral arguments of the Sentencing Guidelines case, Justice Breyer seemed more than willing to defend congressional prerogatives. Now, what can you tell us to assure the Committee that your lack of experience in working in the Legislative Branch of Government might contribute to a lack of deference to Federal statutes as you review those Federal statutes on the bench?

Judge Roberts. Well, I guess the first thing I would say is look at--begin with my opinions as a judge over the past two years ont Court of Appeals. I think they show a healthy regard for the prerogatives of the Legislative Branch that is appropriate. It is certainly--as an advocate, I've certainly been arguing deference to the legislature in appropriate cases. Other cases of course I was on a different side in arguing the opposite, so I'm familiar with the arguments. I have not only been in a position where I've been pressing arguments, for example, for the Executive Branch. I have been arguing cases against the Executive Branch, and frequently arguing cases for the proposition of deference in favor of the legislature.

I guess I would just hearken back to the model I was talking about earlier of Justice Jackson, who went from being FDR's Attorney General to being a Justice on the Court who I think always had a health regard for the prerogatives of the Legislative Branch.

Senator Hatch. Do you believe that Congress is just as bound by constitutional limits as state legislatures?

Judge Roberts. There are different limits, of course, but, yes, the limits in the Constitution on Congress are as important as limitations on state legislatures in the Constitution.

Senator Hatch. I ask that question because some seem to argue that overturning a statute that we pass here in the national legislature is almost presumptively an example of judicial activism. I have disagree with the Court on some of these statutes. The Morrison case is a perfect illustration to me. I am, along with Senator Biden, the author of the Violence Against Women Act, and I felt that they overreached in that particular case.

But in any event, some believe that it is judicial activism, while turning a blind eye to the much more common practice of striking down State legislation is just an afterthought.

This argument gets even more complicated when the Supreme Court uses a provision actually in the Constitution, to strike down a congressional statute, but provisions not in the Constitution to strike down State statutes. America's Founders were clear that the Constitution established a Federal Government of few and defined powers.

DOJ_NMG_0035958

It cannot regulate any activity it choose, but may only regulate in those areas which the Constitution grants it power to regulate.

One familiar area is found in Article I, Section 8, which gives the Congress to regulate, "to regulate commerce among the various States." Now, do not get me wrong, I do not necessarily agree with the Supreme Court, as I mentioned in the Morrison case. I do not think they always get it right when saying that Congress has overstepped its bounds with respect to regulating interstate commerce.

At the same time some have learned that we are sliding into a constitutional abyss because the Court has found just twice in more than 60 years that there is something, anything that it says the Constitution does not allow Congress to do regarding Congress and State legislatures and their enactments.

Judge Roberts. Well, the obligation to say what the law is, including determining that particular legislation is unconstitutional, is, as Chief Justice Marshall said, emphatically the duty and province of the Judicial Branch. You and I can agree or disagree on whether the Court is right in a particular case, but if the Court strikes down an Act of Congress and it's wrong, the Court shouldn't have done that, that's not an act of judicial activism, it's just being wrong.

The obligation to strike down legislation is with the Judicial Branch. They need--I think as Justice Holmes said, it's the gravest and most delicate duty that the Court performs, and the reason is obvious. All judges are acutely aware of the fact that millions and millions of people have voted for you and not one has voted for any of us. That means that you have the responsibility of representing the policy preferences of the people making the determination about when legislation is necessary and appropriate and what form that legislation should take.

Our job is a very different one. We have to consider cases that raise the question from time to time whether particular legislation is constitutional, and we have to limit ourselves in doing that to applying the law and not in any way substituting ourselves for the policy choices you've made. But it is not, as I would say, it's not judicial activism when the courts do that. They may be right or they're wrong, and if they're wrong, they're wrong, but it's not activism.

Senator DeWine. Judge, let me turn to the area of congressional power. It has been talked about before here, but I want to talk about it a little bit more. Really, this has to do with federalism cases. As you know, the Court has handed down a number of cases that have restricted the power of Congress to pass important legislation. The Court has struck down portions of the Violence Against Women Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act, the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, just to name a few.

In some of these cases the Court restricted Congress's power under the Commerce Clause. In some it relied on the 11th Amendment, and in some it cited Section 5 of the 14th Amendment. The particular provision is not that important for this discussion. Let me be perfectly frank. I think there are some problems with these decisions. I think it is wrong for judges to take on the role of policymaker. I realize that if a statute is blatantly unconstitutional, a judge has to do their duty. But I think for the reason I am going to discuss in a minute, that was not true in these cases.

I want to cite one example, and that is--because of time I can only go through one--and that is the Garrett case, a 5-4 decision, Board of Trustees v. Garrett. As you know, this case involved a woman who said that she had been discriminated against because she was disabled. She was employed by the State of Alabama. She sued the State under the Americans with Disabilities Act. The Supreme Court threw out the suit, holding that there was no evidence that the State discriminated against the disabled in employment decisions. I think the problem with Garrett is that the Court ignored findings by Congress.

There were other cases that have been decided, where we did not have findings, and you are familiar with those. I understand the Court's decisions. I might like them or not like them, but I understand them.

This case we made findings. While we were considering the Americans with Disabilities Act we held 13 hearings and we set up a task force, a task force that held hearings in every State. It was attended by more than 30,000 individuals. Based on these hearings we found 300 examples of disabled individuals being discriminated against in employment decisions. We found that two-thirds of all disabled Americans between the ages of 16 and 64 were not working at all, even though a large majority of them were capable of doing so. We found that this discrimination flowed from stereotypic assumptions about the disabled, as well as, quote, "purposeful, unequal treatment," all findings by this elected Congress of the United States.

In Garrett, however, the Court said this was not enough. They rejected our fact findings, holding that we had not pointed to any evidence that the States discriminated in employment decisions against the disabled.

Judge, you have stressed repeatedly in your writings and your opinions--and I have a great deal of respect for you and appreciate these writings and opinions--you stressed the limited role that judges must play in our system of Government. I applaud you for that approach. It is important for me to ensure that you still hold to this belief. In your opinion, what role should a judge play when reviewing congressional fact findings? In your view, how much deference do congressional fact findings deserve? I understand you are not going to talk about this case, or any of the cases I have just cited. I wanted to lay that kind of as a predicate. I wanted to tell you where I am coming from.

But just talk in general about when you see fact findings by Congress, when we have held hearings, when we have established a record, how do you approach? What are the tools that you use, Judge, based on the precedents and based on what you think the role of the judge is?

Judge Roberts. Again, and of course, without getting into the particulars, the reason that congressional fact finding and determination is important in these cases is because the courts recognize that they can't do that. Courts can't have, as you said, whatever it was, the 13 separate hearings before passing particular legislation. Courts--the Supreme Court can't sit and hear witness after witness after witness in a particular area and develop that kind of a record. Courts can't make the policy judgments about what type of legislation is necessary in light of the findings that are made. So the findings play an important role, and I think it is correct to say under the law in this area and others, they're neither necessary nor necessarily sufficient. But I know as a judge that they're extremely helpful when there are findings.

And judges know when they look at those, that they're the result of an exhaustive process of a sort that the Court cannot duplicate. We simply don't have the institutional expertise or the resources or the authority to engage in that type of a process. So that is sort of the basis for the deference to the fact finding that is made. It's institutional competence. The courts don't have it. Congress does. It's constitutional authority. It's not our job. It is your job. So the defence to congressional findings in this area has a solid basis.

Now, the particular area you're talking about under Section 5 of the 14th Amendment, the Garrett case, there are of course more recent cases that you know of, Tennessee v. Lane and the Hibbs case in Nevada v. Hibbs, where the Court did defer to the fact finding in those cases, and particularly in the Hibbs case focused on the legislative recognition based on its examination of the factual record developed at hearings about the statute that was at issue there, and the particular approach that they were taking to remedy discrimination under the 14th Amendment, which is the authority that Congress has.

Now, the legal requirement that the Court has articulated there came of course from the City of Boerne case, that the remedial approach has to be congruent and proportional. Justice Scalia signed on to that approach in the City of Boerne case. In the Lane case he said he had changed his mind and he no longer agreed with that. Any area of the law where Justice Scalia is changing his mind, has got to be one that is particularly difficult, and one that I think is appropriately regarded as still evolving and emerging. And so I don't know if the more recent cases in Lane and Hibbs represent a swinging of the pendulum away from cases like Garrett and Kimmel on the other side, or if it's simply part of the process of the Court trying to come to rest with an approach in this area.

But it is an area that the Court has found difficult, and just as a general matter, I think when you get to this point of reweighing congressional findings, that starts to look more like a legislative function, and the courts need to be very careful as they get into that area, to make sure that they're interpreting the law and not making it.

Senator Brownback. [line of questioning criticizing Kelo]

Judge Roberts. . . . There was a caveat in the Kelo majority. They said they were only deciding this in the context of an urban redevelopment plan. They reserved the question--if it's just taking one parcel and giving it to everybody else, not part of a broader plan, that question was still open. And as you say, there's been a lot of reaction to it. I understand some States have even legislated restricting their power.

Senator Brownback. And we are considering it here in the Congress.

Judge Roberts. And I think that's a very appropriate approach to consider. In other words, the Court was not saying you have to have this power, you have to exercise this power. What the Court was saying is there is this power, and then it's up to the legislature to determine whether it wants that to be available, whether it wants it to be available in limited circumstances, or whether it wants to go back to an understanding as reflected in the dissent, that this is not an appropriate public use.

DOJ_NMG_0035961

That leaves the ball in the court of the legislature, and I think it's reflective of what is often the case and people sometimes lose sight of, that this body and legislative bodies in the States are protectors of the people's rights as well. It's not simply a question of legislating to address particular needs, but you obviously have to also be cognizant of the people's rights and you can protect them in situations where the Court has determined, as it did 5-4 in Kelo, that they are not going to draw that line. You still have the authority to draw--

Senator Brownback. I understand the authority we maintain. . . .

Senator Brownback. Let me take you to another area that is stewing here in legislative bodies, certainly across the United States and certainly in Congress, and that is the issue of checks and balances of the Court. Any civics student can talk about checks and balances within the executive, the legislative, and the judicial branch, and we all know that Congress, when it passes a bill, can be checked by a veto of the President. And we know the President's power can be checked by the power of the purse in the Congress, those checks and balances. And when popular elected branches of Government enact bills contrary to the Constitution, the courts can strike the law down by exercising judicial review.

One curiosity, though, especially given the broad sweep of judicial power in America today and the angst that that stirs among so many people, is what check there is on the Court and what checks there exist on the Court. And it seems to me critical that we have this discussion at this point in time.

The first check on the judiciary, of course, is the President's ability to populate the bench, to which you are a nominee, and our ability on advise and consent. A greater problem arises once a Federal judge is on the bench and what is in Article III, section 1--and this is getting a lot of discussion now here in this body, where judges hold office during good behavior, which I know you will have, effectively have life tenure. But that is not really an effective check in the system.

[omitted extensive exchange re Congress's power to strip the Court of jurisdiction; for that exchange, see Federal Jurisdiction – Jurisdiction-Stripping]

Senator Brownback. Then what check is there on the Court's power?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think the primary check is the same one that Alexander Hamilton talked about in the Federalist Papers, because the exact argument was raising in the debates about the Constitution. People were concerned about a new Judiciary, what was it going to do? They were concerned that it might deprive them of their rights. And of course, Hamilton's famous answer was that Judiciary was going to be the least dangerous branch because it had no power. It didn't have the sword. It didn't have the purse. And the judges were not going to be able to deprive people of their liberty because they were going to be bound down by rules and precedents. They were going to just interpret the law. And if judges just interpreted the law, there was no threat to liberty from the Judicial Branch.

So I would say the primary check on the courts has always been judicial self-restraint, and a recognition on the part of judges that they have a limited task, that they are insulated from the people. They're given life tenure, as you mentioned, precisely because they're not shaping policy. They're not supposed to be responsive. They're supposed to just interpret the law.

Senator Brownback. I guess that is the area that has so many people concerned, is that the Judiciary does not show restraint, and judicial restraint is the limitation on the courts, such as in the Takings Clause we just had really, where the Court is saying, "Well, no, this is a broader power." But if you do not restrain yourselves, then who does within this system? Obviously there are restraints on the Congress, there are restraints on the President. We like that system. We want that check and balance system. I think the Framers put that Exceptions Clause and other things in there for clear purpose, for clear reason.

Let me take you on to another area because that one I think you are going to see a lot of action as you get pushing back and forth between the three branches of Government, and a number of people feeling like the Judiciary has not show judicial restraint in recent years.

Senator Coburn. [cites Gonzaga and observes that legislation is not always clear]

I would just like your thoughts as to if you were to critique things that we could do better to make your job easier and clearer, what would you have to say to that?

Judge Roberts. Well, sitting where I am, I am not terribly inclined to be critical of the Congress--

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. --and wouldn't be in any event. But a lot of what judges spend their time doing, not always in the momentous constitutional cases that we've been talking about, but sometimes in very mundane cases, is the effort to discern Congressional intent, trying to figure out what Congress meant when it used specific words that were passed by both Houses and signed by the President into law.

Now, some of that is entirely unavoidable. The complexity of human endeavor is such that situations are going to arise that are not clearly answered by even the most specific language, and that's to be expected and judges have to address those situations.

But as you suggest yourself in your question, there are situations where sometimes Congress punts the issue to the courts. They can't come to an agreement about how a particular provision should be applied, and so folks who wanted to go one way and folks who wanted to go the other way just sort of leave it ambiguous or leave it out and take their chances in court.

Obviously, that's a different situation. I think all judges would tell you that to the extent Congress can address the issues and resolve the issues that are the policy questions entrusted to them, it makes it a lot easier for the courts to decide the cases that do come up because then it's just a question of looking at the facts and the law is clear and you apply the facts to the law. If the law is unclear, that makes it that much more difficult.

As I said, obviously, a lot of these situations are unavoidable, but there are certainly--and the Supreme Court has addressed many of these, the issue of implied rights of action in the past, and they were doing case after case after case and they finally adopted an approach in the early 1980s that said, look, we're not going to imply rights of action anymore. Congress, if you want somebody to have a right of action, just say so.

But this is not a good thing for the courts to be doing, deciding whether a particular right of action should be implied or not.

And after the Court developed that jurisprudence in the early 1980s, the hope was, and I think it has been realized to a large extent, that there will be more addressing of that question in Congress, which is where it should be addressed.

Senator Coburn. And you would agree, we could do a better job?

Judge Roberts. Well, I'm sure everyone is doing as good a job as they can--

Senator Coburn. That is the first answer I worry about that you given through the whole testimony.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. I am going to move now to the confrontation between Congress and the Court, and what I consider to be denigrating comments about the Congress. In the Morrison case, in the face of a overwhelming factual record, the Court, 5-4 decision, said that parts of the legislation to protect women against violence unconstitutional because of the congressional "method of reasoning." And then the dissent picked up the conclusion that the majority's view was "dependent upon a uniquely judicial competence" with the other side of the coin being congressional incompetence. And then in the dissent in Tennessee v. Lane Justice Scalia says that the Court engaged in ill-advised proceedings to make itself the "task master" to see if the Congress has done its homework. You commented a few minutes ago that you would be respectful of Congress. Do we have your commitment that you won't characterize your method of reasoning as superior to ours?

Judge Roberts. I don't think it's appropriate--

Chairman Specter. In your particular case, maybe yours is, but--

Judge Roberts. No, no.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. As a generalization--we have gone around this with other nominees, and after they have gone to the Court, they have not been mindful as to what they have said here. But I take umbrage at what the Court has said and so do my colleagues. There isn't a method of reasoning which changes when you move across the green from the Senate columns to the Supreme Court columns. And we do our homework, evidenced by what has gone on in this hearing, and we do not like being treated as schoolchildren, requiring, as Justice Scalia says, a task master.

Will you do better on this subject, Judge Roberts?

Judge Roberts. Well, I don't think the Court should be the task master of Congress. I think the Constitution is the Court's task master, and it's Congress' task master as well. And we each have responsibilities under the Constitution. And I appreciate very much the differences in institutional competence between the judiciary and the Congress when it comes to basic questions of fact finding, development of a record, and also the authority to make the policy decisions about how to act on the basis of a particular record. It's not just disagreement over a record. It's a question of whose job it is to make a determination based on the record. Now--

Chairman Specter. On the record. In U.S. v. Morrison, the legislation to protect women against violence, the record showed that there were reporters on gender bias from the task force in 21 States and eight separate reports issued by Congress and its committees over a long course of time leading to the enactment and the characterization by the dissenters that there was a mountain of evidence.

What more does the Congress have to do to establish a record that will be respected by the Court? And this is where the five-person majority threw it over, not because of the record but because of the method of reasoning. Isn't that record palpably sufficient to sustain the constitutionality of the Act?

Judge Roberts. Well, Mr. Chairman, I don't want to comment on the correctness of incorrectness of a particular decision. What I will say--

Chairman Specter. Well, Judge Roberts, let me interrupt you there for a minute. Why not? The case is over. This isn't a case which is likely to come before you again. These are the specific facts based on the rape of the woman--alleged rape by the three VMI students. I liked your answers yesterday. You were willing to answer more questions about cases on the differentiation that they are not likely to come before the Court. This is not likely to come before the Court again. Isn't this record sufficient in Morrison to--

Judge Roberts. Well, Mr. Chairman, I must respectfully disagree. I have been willing to comment on cases that I think are not likely to come before the Court again. I think the particular question you ask about the adequacy of findings, make a determination of the impact on interstate commerce, is likely to come before the Court again. And expressing an opinion on whether the Morrison case was correct or incorrect would be prejudging those cases that are likely to come before the Court again. And that is the line--it's not just a line that I'm drawing. It's a line that, as I've read the transcripts, every nominee who's sitting on the Court today drew. Some of them drew the line far more aggressively and wouldn't even comment on cases like Marbury v. Madison.

What I can tell you is that with respect to review of congressional findings, that my view of the appropriate role of a judge is a limited role and that you do not make the law, and that it seems to me that one of the warning flags that should suggest to you as a judge that you may be beginning to transgress into the area of making a law is when you are in a position of re-evaluating legislative findings, because that doesn't look like a judicial function. It's not an application of analysis under the Constitution. It's just another look at findings.

Now, again, I don't feel it's appropriate to comment on Morrison. I do feel it's appropriate to tell you that I appreciate the differences between Congress and the courts with respect to findings, both with respect to the issue of the capability and competence to undertake that enterprise, and also with respect to the issue of authority to make a decision based on the findings.

Chairman Specter. Judge Roberts, we will have to agree to disagree about that. I don't think the facts of Morrison are likely to come before the Court, but I ask the questions, you answer them.

Chairman Specter. . . . Let me come now to the Americans With Disabilities Act, and you have 5-4 decisions going opposite ways. Ms. Garrett had breast cancer. The Court in 2001 said that the title of the Disabilities Act was unconstitutional, 5-4, on employment discrimination. Then 3 years later, you have the case coming up of Lane, the paraplegic crawling up the steps, accommodations, 5-4, and the Act is upheld. The record in the case was very extensive--13 congressional hearings, a task force that held hearings in every State, attended by more than 30,000 people, including thousands who had experienced discrimination. And in the Garrett case, the Supreme Court of the United States used a doctrine which had been in vogue only since 1997 in the Boerne case. You and I discussed this in my office. They came up with a standard of what is congruent and proportionate. Congruence and proportionality.

I was interested in your statement when we talked informally that you did not find those in the 14th Amendment. I did not either. Now, they plucked congruence and proportionality right out of thin air, and when Scalia dissented, he said that the congruence and proportionality test was a "flabby test," which is a "invitation to judicial arbitrariness by policy-driven decisionmaking."

Now, you said yesterday that you did not think that there was judicial activism when the Court overruled an act of Congress. Isn't this congruence and proportionality test, which comes out of thin air, a classic example of judicial activism where the view of congruence--hard to find a definition for congruence. Proportionality, hard to find a definition for proportionality. I have searched and cannot find any.

Isn't that the very essence of what is in the eye of the beholder where the Court takes carte blanche to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional?

Judge Roberts. Well, these questions arise, of course, under, as you know, section 5 of the 14th Amendment, where the issue is Congress' power to address violations of the 14th Amendment. And it's an extraordinary grant of power, and the Court has always recognized it as such. And their decisions in recent years--it's not just, as you point out, the Garrett case on the one hand and the Lane case on the other. You have the Hibbs case recently, which upheld Congress' exercise of authority. The most recent cases--Lane and Hibbs--uphold Congress' exercise of authority to abrogate--

Chairman Specter. But, Judge Roberts, they uphold it at the pleasure of the Court. Congress can't figure that out. There is no way we can tell what is congruent and proportional in the eyes of the Court.

Judge Roberts. Well, and that was Justice Scalia's position in dissent. He had originally--

Chairman Specter. Do you agree with Scalia?

Judge Roberts. Well, again, the congruent and proportional test--

Chairman Specter. Do you disagree with Justice Scalia?

Judge Roberts. I don't think it's appropriate in an area--and there are cases coming up, as you know, Mr. Chairman. There's a case on the docket right now that considers the congruence and proportionality test.

Chairman Specter. That is why I am raising it with you. I would like to see a sensible interpretation of the Court in that case.

Judge Roberts. Well, and if I am confirmed and I do have to sit on that case, I would approach that with an open mind and consider the arguments. I can't give you a commitment here today about how I will approach an issue that is going to be on the docket within a matter of months.

Chairman Specter. Judge Roberts, I am not talking about an issue. I am talking about the essence of jurisprudence. I am talking about the essence of a man/ woman-made test in the Supreme Court which has no grounding in the Constitution, no grounding in the Federalist Papers, no grounding in the history of the country, comes out of thin air in 1997, and it is used in Lane and Garrett, two 5-4 decisions on identical records, on an identical act, and the country and the Congress are supposed to figure out what the Court means. So I am really talking about jurisprudence.

Senator Hatch. And the Grove City case, you won that case, didn't you?

Judge Roberts. The administration's position prevailed before the Court.

Senator Hatch. That is right. In other words, the position that you had advocated prevailed. Then we did not like it up here on Capitol Hill, so we passed the Civil Rights Restoration Act and we changed it, right?

Judge Roberts. Yes, which, of course, is always the prerogative of Congress when you're dealing with a question of statutory interpretation, and that's part of a regular interchange between the Court and the Congress. Sometimes if the Court gets something wrong, Congress can fix it. Even if the Court gets it right but Congress thinks the approach ought to be changed, Congress is free to legislate for a different result.

Judge Roberts. [responding to Sen. Kohl re Kelo] . . . I do know there's been extensive legislative reaction to the decision. I know a number of States have passed laws already, saying, "We do not authorize the use of the power of eminent domain to take--for a use that's going to be from one private owner to another," and that's certainly an appropriate reaction to the Court's decision in this area.

What the Court is saying, what the majority is saying is because of the difficulty of drawing a line, this issue is really left up to the legislature, and if the legislature wants to draw the line in a particular place, it has that authority. But it certainly is a decision that was closely divided, 5-4, and it has gotten a lot of legislative reaction.

The point I would only make is that it's perhaps a good example of the fact that legislatures, legislators have a responsibility to protect the rights of the people just as much as courts, and one way they can protect the rights of the people in this area, if they think it appropriate, is to restrict themselves in saying, "We will not use the eminent domain power to the broadest extent that the Supreme Court has said we are authorized to do."

Senator Brownback. . . . I want to talk on a separate hat you would carry as the Chief Justice of the United States, and that is as the head of the Judicial Conference of the United States, and it is about court reorganization. There have been proposals put forward to split the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, Ninth Circuit, the far western circuit, very large circuit. There is discussions in the Congress about splitting that circuit in two because of its size, its caseload, a number of other reasons that have been proffered or put forward.

You would agree that under Article I, section 8, that Congress has the power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator.

DOJ_NMG_0035967

Senator Brownback. And that these inferior courts would include such things as the circuit court and the lower district courts of the Federal Government?

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Brownback. So that Congress would have the power, its power--Congress has the power under the Constitution to split the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals?

Judge Roberts. I know that Congress did just that with respect to the old Fifth Circuit, which used to run from Florida out through Texas, and they split it into the new Fifth Circuit and the 11th Circuit. I don't think any questions have been raised about Congress's authority to do that.

Senator Brownback. And you do not raise those here as the head of the Judicial Conference of the United States?

Judge Roberts. Well, I wouldn't want to--

Senator Brownback. Some potential role there.

Judge Roberts. --just yet, but I'm not aware of any objections to Congress's authority. I don't think that's the issue. I know the judges have various views on whether it's a good idea of not, and since it affects them, I know some of the judges have expressed those views. But the question of congressional authority to do that is not something I've seen raised.

Senator Brownback. I thank you.

Senator Kennedy. Let me ask you about those that are faced with disabilities. Do you think the 50 million Americans that are faced with disabilities in one form or another, challenges I like to say, do you think that we have the authority and the power to free this country, free our Nation from the forms of discrimination against those who have disability?

Judge Roberts. I do, Senator. Now, there are issues that come up, as you know, in several of the cases before the Supreme Court on the particular applications of that, cases concerning the question of do you have the authority under Section 5 of the 14th Amendment to abrogate State sovereign immunity if the claim of disability discrimination concerns a State as a defendant. And as you know, in the Garrett case there was conclusion that the authority was not there. Later in the Lane case under Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the conclusion was that the sufficient record had been established that there was the authority.

So while as a general matter, there is the authority in a particular case that may come up against other provisions in the Constitution, or--in that case the recognition of State sovereign immunity, and that presents an issue that the courts have to address.

Senator Kennedy. You mentioned the Lane case. That was decided 5-4, 5-4. We are going to hear later today from Beverly Jones, who was a plaintiff in that case. I have listened the her and met with her before, an extraordinary woman, mother of two, trying to provide for her family, court reporter, and it was either a issue or question whether she was going to crawl up the flight of stairs to have access to the courtroom and have someone bring up her wheelchair, or whether she was effectively going to be denied that opportunity to have access to a courtroom in Tennessee.

Four Justices indicated in their dissent that this kind of an issue or question ought to be resolved by States, effectively, 50 States ought to be making that judgment. I strongly believe that this country, in its march towards progress in dealing with disabilities, with Americans with Disabilities Act, the Rehabilitation Act, the work that was done with IDEA over a long period of time, that we have come to the point where we as a country want to invite all of those with forms of disability to be a part of the main stream. But that was a 5-4 decision.

And I appreciate the fact your at least answer in the Lane v. Tennessee, that you are at least sympathetic to the judgment that Justice O'Connor made in indicating that accommodation for those with disability in that case was appropriate.

Judge Roberts. Well, it's certainly the precedent of the Court in that area and I have no quarrel with it. The issue of course is whether or not Congress has the authority under Section 5 of the 14th Amendment to abrogate the State's sovereign immunity. It's not a policy judgment by the Court about leaving things to the States or the Federal Government, but a legal determination of whether the State's sovereign immunity has been abrogated. And the Court determined in that case that Congress did have that authority and that it could authorize the suit against the State institution.

Senator Kennedy. We are going to come back to sort of the kind of legalist determinations that make an extraordinary difference in terms of people's lives. We welcome guidance and invitation about which particular provisions of the Constitution that we ought to utilize in order to strike down these forms of discrimination.

DOJ_NMG_0035969

Sixth Amendment

Senator Leahy. . . . Let's go to another precedent that moved me a great deal, Gideon v. Wainwright. As a young law student, I had an opportunity--my wife and I had an opportunity to have lunch with Hugo Black shortly after that, one of the most memorable times I had. He was a former Senator. He recognized the Sixth Amendment's guarantee to counsel in a criminal case was a fundamental right to a fair trial. He called it an obvious truth that in an adversary system of criminal justice, any person hauled into court who was too poor to hire a lawyer cannot be assured a fair trial unless counsel is provided for him. There is a wonderful book, "Gideon's Trumpet," that Anthony Lewis wrote.

Doesn't Gideon stand for the principle that to be meaningful such a fundamental right as the right to counsel requires assurances that can be exercised?

Judge Roberts. Yes, I think so. I have often said that a lot of these difficulties, particularly in the area of legal errors being raised and collateral review, a lot of those difficult questions could be avoided if people had competent counsel from the very beginning.

Senator Leahy. Well, doesn't the same principle embodied in Gideon, that the Constitution guarantees a person's ability to exercise fundamental constitutional rights, doesn't that apply to other constitutional rights? I mean, to be meaningful, if we have these rights, they have also got to be real in people's lives.

Judge Roberts. Well, I think the basic instinct and genius behind the Gideon decision was that without counsel to protect people's rights, they were going to forfeit them. They were going to waive them due to ignorance or inability to appreciate the proceedings, and that is why you need counsel at that stage. It is not simply because you have a right to counsel in the abstract. It was the recognition that having counsel is a way to ensure the protection of your other rights that you may not even be aware of.

Senator Leahy. That could be with a lot of our rights. I mean we have got to be meaningful. You cannot just say you have them. I am really struck by your discussion of the Soviet Constitution. I totally agree with you on that, but we have 280 million Americans of all different economic and educational backgrounds and everything else; we have wonderful rights. Our Bill of Rights is, I think, one of the most amazing things ever written by a democratic people. But the rights are only there if they are meaningful in people's lives, that they can be enforced. And ultimately it may come right down to the courts.

Judge Roberts. Well, I think--

Senator Leahy. I mean Hugo Black's opinion is a pretty strong opinion.

DOJ_NMG_0035970

Spending Clause

Senator DeWine. . . . Congress still has the power to protect the disabled under the Spending Clause of the Constitution. We have the power of the purse. In South Dakota v. Dole we wanted to establish a national drinking age of 21. You are well aware of that. It was upheld by the Court. We did it through the power of the purse in the Dole case. I just wonder if Congress might be able to use this approach to require the States to waive their immunity from suit under statutes like the Americans With Disabilities Act. It seems to me that under the Spending Clause, we have at our disposal the power to protect the disabled, to protect other groups, and effectively overturn cases like Garrett and these other cases that limit legislative power.

You seem to take that approach in a case entitled Barber v. Washington Metropolitan Transit Authority. That case concerned a disabled person who was suing a State entity under the Rehabilitation Act. In that case, you held that the suit could go forward even though the State entity was immune from suit under the 11th Amendment. In your view, the State entity had agreed to waive its immunity in exchange for receiving Federal mass transit dollars.

I think this case is important. It is important to me, at least, Judge. It seems to show us what you think about Congress' power under the Spending Clause, and it also gives us a model, I think, for how we might be able to protect those who are discriminated against under the Americans With Disabilities Act.

Could you just take a moment--I have got 2 minutes left. Could you take a moment and tell us about the issue in the Barber case and what was your reasoning for permitting a disabled person to sue in Federal court for discrimination in that case?

Judge Roberts. Certainly.

Senator DeWine. It was your case. You were involved in the case. You were in the majority opinion.

Judge Roberts. It was a divided decision.

Senator DeWine. Right, 2-1.

Judge Roberts. The argument was whether Congress had the authority under the Spending Clause as a condition of the receipt of Federal funds that WMATA--the Metro here in D.C.--receives, that they waive their sovereign immunity to suit under the disability provisions, and the argument was that Congress lacked that authority, that they could not impose a waiver of sovereign immunity as a condition for the receipt of Federal funds to allow an individual alleging discrimination on the basis of disability to sue.

There was no issue about whether there was sovereign immunity in the absence of a waiver, and the WMATA governing body was opposing the suit on the ground that it had not waived immunity. And they were arguing that Congress lacked the authority to condition the receipt of funds on a waiver of immunity.

It was a divided decision, a 2-1 vote. The dissenter argued that this was an inappropriate exercise of the Spending Clause power. The majority concluded that, no, this was within Congress' authority. It could condition the receipt of Federal funds on a waiver of sovereign immunity that allowed an individual alleging he was discriminated against in employment because of his disability to proceed with the suit. The arguments we rejected were arguments of germaneness. The idea was the fund were for transportation, not for employment, and so that it wasn't a germane condition. The majority rejected those arguments. The dissent would have ruled the other way.

Senator Brownback. . . . You would agree under the Constitution that the legislative bodies, and particularly under the U.S. Constitution, that Congress has the power to appropriate money?

Judge Roberts. Yes. The Framers regarded that as the basis legislative power, the power of the purse.

Senator Brownback. And that that power is not given to the Judiciary, it is given to the Legislative Branch of Government?

Judge Roberts. Yes. Alexander Hamilton, in making his point--I think it was Hamilton--that this was the least dangerous branch, emphasized that the courts have neither the power of the sword nor the power of the purse.

Senator Brownback. I want to point out to you--and this is happening in State judiciaries; this is happening and being considered now in the U.S. Federal Courts--the court's role in appropriating money. And you will have in front of you a case, the Solomon amendment that wa considered here. This is a recent Third Circuit of Appeals case, struck down the Solomon amendment on constitutional grounds. The Solomon amendment passed by Congress, Jerry Solomon, a long-term member of Congress, wonderful gentleman, has since passed away, had conditioned a university receipts of Federal funds on the universities granting equal access to the military for purposes of recruiting students.

So he said, you know, you need to allow military personnel access if you want to receive Federal funds. It was considered by Congress, it was passed. Third Circuit Court struck down the Solomon amendment on constitutional grounds. The decision has been appealed to you.

I obviously do not want you to declare your position on this. I would ask you, if you can state on this, the obvious one first, we have the role of the power of the purse is in the Congress, not in the Judiciary. May the Congress attach conditions to the receipt of Federal funds?

Judge Roberts. Well, Congress historically has done that. The Spending Clause power, for example, South Dakota v. Dole said that if you accept Federal Highway funds, you have to raise the drinking age to 21, and that was upheld by the Supreme Court. So certainly as a general proposition the Congress has that authority. I consider it a case involving a waiver of sovereign immunity. The condition on the receipt of Federal funds was that Washington's Metro system waive its sovereign immunity with respect to disability claims, and by a 2-1 vote we upheld that exercise of authority under the Spending Clause.

Senator Brownback. The Solomon amendment will be in front of you if you are confirmed, and obviously you cannot comment on it. It is just that if the courts start appropriating money through this route, the rub between the systems and the branches of Government I think will be absolutely extraordinary, and there will become more and more innovative ways that the Congress will try to find to limit the Judiciary. It is not healthy for the system and it is certainly not healthy for the Judiciary if it starts into the business, goes further into the business of appropriating funds. And it bleeds down through the system. It is not just then in the U.S. Supreme Court. It goes through the State court systems as well, and I would hope that that right of the Congress would be respected with adequate judicial restraint, as you noted with me this morning, that being the major check on the Judiciary, though I think we can limit what the Judiciary can review under the Constitution.

DOJ_NMG_0035973

Stare decisis

Chairman Specter. . . . Judge Roberts, there are many subjects of enormous importance that you will be asked about in this confirmation hearing, but I start with the central issue which perhaps concerns most Americans, and that is the issue of the woman's right to choose and Roe v. Wade. And I begin collaterally with the issue of stare decisis and the issue of precedents. [Quoting Black's Law Dictionary, Justice Frankfurter, and Justice Cardozo on stare decisis.] In our initial conversation, you talked about stability and humility in the law. Would you agree with those articulations of the principles of stare decisis as you had contemplated them, as you said you looked for stability in the law?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would. I would point out that the principle goes back even farther than Cardozo and Frankfurter. Hamilton, in Federalist No. 78, said that, "To avoid an arbitrary discretion in the judges, they need to be bound down by rules and precedents." So even that far back, the Founders appreciated the role of precedent in promoting evenhandedness, predictability, stability, the appearance of integrity in the judicial process.

Chairman Specter. I move now to Casey v. Planned Parenthood. Thirty minutes may seem like a long time and a second round of 20 minutes, but the time will fly, and I want to get right to the core of the issue. In Casey, the key test on following precedents moved to the extent of reliance by the people on the precedent, and Casey had this to say in a rather earthy way: "People have ordered their thinking and living around Roe. To eliminate the issue of reliance, one would need to limit cognizable reliance to specific instances of sexual activity. For two decades of economic and social developments, people have organized intimate relationships in reliance on the availability of abortion in the event contraception should fail." That is the joint opinion, rather earthy in its context. Would you agree with that?

Judge Roberts. Well, Senator, the importance of settled expectations in the application of stare decisis is a very important consideration. That was emphasized in the Casey opinion, but also in other opinions outside that area of the law. The principles of stare decisis look at a number of factors, settled expectations one of them, as you mentioned. Whether or not particular precedents have proven to be unworkable is another consideration on the other side; whether the doctrinal bases of a decision have been eroded by subsequent developments. For example, if you have a case in which there are three precedents that lead and support that result and in the intervening period two of them have been overruled, that may be a basis for reconsidering the prior precedent.

Chairman Specter. But there is no doctrinal basis erosion in Roe, is there, Judge Roberts?

Judge Roberts. Well, I feel the need to stay away from a discussion of particular cases. I'm happy to discuss the principles of stare decisis, and the Court has developed a series of precedents on precedent, if you will. They have a number of cases talking about how this principle should be applied. And as you emphasized, in Casey they focused on settled expectations. They also looked at the workability and the erosion of precedents. The erosion of precedent I think figured more prominently in the Court's discussion in the

Lawrence case, for example, but it is one of the factors that is looked at on the other side of the balance.

Chairman Specter. Well, do you see any erosion of precedent as to Roe?

Judge Roberts. Again, I think I should stay away from discussions of particular issues that are likely to come before the Court again. And in the area of abortion, there are cases on the Court's docket, of course. It is an issue that does come before the Court. So while I'm happy to talk about stare decisis and the importance of precedent, I don't think I should get into the application of those principles in a particular area.

Chairman Specter. Well, Judge Roberts, I don't know that we are dealing with any specific issue. When you mention--and you brought the term up--erosion of precedent, whether you see that as a factor in the application of stare decisis or expectations, for example, on the citation I quoted from Casey v. Planned Parenthood.

Judge Roberts. Well, in the particular case of Roe, obviously you had the Casey decision in '92 or '93.

Chairman Specter. '92.

Judge Roberts. '92, in which they went through the various factors in stare decisis and reaffirmed the central holding in Roe while revisiting the trimester framework and substituting the undue burden analysis with strict scrutiny. So as of '92, you had a reaffirmation of the central holding in Roe. That decision, that application of the principles of stare decisis is, of course, itself a precedent that would be entitled to respect under those principles.

Chairman Specter. The joint opinion then goes on, after the statement as to sexual activity, to come to the core issue about women being able to plan their lives. The joint opinion says, "The ability of women to participate equally in the economic and social life of the Nation has been facilitated by their ability to control their reproductive lives."

Do you agree with that statement, Judge Roberts?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator, as a general proposition. But I do feel compelled to point out that I should not, based on the precedent of prior nominees, agree or disagree with particular decisions, and I'm reluctant to do that. That's one of the areas where I think prior nominees have drawn the line when it comes to do you agree with this case or do you agree with that case. That's something that I'm going to have to draw the line in the--

Chairman Specter. Well, I am not going to ask you whether you are going to vote to overrule Roe or sustain it, but we are talking here about the jurisprudence of the Court and their reasoning.

Let me come to another key phase of Casey where the joint opinion says, "A terrible price would be paid for overruling Roe. It would seriously weaken the Court's capacity to exercise the judicial power and to function as the Supreme Court of the Nation dedicated to the rule of law."

Now, this moves away from the specific holding and goes to a much broader jurisprudential point, really raising the issue of whether there would be a recognition of the Court's authority. And in a similar line, the Court said this: that to overrule Roe would be "a surrender to political pressure," and added, "To overrule under fire would subvert the Court's legitimacy."

So in these statements on Casey, you are really going beyond the holding. You are going to the legitimacy and authority of the Court.

Do you agree with that?

Judge Roberts. Well, I do think the considerations about the Court's legitimacy are critically important. In other cases--I'm thinking of Payne v. Tennessee, for example--the Court has focused on extensive disagreement as a grounds in favor of reconsideration. In Casey, the Court looked at the disagreement as a factor in favor of reaffirming the decision. So it's a factor that is played different ways in different precedents of the Court.

I do think that it is a jolt to the legal system when you overrule a precedent. Precedent plays an important role in promoting stability and evenhandedness. It is not enough--and the Court has emphasized this on several occasions. It is not enough that you may think the prior decision was wrongly decided. That really doesn't answer the question. It just poses the question. And you do look at these other factors, like settled expectations, like the legitimacy of the Court, like whether a particular precedent is workable or not, whether a precedent has been eroded by subsequent developments. All of those factors go into the determination of whether to revisit a precedent under the principles of stare decisis.

Chairman Specter. A jolt to the legal system, a movement against stability--one of the Roberts doctrines.

Judge Roberts. An overruling of a prior precedent is a jolt to the legal system. It is inconsistent with principles of stability and yet--

Chairman Specter. One--go ahead.

Judge Roberts. I was just going to say, the principles of stare decisis recognize that there are situations when that's a price that has to be paid. Obviously, Brown v. Board of Education is a leading example, overruling Plessy v. Ferguson, the West Coast Hotel case overruling the Lochner era decisions. Those were to a certain extent jolts to the legal system, and the arguments against them had a lot to do with stability and predictability. But the other arguments--that intervening precedents had eroded the authority of those cases, that those precedents that were overruled had proved unworkable--carried the day in those cases.

Chairman Specter. One final citation from the joint opinion in Roe: "After nearly 20 years of litigation in Roe's wake, we are satisfied that the immediate question is not the soundness of Roe's resolution of the issue, but the precedential force that must be accorded to its holding."

Do you think the joint opinion is correct in elevating precedential force even above the specific holding of the case?

Judge Roberts. That is the general approach when you're considering stare decisis. It's the notion that it's not enough that you might think that the precedent is flawed, that there are other considerations that enter into the calculus that have to be taken into account, the values of respect for precedent, evenhandedness, predictability, stability; the considerations on the other side, whether a precedent you think may be flawed is workable or not workable, whether it's been eroded.

So to the extent that the statement is making the basic point that it's not enough that you might think the precedent is flawed to justify revisiting it, I do agree with that.

Chairman Specter. When you and I met on our first so-called courtesy call, I discussed with you the concept of a super-stare decisis. And this was a phrase used by Circuit Judge Luttig in Richmond Medical Center v. Governor Gilmore in the year 2000, when he refers to Casey being a super-stare decisis decision with respect to the fundamental right to choose, and a number of the academics--Professor Farber has talked about super-stare decisis, and Professor Estrich has, as it applies to statutory lines.

Do you think that the cases which have followed Roe fall into the category of a super-stare decisis designation?

Judge Roberts. Well, it's a term that hasn't found its way into the Supreme Court opinions yet. I think--

Chairman Specter. Well, there is an opportunity for that.

[Laughter.]

Judge Roberts. I think one way to look at it is that the Casey decision itself, which applied the principles of stare decisis to Roe v. Wade, is itself a precedent of the Court, entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis. And that would be the body of law that any judge confronting an issue in this care would begin with, not simply the decision in Roe v. Wade but its reaffirmation n the Casey decision. That is itself a precedent. It's a precedent on whether or not to revisit the Roe v. Wade precedent. And under principles of stare decisis, that would be where any judge considering the issue in this area would begin.

Chairman Specter. When you and I talked informally, I asked you if you had any thought as to how many opportunities there were in the intervening 32 years for Roe to be overruled, and you said you did not really know, and you cited a number. And I said, "Would it surprise you to know that there have been 38 occasions where Roe has been taken up, not with a specific issue raised but all with an opportunity for Roe to be overruled?" One of them was Rust v. Sullivan, where you participated in the writing of the brief, and although the case did not squarely raise the overruling of Roe, it involved the issue of whether Planned Parenthood units funded with Federal money could counsel on abortion. And in that brief, you again raised the question about Roe being wrongly decided, and then I pointed out to you that there had been some 38 cases where the Court had taken up Roe.

I am very seldom a user of charts, but on this one I prepared a chart because it speaks--a little too heavy to lift, but it speaks louder than just--thank you, Senator Grassley. Thirty-eight cases where Roe has been taken up, and I don't want to coin any phrases on super precedents. We will leave that to the Supreme Court. But would you think that Roe might be a super-duper precedent in light--

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. --of 38 occasions to overrule it?

Judge Roberts. The interesting thing, of course, is not simply the opportunity to address it, but when the Court actually considers the question. And that, of course, is in the Casey decision where it did apply the principles of stare decisis and specifically addressed it. And that I think is the decision that any judge in this area would begin with.

Chairman Specter. Judge Roberts, in your confirmation hearing for circuit court, your testimony read to this effect, and it has been widely quoted: "Roe is the settled law of the land." Do you mean settled for you, settled only for your capacity as a circuit judge, or settled beyond that?

Judge Roberts. Well, beyond that, it's settled as a precedent of the Court, entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis. And those principles, applied in the Casey case, explain when cases should be revisited and when they should not. And it is settled as a precedent of the Court, yes.

Chairman Specter. You went on then to say, "It's a little more than settled. It was reaffirmed in the face of a challenge that it should be overruled in the Casey decision." So it has that added precedential value.

Judge Roberts. I think the initial question the judge confronting an issue in this area, you don't go straight to the Roe decision; you begin with Casey, which modified the Roe framework and reaffirmed its central holding.

Chairman Specter. And you went on to say, "Accordingly, it is the settled law of the land," using the term "settled" again. Then your final statement as to this quotation, "There is nothing in my personal views that would prevent me from fully and faithfully applying the precedent as well as Casey."

There had been a question raised about your personal views, and let me digress from Roe for just a moment because I think this touches on an issue which ought to be settled. When you talk about your personal views, and as they may relate to your own faith, would you say that your views are the same as those expressed by John Kennedy when he was a candidate and he spoke to the Greater Houston Ministerial Association in September of 1960, "I do not speak for my church on public matters, and the church does not speak for me"?

Judge Roberts. I agree with that, Senator, yes.

Chairman Specter. And did you have that in mind when you said, "There is nothing in my personal views that would prevent me from fully and faithfully applying the precedent as well as Casey"?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think people's personal views on this issue derive from a number of sources, and there's nothing in my personal views based on faith or other sources that would prevent me from applying the precedents of the Court faithfully under principles of stare decisis.

Chairman Specter. With respect to, going back again to the import of Roe and the passage of time, Supreme Court Chief Justice Rehnquist changed his views on Miranda in the 1974 case, Michigan v. Tucker, which I am sure you are familiar with. They did not apply Miranda, without going into the technical reasons there. But the issue came back to the Court in U.S. v. Dickerson in the year 2000, and the Chief Justice decided that Miranda should be upheld, and he used this language, that it became "so embedded in routine police practice to the point where the warnings have become a part of our national culture."

Do you think that that kind of a principle would be applicable to a woman's right to choose as embodied in Roe v. Wade?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think those are some of the considerations the Court applied in Casey when it applied stare decisis to Roe, and those were certainly the considerations that the Chief Justice focused on in Dickerson. I doubt that his views of the underlying correctness of Miranda had changed, but it was a different question in Dickerson. It wasn't whether Miranda was right, it was whether Miranda should be overruled at this stage, and the Chief applied and address that separate question distinct from any of his views on whether Miranda was correct or not when decided, and that's the approach the Court follows under principles of stare decisis.

Chairman Specter. Well, that is the analogy I am looking for in Roe v. Wade. Might disagree with it at the time it was decided, but then his language is very powerful when he talks about it becoming "embedded in routine police practices to the point where the warnings have become a part of our national culture." The question, by analogy, whether a woman's right to choose is so embedded that it has become a part of our national culture. What do you think?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think that gets to the application of the principles in a particular case, and based on my review of the prior transcripts of every nominee sitting on the Court today, that's where they've generally declined to answer, when it gets to the application of legal principles to particular cases.

I would repeat that the Court has already applied the principles of stare decisis to Roe in the Casey decision, and that stands as a precedent of the Court as well.

Chairman Specter. So you are not bound to follow it, but it is pretty impressive logic?

Judge Roberts. In the Casey decision at--

Chairman Specter. No, no. I am talking about Chief Justice Rehnquist on Miranda.

Judge Roberts. I think in that case, the Chief's explanation of why they weren't going to revisit Miranda is--it persuaded, I believe, all but one member of the Court. And I'm sure it had added persuasive effect because of the Chief's prior views on Miranda itself. It is a recognition of some of the things we've been talking about, the values of stare decisis. I don't think, again, that there's any doubt what the Chief, certainly what he thought. He told us what he thought about Miranda.

I doubt that those views have changed, but there are other considerations that come into play when you're asked to revisit a precedent of the Court, and those are the things we've talked about, and they're laid out again in Dickerson and other cases of the Court. Payne v. Tennessee, for example, Agostini, a variety of decisions where the Court has explained when it will revisit a precedent and when it will not, and of course the decisions come out both ways.

In Payne v. Tennessee the Court went through the analyses. It was a case about whether victims could testify at sentencing. The precedent said no, and they overruled those.

Senator Hatch. . . . Now, my friend, the Chairman, held up a chart with the number of cases that he said relied on Roe v. Wade. In fact, if I heard him correctly he called Roe a super duper precedent. Now, I am not sure that a super duper precedent exists, between you and me, but some have said that Planned Parenthood v. Casey, a very important case, reaffirmed Roe. But let me just ask you, am I correct that Casey reaffirmed the central holding in Roe, but substantially changed its framework?

Judge Roberts. That's what the joint opinion of the three Justices said, it was reaffirming the central holding, it revisited and altered the framework.

Senator Hatch. There were only a few votes to simply reaffirm Roe, were there not, in the Casey case?

DOJ_NMG_0035979

Judge Roberts. Well, the plurality opinion is regarded I think as the opinion of--it's the opinion of the plurality, but as the leading opinion of the Justices of the majority, it's the one that judges look to in the first instance. There were separate opinions that disagreed with some of the ways in which that plurality revisited Roe. It reaffirmed the central holding in Roe v. Wade. It dispensed with the trimester framework, and it substituted for the strict scrutiny that Roe had established the undue burden analysis that since the time of Casey has governed in this area.

Senator Hatch. As I recall it, there were only a few votes, as you have mentioned, to simply reaffirm Roe, but does this suggest that Casey itself noted the troubling features of Roe and indicated that Roe's framework has not been workable?

Judge Roberts. Well, the question of the workability of the framework is I think one of the main considerations that you look to under principles of stare decisis, along with the settled expectations, whether a precedent has been eroded. That was one of the factors that the Court looked at in Casey in determining I think to alter the framework of Roe, the trimester framework and the strict scrutiny approach, at least in the terms that were applied by the joint opinion.

Senator Hatch. Our Chairman asked if former Chief Justice Rehnquist's opinion in the Dickerson case, upholding Miranda, would apply to Roe v. Wade, and if I recall correctly, you properly declined to answer. But am I right that Chief Justice Rehnquist repeatedly believed that Roe should be overruled?

Judge Roberts. That was his view, yes.

Senator Hatch. Does that not mean that Rehnquist himself did not believe that his Dickerson holding should apply to Roe? Would that be a fair conclusion?

Judge Roberts. Based on his published opinions--now, I don't remember--well, certainly he wrote in Casey, I don't know if he's written since then, so I just hesitate to ascribe views from 1992 to current.

Senator Hatch. Let me explore this question of precedent a little bit more with you. Obviously, the Supreme Court decides cases involving a range of issues in requiring application of different kinds of law, including regulations and statutes, as well as the Constitution. All of these cases can set precedence which might be relied upon to decide future cases raising similar issues. Now, what is your understanding of the role that precedent plays in these different categories of cases? Is precedent equally authoritative in, for example, regulatory or statutory cases as in constitutional cases?

As I understand it, the Supreme Court has long said that the strength of its prior decisions is related in part to the difficulty in correcting errors. In constitutional cases there is no external way to correct an error except by constitutional amendment. The Supreme Court says, therefore, that precedent is weakest in constitutional cases.

Now, I have here a list of statements from Supreme Court decisions going back decades and decades to reflect this. In 1997 Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote for the Court in Agostini v. Felton, that you mentioned earlier, that stare decisis or precedent is not a command but a policy, and it is a policy that has--and I am quoting Justice O'Connor here--"at its weakest when we interpret the Constitution because our interpretation can be altered only by constitutional amendment or by overruling our prior decisions."

DOJ_NMG_0035980

In 1944 Justice Reed wrote for the Court in Smith v. Albright, "In constitutional questions, where correction depends upon amendment and not upon legislative action, this Court throughout its history has freely exercised its power to reexamine the basis of its constitutional decisions."

Mr. Chairman, I would like to place this list in the record if I can at this point.

Chairman Specter. Without objection, so ordered.

Senator Hatch. Now, the bottom line is that precedent is weakest in constitutional cases. Does this distinction make sense to you, Judge Roberts, and has it in fact resulted in the Supreme Court overruling its previous interpretations of the Constitution with any frequency?

Judge Roberts. The Court has frequently explained that stare decisis is strongest when you're dealing with a statutory decision. The theory is a very straightforward one that if the Court gets it wrong, Congress can fix it. And the Constitution, the Court has explained, is different. Obviously, short of amendment, only the Court can fix the constitutional precedents.

Senator Grassley. In your questionnaire to the Committee, you stated that, "Precedent plays an important role in promoting stability of the legal system." I think we would all agree. You also said that a judge operates within "a system of rules developed over the years by other judges equally strident to live up to their judicial oath." It is also true that, as Justice Frankfurter explained, "The ultimate touchstone of constitutionality is the Constitution itself, not what we have said about it. Erroneous interpretations of the Constitution can be corrected only by this Court." I suppose by constitutional amendment as well. The Court has done so many times, and most famously--you have referred to it--the Brown case, which overruled separate but equal, a precedent that stood for 58 years.

So, Judge Roberts, I would like to ask you a few questions on the issue of precedence and its value in our legal system. History has provided many examples of the dangers of Government by the judiciary, such as the Court's decision in Dred Scott. Do you share President Lincoln's concerns that I am going to quote here from his first inaugural: "If the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by the decisions of the Supreme Court the instant they are made in ordinary litigation, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers"?

Judge Roberts. Well, President Lincoln, of course, was referring to one of the--perhaps the most egregious examples of judicial activism in our history, the Dred Scott case, in which the Court went far beyond what was necessary to decide the case, and really, I think historians would say that the Supreme Court tried to put itself in the position of resolving the dispute about the extension of slavery, and resolving it in a particular way that it thought was best for the Nation. And we saw what disastrous consequences flowed from that. And Lincoln's comment about it--and he had several comments, because even when he was running for Senate, a big part of the famous debates were, well, this is what the Supreme Court has said, are you going to follow it or not? And Lincoln was a very careful lawyer in his responses. And the reason it was such a problem is because he was dealing with such an overarching Supreme Court decision. They didn't even just decide the particular case. The Court decided to take upon itself, opining more generally on how the whole issue should be resolved. And, of course, as I said, it was a disaster.

So, yes, to the extent Lincoln's criticism is how broad and overreaching the Court opinion was and that that in itself presented a very difficult problem in terms of adherence to the decision, I do agree with that.

Senator Grassley. Let me carry that one step further beyond his quote. You now as an appeals court judge obviously are bound by Supreme Court precedent. But on the Supreme Court, a Justice has much more freedom to re-evaluate prior Supreme Court decisions. I would like to explore the approach that you would take in your examination of Supreme Court precedents. Could you tell us what you believe is the appropriate judicial role describing for us the value of precedent in our legal system?

Judge Roberts. Certainly, and here, again, we're guided by the Court. It has precedent on precedents. It has cases talking about when you should revisit prior precedents and when you shouldn't. And, of course, some of the cases say you should in the particular instance and others that you shouldn't. You begin with a basic recognition of the value of precedent. No judge gets up every morning with a clean slate and says, well, what should the Constitution look like today? The approach is a more modest one. You begin with the precedents. Adherence to precedent promotes evenhandedness, promotes fairness, promotes stability and predictability. And those are very important values in a legal system. Those precedents become part of the rule of law that the judge must apply.

At the same time, as the Court pointed out in the Casey case, stare decisis is not an inexorable command. If particular precedents have proven to be unworkable, they don't lead to predictable results, they're difficult to apply, that's one factor supporting reconsideration. If the bases of the precedents have been eroded--in other words, if the Court decides a case saying because of these three precedents we reach this result, and in the intervening years two of those are overruled, that's another basis for reconsidering the precedent.

At the same time, you always have to take into account the settled expectations that have grown up around the prior precedent. It is a jolt to the legal system to overrule a precedent, and that has to be taken into account, as well as the different expectations that have grown up around it.

There are different other aspects of the rules. For example, property decisions are far less likely to be reconsidered because of the expectations that grow up around them. Statutory decisions are less likely to be reconsidered because Congress can fix it if it's a mistake.

Again, the Court's decisions in cases like Casey and Dickerson, Payne v. Tennessee, and Agostini, State Oil Company v. Khan, it's an issue that comes up on a regular basis, and the Court has developed a body of law that would guide judges and Justices when they decide whether to revisit a case.

The fundamental proposition is that it is not sufficient to view the prior case as wrongly decided. That's the opening of the process, not the end of the process. You have to decide whether it should be revisited in light of all these considerations.

Senator Grassley. Given your views on judicial restraint, can you tell us to what extent you feel obliged to uphold a decision which you found not to be based on the original intent of the Constitution? Could you explain what factors or criteria you might use to evaluate to see whether a decision deviated from original intent and whether it should be overruled?

Judge Roberts. Well, again, you would start with the precedents of the Court on that decision. In other words, if you think the decision was correctly decided or wrongly decided, that doesn't answer the question of whether or not it should be revisited. You do have to look at whether or not the decision has led to a workable rule. You have to consider whether it's created settled expectations that should not be disrupted in the interest of regularity in the legal system. You do have to look at whether or not the bases of the precedent have been eroded. Those are the main considerations that the Court has articulated in a case like Dickerson, Payne v. Tennessee, and the others. These are all the factors that the Court looks at.

Obviously, a view about the case presents the question, but the Court has emphasized it's not enough to think that the decision is wrong to take the next step to revisit it and overrule.

Senator Feinstein. All right. Let's move right along.

This morning, there was a discussion about stare decisis, and you pointed out that there were factors in consideration of stare decisis. And I think one of the things you said was workability of framework is one of the main principles you look for in stare decisis.

Well, in its decision in Casey, the Court specifically affirmed the doctrine of stare decisis as it applies to Roe. The Court reviewed prudential and pragmatic considerations to gauge the respective costs of reaffirming and overruling a case, that case. In doing so, the Court unambiguously concluded that Roe has in no sense proven unworkable.

Do you agree with this conclusion?

Judge Roberts. Well, that is--that determination in Casey becomes one of the precedents of the Court entitled to respect, like any other precedent of the Court, under principles of stare decisis. I have tried to draw the line about not agreeing or disagreeing with particular rulings, but that is a precedent of the Court. It is a precedent on precedent; in other words, it has examined Roe--

Senator Feinstein. So you agree that the Court said that, obviously.

Judge Roberts. Well, it said that, and that is a precedent entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis, like any other precedent of the Court. But in terms of a separate determination on my part whether this decision is correct or that decision is correct, my review of what other nominees have done is that that is where they draw the line and that is where I have drawn the line.

Senator Feinstein. So workability is clearly one thing. Is another one reliance?

Judge Roberts. Certainly, or as it is often expressed in the Court's opinions, settled expectations. People expect that the law is going to be what the Court has told them the law is going to be. And that's an important consideration.

Senator Feinstein. And in Casey, again, the Court stated, and I quote, "The ability of women to participate equally in the economic and social life of the Nation has been facilitated by their ability to control their reproductive lives," and that this ability to control their reproductive lives was enough of a reliance to sustain Roe, correct?

DOJ_NMG_0035983

Judge Roberts. That's what the Court--I think you're reading from the plurality, the joint opinion in the case.

Senator Feinstein. That is correct.

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Feinstein. That is correct. Now, unlike my experience, there are now entire generations of women who know a world only where their reproductive rights are protected. Do you agree with the Court that this reliance is sufficient?

Judge Roberts. Well, again, I think that's asking me whether I think the decision was correct or not on that point. It certainly was the analysis of the joint opinion in the Court, entitled to respect as precedent like any other decision of the Court under principles of stare decisis. And that would certainly be where I would begin if any of these issues come before the Court if I were to be confirmed. I would begin with the precedent that the Court has laid out in this area.

Senator Feinstein. One other questions on Casey, and I would like to quote from something that Justice Ginsburg said in the transcript in her confirmation hearing in a discussion with then-Senator Brown. "The Casey majority understood that marriage and family life is not always what we might wish them to be. There are women whose physical safety, even their lives, would be endangered if the law required them to notify their partner, and Casey, which in other respects has been greeted in some quarters with great distress, answered a significant question, one left open in Roe. Casey held a State could not require notification to the husband." Do you agree?

Judge Roberts. That is what Casey held, yes, and that, as I said before, the precedent of the Court, like any other precedent of the Court, is entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you. One other reading from Justice Ginsburg's testimony. "Abortion prohibition by the State, however, controls women and denies them full autonomy and full equality with men. That was the idea I tried to express in the lecture to which you referred. The two strands, equality and autonomy, both figure in the full portrayal." Do you agree or disagree?

Judge Roberts. Well, I think Justice--then Judge Ginsburg felt at greater liberty to discuss that precisely for the reason you noted, that she'd given a lecture on the subject. Those are issues that come up again and again before the Court. Consistent with what I understand the approach to have been of other nominees, I don't think I should express a view on that.

Senator Cornyn. Well, I know that we have heard today about a number of terms from stare decisis to pro hac vice, to pro forma, to--the only one we have not heard is res ipsa loquitur and a number of other Latin phrases that we learned in law school.

Let me ask you about stare decisis. I have heard fascinating discussion back and forth about precedent and how you would deal with a case, let's say for example, Roe v. Wade, and some have suggested, law professors and maybe others, that somehow that is a super precedent, or in the words of our inimitable Chairman, a super duper precedent. I think we are introducing new words to the legal lexicon as this hearing goes on. But in all seriousness, if--well, let me ask you this. Is stare decisis a insurmountable obstacle to revisiting a decision based on an interpretation of the Constitution?

Judge Roberts. What the Supreme Court has said, in the Casey decision, for example, is that it is not an inexorable command. In other words, it's not an absolute rule, and that's why they have these various cases that explain the circumstances under which you should revisit a prior precedent that you think may be flawed and when you shouldn't, and--

Senator Cornyn. I can--excuse me. I did not mean to interrupt you.

Judge Roberts. I was just going to say there are significant cases in the Court's history, in the Nation's history, where the Court has revisited precedents like Brown v. Board of Education, like the cases that overruled the decisions of the Lochner era.

Senator Cornyn. You started to make the point I was going to try to make next, and that is, stare decisis did not prevent the United States Supreme Court from revisiting Plessy v. Ferguson, which established the separate but equal doctrine, or otherwise, Brown v. Board of Education would never be the law of the land. Stare decisis did not prevent the Supreme Court from overruling Bowers v. Hardwick and Lawrence v. Texas or Stanford v. Kentucky in this recent term of the Court, where they said the death penalty for 17-year-old murderers was unconstitutional in Roper v. Simmons.

So would you agree with me, Judge, that this is a neutral principle? In other words, it is not a result-oriented principle, if there is such a thing, and you have pledged to apply neutral principles, not result-oriented processes in arriving at your decisions if confirmed.

Judge Roberts. That's right. It is a neutral principle. The factors that the Court looks at in deciding whether to overrule prior precedent or not do not depend upon what the decision is or what area it's in, other than some areas, things we've talked about, for example, a statutory decision is much more likely to be overturned than a constitutional decision just because Congress can address those issues themselves.

But the principles of stare decisis are neutral and should be applied in a neutral way to cases without regard to the substance of the decisions being considered.

Senator Cornyn. When you said this morning in response to questions about Roe v. Wade that it is settled as a precedent of the Court, entitled to respect under principles of stare decisis, you were saying that--just that. In other words, that it is a precedent of the Court. There has to be a strong case made for why that issue should be revisited, if at all, but you were not making any commitment one way or another about the outcome of any challenge brought under that or any other legal doctrine, were you?

Judge Roberts. No, Senator, and I've tried as scrupulously as possible today to avoid making any commitments about cases that might come before the Court.

Senator Feinstein. Let me take you to yesterday morning and stare decisis, because you specifically discussed, when you were asked about Roe and Casey, precedent, specifically, as we said, workability, reliance, pragmatic considerations, changed facts or circumstances, and whether the underlying legal or constitutional doctrine would still be valid. Are there any other factors that you think should be considered?

DOJ_NMG_0035985

Judge Roberts. Well, the Court has been somewhat inconsistent on some other factors. They, for example, talk about in some cases the length of a precedent, the idea that the longer it's been on the books, the more people have conformed their conduct to it. In other cases, they've suggested that's not such an important consideration. In Payne v. Tennessee, the case that it noted how closely divided the Court was in the prior case as a factor, but in other cases the Court has said that's not a major consideration.

So I put those factors on the table simply because in some cases, the Court looks to them. In others, it doesn't. But I think the ones I mentioned yesterday are ones that apply in every case, including the settled expectations, the workability, whether the doctrinal basis of a decision had been eroded.

Senator Feinstein. Yesterday, in answering Senator Specter on this very point, when you referred to Payne v. Tennessee, you did point out there were other considerations that come into play and they are laid out again in Dickerson and in other cases, Payne v. Tennessee, Agostini, and a variety of decisions where the Court has explained when it will revisit a precedent and when it will not.

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Senator Feinstein. What do you think when it should and should not?

Judge Roberts. Well, I do think you do have to look at those criteria, and the ones that I pull from those various cases are, first of all, the basic principle that it's not enough that you think the decision was wrongly decided. That's not enough to justify revisiting it. Otherwise, there'd be no role for precedent, no role for stare decisis.

Second of all, one basis for reconsidering it is the issue of workability. If a precedent has turned out not to provide workable rules, if courts get different results in similar cases because they--

Senator Feinstein. Or if another case like Casey finds that Roe is workable--

Judge Roberts. Well, again, that's a different--that is a precedent of its own--

Senator Feinstein. Right.

Judge Roberts. --that obviously would be looked at under principles of stare decisis.

The issue of the erosion of precedent, if you have a decision that's based on three different cases and two of them have been overruled, maybe that's a basis that justifies revisiting the prior precedent.

The issue of settled expectations, the Court has explained you look at the extent to which people have conformed their conduct to the rule and have developed settled expectations in connection with it.

Perhaps the discussion earlier we had about the Dickerson case is as good example of that, where the Chief Justice just thought Miranda was wrongly decided, but explained that it had become part of the established rules of police conduct and he was going to respect those expectations.

Senator Sessions. . . . One more thing I would just like to inquire about, and that deals with stare decisis, the deference you give to a prior decision of the Supreme Court. And you mentioned a number of factors, and I recognize those as valid and worthy of great consideration. But it almost strikes me that it is a bit circular. In other words, the Court is creating a wall around its opinions to try to avoid seeing them overruled. Isn't it true that your first oath is to enforce the Constitution, as God gives you the ability to understand it, and that sometimes decisions have to be reversed if they are contrary to a fair and just reading of the Constitution?

Judge Roberts. Yes, Senator. The oath we take is to uphold the Constitution and laws of the United States. That's true. And the way judges go about that is within a system of precedent and, consistent with rules of stare decisis, no judge starts the day by opening a blank slate and saying what should the Constitution mean today? We operate within those systems of precedence. That's the best way that judges have determined to interpret the Constitution and laws, consistent with principles of stare decisis.

Senator Brownback. [discussing Glucksberg] And you have--that would be subject to, in your opinion, the continued status of stare decisis as an opinion of the Court, and the deference and the dependency that the society has had on that ruling, would have the same status as any opinion of the us Supreme Court on the basis of stare decisis in your opinion?

Judge Roberts. It would be subject to the same analysis as any other precedent of the Court, yes.

Senator Brownback. Regardless whether it is a recent opinion, later opinion, this has the same standing because it is an opinion of the Court's?

Judge Roberts. Some of the Court's cases talk about how long an opinion has been standing. Some of the Court's cases say that is less of a factor, but it is a decision of the Court, a precedent on that issue. Any question of revisiting it would have to be consistent with the principles of stare decisis, and we have talked about those principles and how they apply.

Senator Brownback. Yes. I wanted to make clear that it doesn't matter the length of time the opinion has set, the number of times it has been revisited, stare decisis is a basic principle that applies to any opinion previously held by the Court.

Judge Roberts. Yes.

Takings Clause

Senator Brownback. . . . I want to take you first to the Takings Clause issue. There was a recent case that came up that really shocked the system, and you talked about shocks to the system when the judiciary acts. This is one that did it in the Kelo v. New London case. In perhaps no other area of the law is stability more important than in the area of private property and property rights. Even before the existence of the United States, William Blackstone, that famous English legal authority, stated this. He stated, "The law of the land postpones even public necessity to the sacred and inviolable rights of private property."

Mindful of the sentiment and the excesses of the King, yet aware of the needs of a new and growing country, the Framers of our Constitution established a strict limitation on the Government's ability to take private property. The Takings Clause of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution provides that private property may not "be taken for public use, without just compensation." We all know those famous words.

Traditionally, this has meant that the Government had to pay fair value when it sought to confiscate a homeowner's property in order to build a road or other public good. But now the notion of public use has taken on a different hue to it. In this Kelo v. the City of New London case, the Supreme Court had decided whether a private economic development plan, which the city government believed with yield greater economic benefits, qualified as a public use. So you had private property taken by the State and given back to private individuals, but it was having a greater economic use, and whether that was sufficient under the Takings Clause.

In the words of the Court, this economic development plan "was projected, not resulted, but projected to create in excess of a thousand jobs to increase taxes and other revenues." On this basis, the Court upheld the Government confiscation as a public use, and there was an out-roar across the country. We thought that property rights, private property rights, were established and set. And now it appears as if it is not, that the system is different. You can take private property by the Government's eminent domain ability and give it back to a private individual.

Justice O'Connor in her eloquent dissent quotes this: "Nothing is to prevent the State now from replacing any Motel 6 with a Ritz Carlton, any home with a shopping mall, or any farm with a factory."

It is remarkable how this issue has stirred, as I mentioned, great criticism. I am pleased the Chairman is going to hold a hearing on it this next week. Judge Roberts, what is your understanding of the state of the Takings Clause jurisprudence now after Kelo? Isn't it now the case that it is much easier for one man's home to become another man's castle?

Judge Roberts. Well, under the Kelo decision, which, as you explained, was interpreting the public use requirement in the Constitution, the majority--and, of course, as you mentioned, it was a closely divided case. The majority explained its reasoning by noting the difficulty in drawing the line. Everybody would agree, as you suggest, to build a road or to build a railroad, to situate a military base, if that is the only suitable place, that the power of eminent domain is appropriate in those instances. And I think people agree further that when you're talking about a hospital or something like that, that satisfies public use. And I think the reason the Court gave, really, in the majority opinion was that it's kind of hard to draw the line.

The dissent, Justice O'Connor's dissent, didn't think it was that hard. She focused on the question of whether it was going to be a use open to the public as, you know, a road, a hospital, use for the public like in a military base, or private. And she would have drawn the line there and said even public benefits that derive from different private uses don't justify that aspect of it.

There was a caveat in the Kelo majority. They said they were only deciding this in the context of an urban redevelopment plan. They reserved the question--if it's just taking one parcel and giving it to everybody else, not part of a broader plan, that question was still open. And as you say, there's been a lot of reaction to it. I understand some States have even legislated restricting their power.

Senator Brownback. And we are considering it here in the Congress.

Judge Roberts. And I think that's a very appropriate approach to consider. In other words, the Court was not saying you have to have this power, you have to exercise this power. What the Court was saying is there is this power, and then it's up to the legislature to determine whether it wants that to be available, whether it wants it to be available in limited circumstances, or whether it wants to go back to an understanding as reflected in the dissent, that this is not an appropriate public use.

That leaves the ball in the court of the legislature, and I think it's reflective of what is often the case and people sometimes lose sight of, that this body and legislative bodies in the States are protectors of the people's rights as well. It's not simply a question of legislating to address particular needs, but you obviously have to also be cognizant of the people's rights and you can protect them in situations where the Court has determined, as it did 5-4 in Kelo, that they are not going to draw that line. You still have the authority to draw--

Senator Brownback. I understand the authority we maintain. What I'm curious about is your view is does that right exist. I would not think Blackstone would agree that that right exists for the public to take private property for private use.

Judge Roberts. Well, you know, the first year in law school we all read the decision in Calder v. Bull, which has the famous statement that the Government may not take the property of A and give it to B. And that certainly was quoted in the dissent, in Justice O'Connor's dissent. The Kelo majority, though, said if a legislature wants to exercise that power, basically that the Court's not going to second-guess the judgment that this is a public use. And I do think that imposes a heavy responsibility on the legislature to determine what they're doing and whether it is a public use or if it's simply transferring from one private party to the next. But--

Senator Brownback. I take it you are not going to respond whether or not that right exists under the Constitution.

Judge Roberts. Well, the Kelo decision obviously was just decided last year, and I don't think I should comment whether it was correct or not. It stands as a precedent of the Court. It did leave open the question of whether it applied in the situation that was not a broader redevelopment plan. And if the issue does come back before the Court, I need to be able to address it without having previously commented on it.

DOJ_NMG_0035989

Senator Kohl. All right. Judge Roberts, when we met a few weeks ago in my office, we discussed the Supreme Court's recent property rights decision. In that case, Kelo v. the City of New London, the Court found it permissible under the Constitution for a city to seize private homes against the wishes of their owners so that a large pharmaceutical company could build a private industrial park and a research facility. A total of 15 homes were condemned, including a home lived in by an 87-year-old woman for her entire life, a home that her family had owned for over 100 years. Many people, including a majority I believe of people in my State, as well as myself, were quite disturbed by this ruling which appears to place much private property at risk by greatly expanding the eminent domain powers in local government.

We discussed this when you were in my office, and you told me that you were "surprised by the decision." So could you expand on it a bit this afternoon and explain why you were surprised?

Judge Roberts. Well, I did tell you that was my initial reaction. I remember hearing about the decision driving actually back from a Judicial Conference with another judge, and we all learn in law school, one of the first cases you study is called Calder v. Bull, has a basic proposition the Government cannot take property from A and give it to B. When I read the decision, I understood what the majority's position was, the difficulty of drawing a line between things that are obviously public use like a railroad, a road, things that are traditionally the subject of the exercise of eminent domain, and other activities that are not as clearly within that range of course.

Justice O'Connor, I her dissent, thought that a line could be drawn between whether it was available to the public or not, and that certainly was available. The majority did say that it was not ruling on the starkest example, in other words, just determining to take the property from A to B because you think B could make better use of it. The issue arose, as you noted in your question, in the context of an urban renewal redevelopment project, and that may be limited to that context or may not.

I do know there's been extensive legislative reaction to the decision. I know a number of States have passed laws already, saying, "We do not authorize the use of the power of eminent domain to take--for a use that's going to be from one private owner to another," and that's certainly an appropriate reaction to the Court's decision in this area.

What the Court is saying, what the majority is saying is because of the difficulty of drawing a line, this issue is really left up to the legislature, and if the legislature wants to draw the line in a particular place, it has that authority. But it certainly is a decision that was closely divided, 5-4, and it has gotten a lot of legislative reaction.

The point I would only make is that it's perhaps a good example of the fact that legislatures, legislators have a responsibility to protect the rights of the people just as much as courts, and one way they can protect the rights of the people in this area, if they think it appropriate, is to restrict themselves in saying, "We will not use the eminent domain power to the broadest extent that the Supreme Court has said we are authorized to do."

Senator Kohl. Did I understand from your opinion on whether or not that case was correctly decided, or are you not--

DOJ_NMG_0035990

Judge Roberts. No. Again, that's--particularly since it's an area they do specifically leave open the question about whether it applies outside of a redevelopment project. That's an issue that could come before the Court. It's not one I feel appropriate to comment on.

Senator Kohl. It would or it would not surprise you if we had not heard the last of that?

Judge Roberts. It's certainly one of those areas that could come before the Court again, even in its present form. I know the author of the majority opinion has said it was an area where he, as a personal policy matter, wouldn't have exercised that authority, but, of course, the issue there was the legal issue, not policy preferences. It could come before the Court again, yes.

Senator Graham. [comment, not question] The Kelo case. Of all the things that have been decided--and I haven't been to my office since the recent case about the Pledge, so it may have trumped it--I have gotten more phone calls about the Kelo case than anything the Supreme Court has done lately. And for those who may be tuning in, the Kelo case basically said that the Government can take your property, give it to someone else, another private person, because it could be used at a higher and best use and it might generate more taxes.

I am not going to ask you to tell me how you will decide the Kelo case, but I just want you to know--as Senator Kyl indicated, this is the only time you can hear from us--that my phone is ringing off the hook and that every legislature that I know of is going into session as quickly as they can to correct that. So I want to leave with you--and when you meet your new colleagues, please let them know that some of the things they do, that we watch, and that the courts are able to do their job because the public defers to the Court and respects the Court. But there is a limit.

NOMINATION OF BRETT KAVANAUGH, OF MARYLAND,

TO BE CIRCUIT JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT

TUESDAY, MAY 9, 2006

United States Senate,

Committee on the Judiciary,

Washington, D.C.

The Committee met, pursuant to notice, at 2:01 p.m., in Room 226, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Hon. Arlen Specter, Chairman of the Committee, presiding.

Present: Senators Specter, Hatch, Kyl, Sessions, Graham, Cornyn, Brownback, Coburn, Leahy, Kennedy, Feinstein, Feingold, Schumer, and Durbin.

OPENING STATEMENT OF HON. ARLEN SPECTER, A U.S. SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA

Chairman Specter. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. It is two o'clock and the Judiciary Committee will proceed with the nomination of Brett Kavanaugh to be a judge for the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

At the outset, we welcome Judge Walter Stapleton, Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, and Judge Alex Kozinski, Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. We appreciate your coming in today.

Mr. Kavanaugh is in an unusual circumstance of not having Senators to introduce him. He is a D.C.-Marylander, and as of this moment the Senators from his home State of Maryland are not available to make the introductions, and the Committee has asked Judge Stapleton and Judge Kozinski to do that since they have special knowledge of the nominee because he clerked for them. They have special insights into his background.

Just a few words by way of introduction. Mr. Kavanaugh will take the witness stand and will be sworn, and will speak for himself, but I think it appropriate to make a few comments about his record and about my analysis of these proceedings.

I have been surprised to see Mr. Kavanaugh characterized as not up to the job of judge for the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. I have taken a look at his record in some detail, and I had a long session with Mr. Kavanaugh, and have asked him all of the questions which have been posed on his nomination. The issue of the NSA surveillance program, a program that I have raised serious questions about, asked him about what if anything he had to do with it, and he will speak for himself in responding to that.

I asked him about the issue of allegations of mistreatment of people on interrogation on the overlay of torture or rendition, and again, he will have an opportunity to speak for himself on that subject.

At our Executive Committee session last week, the question was raised about Mr. Abramoff. He will have an opportunity to speak for himself about that question.

In reviewing his record, I note that he was Yale College for his bachelor's degree, cum laude, and he was Yale Law School, where he was on the Yale Law Journal. Now, that takes some substantial academic qualification, something I know about, because I was there. And the only difference between Mr. Kavanaugh's tenure on the Yale Law Journal and being a high academic graduate from Yale Law School from my record is that when he was there, the competition was tougher. He is slightly younger than I am, and as the years have passed, Yale Law School has been more difficult to attain academic achievement, but that is something I know of firsthand.

Then his record beyond law school was to clerk for Judge Stapleton, to clerk for Judge Kozinski, and they will speak for themselves.

Then he was in the Office of Solicitor General, where he argued one case before the Supreme Court of the United States, and if he were on the Judiciary Committee, it would put him in second place, not too bad a place to be on the Judiciary Committee on Supreme Court arguments. Then he has had a number of arguments on the Court of Appeals and a number of arguments before District Court on legal issues.

Then he served in the Office of Independent Counsel, and that was a highly controversial office, beyond any question. And Mr. Kavanaugh will describe his activities there, but he was not counsel, he was not deputy counsel. He was one of a tier below, where there were 10 associate or assistant counsels there. I know he will be asked about what his participation was there, and we will here from Mr. Kavanaugh himself of that.

He has written two distinguished legal pieces published in the journals, one on the Independent Counsel and suggesting changes, hardly the mark of an ideologue who works as Independent Counsel that has tunnel vision as to what they did, but has expressed ways to improve the operation of Independent Counsel, by showing an open mind and showing some progressive thinking as to utilizing his experience.

Then he wrote an article on the issue of peremptory challenges for African Americans and has a--very difficult to use the words "liberal" or "conservative" or "progressive" around here--but he is on the right side of that issue, an issue that I understand well. When I became District Attorney of Philadelphia, I did not need to have the Federal Courts tell me not to have peremptory challenge for blacks. I issued an instruction to my assistants that they could not ask for it, and finally the courts caught up with it. And Mr. Kavanaugh will speak to his views on that subject, but hardly the views of a cramped conservative, but he will describe his views on all of these matters.

Then he went to Kirkland and Ellis, which is a very distinguished law firm. I do not how many people from the Judiciary Committee could be employed by Kirkland and Ellis today, let alone out of law school. Tough row to hoe. And he was taken in as a partner, not an equity partner--it is all complicated now with law firms--a non-equity partner, but that is an unusual call for a firm like Kirkland and Ellis or for any big firm of their nature because of how they evaluated his background and his experience.

He has been Associate Counsel to the President, and now he is Staff Secretary to the President. And if he reflects the views consistent with the President, that is entirely consistent with having the President nominate judges. That is our system. That is decided by an election. But he will speak for himself as to where he stands in the spectrum as to being in the mainstream.

Just a word about the American Bar Association rating. Early he was rated well qualified in the majority, and qualified with the minority camp. And then they reevaluated him two years later, and they took some additional interviews, and not surprisingly, the interviews varied. And now he has been rated in the majority, qualified and the minority, well qualified. So you have him moving from well qualified to qualified, qualified to well qualified, and not a tinker's bit of difference really in terms of our evaluation, because at minimal he is qualified, and a great many people think he is unqualified.

Senator Schumer.

OPENING STATE OF HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER, A U.S. SENATOR

FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Senator Schumer. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First let me thank you for holding this hearing, which many of us had requested, and we very much appreciate it.

And second, I want to thank Mr. Kavanaugh for being back here. When we had our private meeting I asked him if he had any objections to come back to, what you good-naturedly referred to as the arena at our last hearing, and you said no, and very much appreciate that. I realize while this is not always the most pleasant exercise for a nominee, I think we can all agree it is a very important one, because we are talking about nothing less momentous than a lifetime appointment to what is generally regarded as the second-most important court in the land, a court of great importance to those of us who sit in the Senate or the House, because it has such jurisdiction over governmental issues, and years after this nomination, this court is going to influence a great deal what this Congress and future Congresses have done.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you know how many of us have deep concerns about this nominee. Just yesterday they were given further voice in the form of the American Bar Association's follow-up report, which was made public yesterday, which explained why six members of the ABA Committee felt compelled to downgrade their rating.

My concerns are twofold. First, although Mr. Kavanaugh has held several important and influential positions in Government, they have been almost exclusively political. There is no doubt that, Mr. Kavanaugh, you are a highly successful young attorney and your academic credentials, as certainly outlined by the Chairman, are top notch. But your experience has been most notable, not so much for your blue chip credentials, but for the undeniably political nature of so many of your assignments. For much of your career your considerable talents have been enlisted in partisan and polarizing issues. In short, you have been the "go to" guy among young Republican lawyers appearing at the epicenter of so many high-profile controversial issues in your short career, and it is only natural that such a record would give many Senators pause, particularly those of us on this side of the aisle.

From the notorious Starr report, to the Florida recount, to the President's secrecy and privilege claims to post-9/11 legislative battles including the Victims Compensation Fund, to ideological judicial nomination fights, if there has been a partisan political fight that needed a very bright legal foot soldier in the last decade, Brett Kavanaugh was probably there. That kind of record is not dispositive, to be sure, but it feeds an impression of partisanship that is, to put it mildly, not ideal for a nominee to a critically important lifetime post as a neutral judge.

Now, for those who question the good faith of these concerns, who suggest that some of us are reflexively or unalterably opposed to any Republican involved in the impeachment of President Clinton or other political causes, let me mention two names, Tom Griffith and Paul McNulty. Mr. Griffith, whom I voted to confirm to a seat on the very court to which Mr. Kavanaugh aspires, was Senate legal counsel during impeachment; and Paul McNulty, who I voted to confirm--many of us, I think all of us--voted to confirm to be the number two official at the Department of Justice, was Chief Counsel and spokesman for the House Judiciary Committee Republicans during impeachment.

Despite their blue-chip Republican credentials and participation in hot-button political issues, I was convinced that both of these men had substantial experience in professional and nonpartisan work, so that any concerns about inexperience, cronyism, and partisanship was, for me at least--and I think for most of us on this side of the aisle--laid to rest.

So, Mr. Chairman, we are all operating in good faith here, and we have demonstrated ourselves to be open-minded on the President's nominees to top judicial and executive posts. At last count, we have confirmed 240 of President Bush's nominees, and Democrats have voted for the vast majority of them.

Then there is a second and related concern. Although Mr. Kavanaugh is extremely well credentialed, he is younger than and has had less relevant experience than almost everyone who has joined the D.C. Circuit in modern times. We would have fewer concerns if the President had nominated a mainstream conservative with a record of independence from partisan politics, who has demonstrated a history of nonpartisan service with a proven record of commitment to the rule of law, and who we could reasonably trust will serve justice, not political patrons or ideology if confirmed to this powerful lifetime post. Both Stephen Breyer and Ruth Bader Ginsberg, whose biographies are often cited at these proceedings, had substantial nonpolitical experience before they were nominated to appellate courts. Mr. Kavanaugh, if confirmed, I believe would be the youngest person on the D.C. Circuit since his mentor, Ken Starr. And if you go through the preconfirmation accomplishments of the active judges who currently sit on the D.C. Circuit, Mr. Kavanaugh's achievements, though impressive, are not on the same scale.

Judge Sentelle, for example, had extensive practice as a prosecutor and trial lawyer, and experience as a State judge and as a Federal district court judge. Judge Randolph spent 22 years with Federal and State Attorneys General offices, including service as Deputy Solicitor General of the United States and a law firm partnership. Judge Rogers had 30 years of service in both Federal and State Governments, including a stint as the Corporation Counsel for the District of Columbia, and several years on D.C.'s equivalent of a State supreme court.

Like Mr. Kavanaugh, many of the 9 active judges on this court held prestigious clerkships, including clerkships on the Supreme Court and involvement at the high levels of Government, that no doubt involved some partisan work. But they all had significant additional experience, nonpartisan experience, to help persuade this Committee that they merited confirmation.

Now, of course, these concerns are echoed in a new report from the American Bar Association. They cannot be dismissed, as some of my colleagues suggest, as merely intemperate rants by Democrats on the Committee, and predictably, of course, some are already launching a campaign to denigrate the ABA, despite boasting of Mr. Kavanaugh's original rating two years ago, and attack the character of one of the ABA Committee members, and I hope we would refrain from doing that.

According to the ABA report released yesterday, one judge who saw your oral presentation in court, Mr. Kavanaugh, said, "You were less than adequate," that you had been sanctimonious, and that you had demonstrated experience on the level of an associate. A lawyer in a different proceeding had this to say: "Mr. Kavanaugh did not handle the case well as an advocate and dissembled." That is a pretty serious statement. According to the report, other lawyers--and note the plural--expressed similar concerns, repeating in substance that the nominee was young and inexperienced in the practice of law. Still others--again note the plural--characterized Mr. Kavanaugh as, "insulated," and one in particular questioned Mr. Kavanaugh's ability "to be balanced and fair should he assume a Federal judgeship." And yet another individual said this. He said that Mr. Kavanaugh is "immovable and very stubborn and frustrating to deal with on some issues."

These new concerns, apparently based on some 36 additional interviews, were so serious that six members of the ABA Committee changed their vote. On the phone call yesterday I asked Mr. Tober, the head of the Committee, was it rare for people to change their vote? And he said no. And I said, was it usual? And he said no. So it happens, but it does not happen all that often.

We have other reasons for concern. I must say that I was disturbed by some of the answers I got from you, Mr. Kavanaugh, the first time around. On the issue of the role of ideology and judicial philosophy in the picking of judges by this administration, for example, you repeatedly insisted, totally implausibly, that such considerations played no role. That was simply not believable, and, frankly, put your credibility at issue. You began to clarify your statements in our meeting last week--and I hope we can have further dialogue--but to say that an ideology had no effect, well, show me some nominees to high offices, high judicial offices who were Democrats, who were moderates, who were maybe strongly pro-choice--

Chairman Specter. Senator Schumer, you are past 10 minutes. How much longer will you be?

Senator Schumer. I just have another minute and a half, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

It was not believable, that is the bottom line. And in addition, Senators will want to ask you, among other things, about your role in setting of policy relating to executive power and the separation of powers. You admitted to me, for example, that in your job as Staff Secretary, you had input on the controversial issue of presidential signing statements. There will be questions about that. I expect you will also get questions about your involvement, if any, in this administration's detention policies, torture policies and rendition policies. These issues, among many others, deserve further scrutiny, and given the scant record we have, I hope no one will question the good faith we have in asking them.

So, Mr. Chairman, I would say that many of my colleagues and I have a sincere and good faith concern about this nominee. We feel that the nominee is not apolitical enough, not seasoned enough, not independent enough, and has not been forthcoming enough. Maybe this hearing will remove those concerns, but it is certainly necessary.

Last week, Mr. Kavanaugh, I asked you to think of ways to alleviate these concerns, and I look forward to hearing your testimony.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Schumer.

Senator Schumer. I just want to say Ranking Member Leahy could not be here at the beginning of this hearing, but will be here in about an hour.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Schumer.

One addendum to my comments. Mr. Kavanaugh also clerked for Supreme Court Justice Anthony Kennedy.

Judge Stapleton and Judge Kozinski, it is our practice to ask our witnesses to be sworn at nomination proceedings, as we had a number of circuit judges sworn during the confirmation of Justice Alito. So with your consent, would you rise and take the oath?

Do you solemnly swear that the testimony you will give before the Judiciary Committee will be the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Judge Stapleton. I do.

Judge Kozinski. I do.

Chairman Specter. Let the record show both witnesses answered in the affirmative.

Judge Stapleton, you are the first circuit judge for whom Mr. Kavanaugh clerked, so we will begin with you.

PRESENTATION OF BRETT KAVANAUGH, NOMINEE TO BE CIRCUIT JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT, BY HON. WALTER K. STAPLETON, JUDGE, UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE THIRD CIRCUIT, WILMINGTON, DELAWARE

Judge Stapleton. Thank you. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I appreciate the invitation to introduce Brett Kavanaugh. That is not because I think he needs any introduction to this Committee, but rather because I believe I am in a position to share information that is quite probative with respect to the important issue that is before you.

I have been a Federal judge for over 35 years, the last 20 of those years as a member of the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, and based on that experience, I believe I understand well what it takes to be able to serve well as a United States Circuit Judge.

I have known Mr. Kavanaugh well for over 15 years. I first met him in March of 1989 when I interviewed him for a clerkship. He had one of the most impressive resumes I have ever seen, and believe me, I have seen a lot of resumes. Among other things, as you noted, Mr. Chairman, he was editor of the Yale Law Journal, and at the point in time I met him, he had received an honors grade in every course he had taken at Yale Law School save one. Best of all, the professors who knew him well, assured me that--and I quote--"His work is uniformly of very high quality, thoughtful, independent-minded, yet very balanced, and always clearly written."

I have recently resurrected the notes I made after our lengthy personal interview, and they say, "extremely talented, mature, confident yet modest, good sense of humor." Now, in other words, a judge's dream of a law clerk, and I didn't have to ponder the decision about hiring him for very long. And he certainly did not disappoint, and I will always treasure the time that we shared.

We worked very hard and we were asked to resolve many intractable controversies. Facing challenges like that together promotes a bonding process in which the participants get to know each other awfully well, and we talked at length, not only about the law, and about the challenges we faced, but about his hopes and aspirations for the future.

Towards the end of the clerkship I urged him to consider the judiciary as a career if he should ever have that opportunity, and I did that because I believed he had the makings of my kind of judge. There was no trace of arrogance and no agenda. He applied his legal acuity and common sense judgment with equal diligence to every case, large or small, undertaking his evaluation of each without predilection. His ultimate recommendations were based on careful case-by-case analyses of the facts of each case, and objective application of the relevant precedents. It was clear to me that he understood the crucial role of precedent in a society that's committed to the rule of law.

Brett thanked me for my advice, but in characteristically modest fashion, said he doubted that he would get the opportunity to so serve.

Now, Mr. Kavanaugh, of course, has had a variety of opportunities since that time, as I knew he would. Anyone with his talents would have many opportunities. As a result, in addition to his impressive legal skills, I believe Mr. Kavanaugh has the sophistication, the insight and maturity that comes from having served in a variety of professional positions, noteworthy not only because of their variety but also because of the awesome responsibilities that each carried.

While I believe all of his professional experience would serve him well as a judge, a substantial portion of that experience renders Mr. Kavanaugh, I believe, exceptionally well qualified in terms of experience. I refer, of course, to the fact that in addition to his exposure to private practice and his service to the President, Mr. Kavanaugh has had substantial litigation experience on both sides of the bench. As you're aware, and as the Chairman has mentioned, he's worked with a one-and-one relationship not only with the two Court of Appeals Judges that are here this afternoon, but also with a Justice of the United States of the Supreme Court and a Solicitor General of the United States. As you are also aware, Mr. Kavanaugh's litigation experience has included appearance before all levels of our Federal courts.

Now, I have stayed in touch with Mr. Kavanaugh, and have followed his career with interest since he left my chambers. I have heard nothing from, and I've heard nothing about Mr. Kavanaugh in the intervening years that has caused me to question in any way my original judgment about the kind of judge he would be if he could have that opportunity. His responsibilities, it's true, from time to time, have called upon him to make--to take positions on issues which reasonable minds could differ about. That's part of being a lawyer. But I believe he has consistently served his client well, and in a thoroughly professional manner.

In sum, members of the Committee, I believe Mr. Kavanaugh's intelligence, his common sense judgment, his temperament, and his dedication to the rule of law, make him a superb candidate for the position of United States Circuit Judge, and I can commend him to you without reservation.

Thank you for this opportunity to address the Committee.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Judge Stapleton.

Judge Kozinski.

PRESENTATION OF BRETT KAVANAUGH, NOMINEE TO BE CIRCUIT JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT, BY HON. ALEX KOZINSKI, JUDGE, UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT, PASADENA, CALIFORNIA

Judge Kozinski. Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman, members of the Committee. It's a great pleasure and honor for me to be back. Thank you for inviting me to introduce my good friend, my former law clerk, Brett Kavanaugh.

I probably do not need to take my full 5 minutes, because I can just say "me too" to everything that Judge Stapleton said, but let me just take a few minutes, a couple minutes, if I can, to give my own personal view.

I'm glad, Mr. Chairman, that you mentioned that Brett Kavanaugh went to Yale and you and he had that in common. We have that in common too. He went to Yale and I have a son named Yale.

[Laughter.]

Judge Kozinski. I tried to get in, but I wasn't as fortunate. I got rejected.

But I have had a number of clerks from Yale and Harvard and many other fine law schools, and among them, Brett Kavanaugh was one of the finest. I met him about the same time that Judge Stapleton met him, in March '89. We both interviewed him for a job for clerkship right out of law school, but Judge Stapleton was just faster making an offer. So I had to pick him up the following year, because he accepted a clerkship with Judge Stapleton first.

I must tell you that in the time that I had Brett clerk for me, I found him to be a positive delight to have in the office. He's really bright and he's really accomplished and he's really an excellent lawyer. But most, virtually all, folks who qualify for a clerkship with a circuit judge these days have those qualities.

But Brett brought something more to the table. He first of all brought what I thought was a breadth of mind and a breadth of vision. He didn't look at a case from just one perspective. Like a good lawyer, like--Mr. Chairman, you were a prosecutor, you know this very well--you have to look at a case from different perspectives, not just one, and not early in the case take one perspective and then stick with it. Brett was very good in changing perspectives. Sometimes I'd take one position and he'd take the opposite, and sometimes we'd switch places. He was very good and very flexible that way.

I never sensed any ideology or any agenda. His job was to serve me and to serve the court and serve the people of the United States in achieving the correct result at the court. And he always did it with a sense of humor and a sense of sort of gentle self-deprecation. He was always--my staff, my secretaries, his co-clerks all enjoyed having him and all enjoyed particularly the fact that he was not in any way pompous or in any way stuck on himself, but was always ready to help others or was ready to be friendly with others.

And I think that's a very important quality in a judge. This may seem trivial and maybe seem like I'm mentioning things here that ought not to be mentioned in a committee, but part of what makes the job of judging different from other jobs is that it is not a mechanical process. It is ultimately a human process. You have to understand something about how people think, something about how people live, something about how people feel. And what I think Brett Kavanaugh brings to the table, what he brought to the table when he was my law clerk, is a sense of humanity and a sense of understanding.

I will not speak to the question of confirmation or nonconfirmation. This obviously is something that is up to the committee. I can only say that I give Brett Kavanaugh my highest recommendation. I gave him my high recommendation when he applied to Justice Kennedy, my own mentor, and I continue to give him the highest recommendations.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Judge Kozinski.

I have just one question for each of you. Judge Kozinski, how old were you when you were appointed to the Ninth Circuit?

Judge Kozinski. I was 35 years old, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Judge Stapleton, how old were you when you were appointed to the Federal bench, first to the district court?

Judge Stapleton. Thirty-five years old.

Chairman Specter. And may the record show that Justice Kennedy was appointed to the Ninth Circuit when he was 38 years old.

Anybody have any questions for the judges? Senator Schumer?

Senator Schumer. Just one question for both. Since Mr. Kavanaugh clerked for each of you right after, a year after law school, have either of you had occasion to have him appear before you in your court as a lawyer.

Judge Stapleton. I have not.

Judge Kozinski. Nor have I.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Judge Stapleton. Thank you very much, Judge Kozinski. Appreciate your being here.

Judge Kozinski. My pleasure.

Judge Stapleton. Thank you.

Chairman Specter. Mr. Kavanaugh, would you step forward for the oath?

If you would raise your right hand. Do you swear that the testimony you will give before the Judiciary Committee will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I do.

Chairman Specter. Before beginning your testimony, Mr. Kavanaugh, I note an infant in the audience and what appears to be a mother, and both appear to be wife and child, and perhaps other family. Would you introduce them, please?

STATEMENT OF BRETT KAVANAUGH, NOMINEE TO BE

CIRCUIT JUDGE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity to appear here before the Committee. I'm grateful to the President for nominating me to this important--

Chairman Specter. Mr. Kavanaugh, there is a question pending, and the question was would you introduce your family.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Kavanaugh. And I thank my family for being here. Since I last appeared before the Committee, there have been two major changes in my record, and they're both sitting behind me. My wife, Ashley Estes Kavanaugh, and my 8-month-old daughter, Margaret Murphy Kavanaugh. She's watched a little C-SPAN in her day. This is her first live Senate hearing, however. I'm not sure--as you've probably already noticed, Mr. Chairman, I'm not sure she's going to make it very long, but she wanted to be here for the start.

My uncle, Mark Murphy, is here. And my brother-in-law, J.D. Estes, is here. My mom and dad are here, Martha and Ed Kavanaugh. They are, and have been, an inspiration to me. They've been married for 43 years, and I am their only child. I'm just very proud that they're behind me today.

My mom in particular, in terms of career path, has had a profound influence on my career choices. Throughout her life she's been dedicated to public service. When she was in her 20s, she taught public high school in the District of Columbia, at McKinley and H.D. Woodson high schools. She then decided to go back to law school in the 1970s and became a State prosecutor out in Rockville, Maryland. She was later appointed to the State trial bench by Governor Schaefer and then by Governor Glendening, in Maryland. She's instilled in me a commitment to public service and a respect for the rule of law that I've tried to follow throughout my career.

Mr. Chairman, I'm a product of my parents; I'm also a product of my experiences, and I'd like to take a few minutes to share a few of those experiences and how I think they might shape how I would come to the bench as a judge.

I attended Yale Law School in the late 1980s. It was a challenging yet collegial environment. It was a place that instilled a desire to make a difference. It was a place that encouraged public service. And while I was at Yale Law School I decided, as you know, to seek a judicial clerkship after my time there.

I clerked for Judge Walter Stapleton on the Third Circuit. Judge Stapleton is a gentleman and a scholar. He's an experienced judge, and he's a great friend. If I am confirmed to be a judge, I will do everything in my power to bring to the bench the decency and the good judgment and the collegial manner of Walter Stapleton. And I thank him for being here today.

After I clerked for Judge Stapleton, I clerked for Judge Alex Kozinski on the Ninth Circuit. Judge Kozinski, as many of you know, has a passion for the law. When we started as law clerks, he told us we work for the people and we should consider ourselves on the job 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, 365 days a year. And I can say from personal experience that Judge Kozinski lived up to that promise. We worked very hard, he was very thorough. I thank him for all he's done for me in my career and for coming here today from California. If I am confirmed to be a judge, I would seek to bring to the bench the thoroughness and the thoughtfulness and the dedication to the rule of law that Judge Kozinski has demonstrated on the bench for more than 2 decades.

After I finished those two clerkships, I worked in the Solicitor General's Office at the Department of Justice. I experienced the ethic of that office, that the United States wins its point when justice is done. In that office I had the opportunity for the first time to argue a case in court before the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals. I was able to stand up for the first time and say Brett Kavanaugh for the United States, a moment that was very proud for me and remains so.

In the October 1993 term of the Supreme Court, I clerked for Justice Anthony Kennedy. Justice Kennedy is a student of history, he's a student of the Supreme Court. He talks often about the compact between generations that the Constitution represents. And he conveyed to his clerks, and certainly conveyed to me--to use one of his favorite phrases--the essential neutrality of the law. I'm forever grateful to Justice Kennedy for the opportunity to clerk for him.

After I finished that clerkship, I worked for Judge Starr in the Independent Counsel's Office. It was a difficult, it was a tough job, it was an often thankless job. In that capacity, I had the opportunity to argue cases before the Supreme Court of the United States and the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals. I learned some lessons in that office. I had some thoughts about how it all operated and, as the Chairman has noted, I tried to make a contribution, the improvement of the public legal system, by writing an article in the Georgetown Law Journal that identified better ways, in my judgment, to conduct investigations of high-level executive branch officials.

I then went to Kirkland & Ellis, where I became a partner, represented institutional clients of the firm, and also did pro bono work for several years.

In 2001, I joined the White House Counsel's Office under Judge Al Gonzales. In that office I did some of the standard work of the office--ethics issues, separation of powers issues. I also worked with many members of the staff of this Committee and other members of Congress on civil justice issues, such as class action reform, medical liability reform, and the very important terrorism insurance legislation in 2002.

I also worked on judges, on the nomination of judges, and I had the opportunity to help recommend judges to the President of the United States for him to nominate to the Federal courts. In that capacity, on the district court level I worked closely with many members of the Senate and their staffs in the States that I was assigned, including some members of this Committee.

In July of 2003, I became staff secretary to President Bush. This is what I call an honest broker for the President, someone who tries to ensure that the range of policy views on various subjects in the administration are presented to the President in a fair and even-handed way.

I've worked closely with the President and with the senior staff at the White House and other members of the administration for nearly 3 years. I think I've earned the trust of the President, I've earned the trust of the senior staff, that I'm fair and even-handed. This kind of high-level experience in the executive branch has been common for past judicial nominees, especially on the D.C. Circuit, which handles so many important and complicated administrative and constitutional issues.

Mr. Chairman, I have dedicated my career to public service. I revere the rule of law. I know first-hand the central role of the courts in protecting the rights and liberties of the people. And I pledge to each member of this Committee, and I pledge to each member of the Senate, that, if confirmed, I will interpret the law as written and not impose personal policy preferences; that I will exercise judicial power prudently and with restraint; that I will follow precedent in all cases fully and fairly; and above all, that I will at all times maintain the absolute independence of the judiciary, which in my judgment is the crown jewel of our constitutional democracy.

Mr. Chairman, I will be happy to answer any questions. Thank you.

[The biographical information of Mr. Kavanaugh follows:]

/ COMMITTEE INSERT

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Mr. Kavanaugh.

We now turn to 5-minute rounds for each Senator.

Mr. Kavanaugh, I begin with the question as to what assurances can you give this Committee and the Senate and the American people about your independence from the President and the White House. I look at a long list of nominees who have voted against their presidential nominator on many, many celebrated matters. Just a few: Justice Douglas dissented on the Korematsu case, the Japanese internment case, against President Roosevelt's policy. Famous decision by Justice Tom Clark turning against Truman on the Steel Seizure case not long after he was nominated. Justice Kennedy, Justice O'Connor disagreeing on a woman's right to choose from President Reagan. Justice Souter disagreeing with President Bush the elder. Famous disagreements that President Eisenhower expressed about Chief Justice Warren. Perhaps the most famous case, Salmon Chase had advocated policies as the Secretary of the Treasury, and then, after being appointed to the Supreme Court, declared unconstitutional the monetary policy he had implemented as President Lincoln's treasurer.

What positive assurances can you give of your independence?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Mr. Chairman, if confirmed to be a D.C. Circuit judge, I will call them as I see them, regardless of who the litigants may be. I know that independence of the judiciary, as I said in my opening, is a key part of our constitutional system. I would not hesitate in any case to rule the way I saw the case, regardless of who the parties were, regardless of whether the President was involved.

Chairman Specter. Would you consider yourself independent in the tradition of the judges, justices whom I've just named?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Absolutely, Mr. Chairman. I know that there's a long history in our constitutional system of judges being drawn from the executive branch, and I would--

Chairman Specter. Mr. Kavanaugh, let me interrupt you. There's a great deal to cover and I only have 5 minutes.

Did you have anything to do with the issues of interrogation of prisoners relating to the allegations of torture in the so-called Bybee memorandum?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Did you have anything to do with the questions of rendition?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Did you have anything to do with the questions relating to detention of inmates at Guantanamo?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Did you have anything to do with Mr. Abramoff and the many visits which he apparently made to the White House?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Do you have anything to do with the President's policy on so-called signing statements?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Mr. Chairman, signing statements come through the Staff Secretary's Office, and I help ensure that relevant members of the administration have provided input on the signing statements. In the first instance they're drafted in the Justice Department, but I do help clear those before the President sees them.

Chairman Specter. That poses a very difficult and contentious issue which this Committee is going to have hearings on. And I can understand that in your role as coordinator you would have the responsibility for coalescing materials. Did you take any position as to the constitutional authority for the President to limit the substance of legislation by expressing limitations in the signing statements?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Mr. Chairman, it is common for signing statements, this President and previous Presidents, to identify potential constitutional issues like Appointments Clause issues, Presentment Clause issues, or issues relating to INS v. Chaddha, for example, the line item veto case. On those matters, I make sure that they have been properly staffed to other members of the White House staff. They come up in the first instance from the Justice Department and the Office of Management and Budget.

Chairman Specter. Were you called upon to give the President any advice as to the constitutional implications of the signing statements?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think, without discussing internal matters, I think it's common to explain the general parameters of signing statements, for example, that there's been a history of them, and identifying potential constitutional issues in legislation, particularly Appointments Clause, Presentment Clause, and the other issues identified.

Chairman Specter. Mr. Kavanaugh, you wrote an article on peremptory challenges, where there had been a practice among prosecutors to issue what are called peremptory challenges--which, for those who do not know, means that a prospective juror can be disqualified without stating any reason, where blacks were eliminated. My time is up and I will quit, but you can answer.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Mr. Chairman, I think one of the great Supreme Court decisions ever decided was Batson v. Kentucky. It overruled Swain v. Alabama, and held that a prosecutor's use of race in striking potential jurors from the jury box was unconstitutional under the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment.

One of the concerns I had--that was decided in 1986; I was in law school from 1987 to 1990--one of the concerns I had was what procedures will be used to help guarantee that right to be free of racial discrimination in the jury selection procedure. And I wrote a note that advocated certain procedures that help ferret out potential racial bias in the jury selection process.

Chairman Specter. Senator Schumer.

Senator Schumer. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Just when Senator Specter went over all of the issues, he mentioned torture in connection with the Bybee memo. Were you involved in any way in the Counsel's Office in opining about the proper use of torture?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Senator. The first time I learned of that memo, I believe, was--

Senator Schumer. I did not ask about the memo. I asked just in general.

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Senator.

Senator Schumer. Thank you. Okay, I would like to ask you a few questions that you did not answer. These were submitted in writing or orally at the last hearing. I will tell you all of them.

First, Senator Leahy asked you whether Karl Rove was involved in the judicial selection process at any point while you were there. I asked you how you would have voted on the impeachment of President Clinton. Senator Kennedy asked you whether you agreed with Judge Pryor, who called Roe v. Wade an abomination. And Senator Durbin asked you if you consider yourself in the mold of Scalia and Thomas, which is the mold that the President has said he is going to choose judges in.

First, Rove. Was Karl Rove involved in any of the selection of judges while you were there?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Mr. Chairman, I think that is a question that the Counsel to the President should answer in the first instance. I don't think as a judicial nominee here I should talk about who was involved. The Counsel to the President chairs the judicial selection committee, and if there is a question about who is involved in recommending judges--

Senator Schumer. What we are trying to determine, in the previous time you were here, you said that no ideology was involved in the selection of judges. I do not see why you cannot answer that question. What is improper about answering that question?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I will check whether I can answer that question. And if I can, I will provide the answer.

Senator Schumer. What would come to mind which would prevent you from answering that question?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I just want to be careful that I check with the Counsel on something like that and be sure that there is not an issue before I disclose something in the context--

Mr. Kavanaugh. Is there any privilege that would prevent you that you can see, that would come to mind right now?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I can check with the Counsel on that, Senator.

Senator Schumer. Do you have knowledge of the answer?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Well, I was involved in the judicial selection process.

Senator Schumer. So you would know yes or no, you just choose not to answer?

Mr. Kavanaugh. And I would be happy to provide the answer. I just want to check first.

Senator Schumer. Okay.

Next, how would you have voted--I know you were involved in the impeachment of President Clinton--how would you have voted if you were a Senator?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I don't think it's appropriate for the office that submitted the report to comment on whether the House made the proper decision to impeach or whether the Senate made the proper decision not to--

Senator Schumer. When lawyers argue cases, all the time they say they are disappointed in the verdict, they are happy with the verdict. That is not a violation of anything, as far as I know, except your desire not to answer the question.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I guess this gets to an ethic I've learned about prosecutors offices when I worked in the Solicitor General's Office, that it's not appropriate to comment on a jury verdict. And I don't think it's appropriate in this instance for me, as a member of the Independent Counsel's Office, to comment on whether the House decision was correct or whether the Senate decision was correct.

Senator Schumer. In an op-ed in the Washington Post in 1999, you wrote a defense of Ken Starr, where you said "Starr uncovered a massive effort by the President to lie under oath and obstruct justice." You also wrote that, "The word that ordinarily describes such behavior is not `trapped' but `guilty.'" You were pretty clear to state your views in 1999, but you do not want to state them now?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think that was based on Judge Wright's finding of contempt, and there was also a censure resolution introduced in the Senate that used some more language. So I think the language there, it was a joint op-ed.

Chairman Specter. But you just said you did not think it was appropriate to answer. And you felt it very appropriate, in a similar role, to answer, to make some very strong statements then.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think this goes to a key point, Senator, which is impeachment and then conviction take into account more than just the facts. As you know from participating on the House side at the time and the Senators know from participating on the Senate side, there were--

Senator Schumer. I participated in votes.

Chairman Specter. Now, let him finish his answer, please.

Senator Schumer. --on both sides.

Mr. Kavanaugh. On both sides, that's right, Senator. And I think, as many of the Senators and House members discussed at the time, it wasn't just a simple question of whether there was a violation of law committed, but there were broader considerations for the country. And that's where it really gets, really gets, I think, improper for someone in the Independent Counsel's Office to say whether they think the President should have been impeached.

Senator Schumer. I fail to see the distinction. Let me ask you to answer, since my time is ending here, the two other questions. Do you consider Roe v. Wade to be an abomination? And do you consider yourself to be a judicial nominee, like the President said he was going to nominate people, in the mold of Scalia and Thomas?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, on the question of Roe v. Wade, if confirmed to the D.C. Circuit, I would follow Roe v. Wade faithfully and fully. That would be binding precedent of the Court. It's been decided by the Supreme Court--

Senator Schumer. I asked you your own opinion.

Mr. Kavanaugh. And I'm saying if I were confirmed to the D.C. Circuit, Senator, I would follow it. It's been reaffirmed many times, including in Planned Parenthood v. Casey.

Senator Schumer. I understand. But what is your opinion? You're not on the bench yet. You've talked about these issues in the past to other people, I'm sure.

Mr. Kavanaugh. The Supreme Court has held repeatedly, Senator, and I don't think it would be appropriate for me to give a personal view of that case.

Senator Schumer. Okay, you are not going to answer the question. How about being in the mold of Scalia and Thomas?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I don't want to talk about current members of the Court, but I do think I can describe some of the justices or judges in the past that I think I would try, that have been role models to me, including Justice White, Justice Jackson, and for a couple of reasons. They were people who took an active part in our Government system, which is some--

Senator Schumer. I understand. Just explain to me why it is appropriate for the President to say that he will appoint nominees in a particular mold, but you cannot answer whether you would be part of that.

Mr. Kavanaugh. As a potential inferior court judge, Senator, on the D.C. Circuit if confirmed, I just don't want to talk about currently sitting members of the Supreme Court. I'm happy to talk about Justice Jackson and Justice White, if you'd like.

Senator Schumer. Okay. I wish I could say it, but I do not think you have clarified any of these answers that we asked you the first time.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Senator Hatch.

Senator Hatch. Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome again to the Committee. You are one of the few who have had this great experience of being brought back here twice. Let me just take a--

Mr. Chairman, I would like to take most of my time to make just a few comments rather than to ask questions at this time.

I think that during his first hearing 2 years ago in 2004 and his written submissions afterwards, Mr. Kavanaugh more than adequately answered all the questions that had been posed to him. The Committee already has a 159-page hearing record before it on this nominee. And I am confident in Mr. Kavanaugh's abilities and capacities in both the understanding and knowledge of the law. I suspect that he will continue to show his intellect, sound judgment, and judicial temperament.

I have no doubt that Mr. Kavanaugh fully appreciates the proper role and limitations placed of Federal appellate judges in our constitutional system. And while I am not pleased with all the circumstances that have resulted in holding this unusual if not unprecedented second hearing, I take solace in the fact that Chief Justice Roberts, whom many in the public and a super-majority of Senators found to be an extremely capable individual after his confirmation hearings last September, was also subject to two confirmation hearings before he was able to sit on the D.C. Circuit. I hope that Brett Kavanaugh's confirmation will not be delayed as long as now-Chief Justice Roberts's was. He was delayed for 11 solid years, between the time that the first President Bush nominated him and the time that the second President Bush, our current President, renominated him.

Now, while today's hearing will and should concentrate and focus on qualifications of Brett Kavanaugh to serve on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, when you see nominees with the backgrounds of John Roberts and Brett Kavanaugh having been held up for so many years for so little reason, sometimes you have to ask yourself if there may be motivations at play that have nothing at all to do with the nominee's actual fitness to sit on the bench. To date it has been almost 3 years since Mr. Kavanaugh was first nominated. I think it is time to vote on his nomination, and frankly it is past time for the Senate to vote on Mr. Kavanaugh's nomination.

So at this point, I would like to welcome you, Mr. Kavanaugh, your wife and baby and of course your family. Since the last time before this Committee, you have become a husband and father, and I join in welcoming Mrs. Kavanaugh here and your 8-month-old daughter Margaret to the Committee.

I also want to acknowledge the presence of Mr. Kavanaugh's parents. I have known them for a long time. Ed Kavanaugh for many years, he headed up the major trade association, the Cosmetic, Toiletries, and Fragrance Association, and he is deservedly admired by many in this town. And his mother served with distinction as a State court judge in Maryland for many, many years.

Sometimes in these confirmation hearings, in the rush to get to more controversial matters, there is a tendency to skip over too quickly on the qualities and attributes that led the President to nominate the individual--and in this case, Mr. Kavanaugh--in the first place. And I think Senator Specter has already given us an overview of the nominee's impressive educational and employment background. We have also heard the testimony of two excellent Federal court judges for whom he clerked, both of whom I know--Judge Kozinski of the Ninth Circuit and of course Judge Stapleton of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals. I think we should weigh their words very carefully. These are people of impeccable reputations and ability on the bench.

Not only did you distinguish yourself as a clerk on two appellate courts, but you also served as a clerk on the Supreme Court. You had an academic career that was pretty impressive as well, at Yale. You've had a series of impressive and highly responsible jobs in both the executive branch and in the private sector. And you're a talented appellate advocate as well before the Supreme Court.

Now, let me just say--my time is running out, but in addition to your three judicial clerkships, as you have mentioned, you worked in the Solicitor General's Office, in the Department of Justice, with Ken Starr, and of course with the Office of Special Counsel. And of course nobody should judge you as an attorney for having worked in something that was as unpleasant as that. Attorneys work on unpleasant matters in many ways, and you would be a pretty doggone poor attorney if you were not willing to work with distinction and with fairness when called upon to do so. And I think knowing you and knowing what happened in the Clinton matter, you served with distinction and fairness.

My time is about up so I just--I will make some more comments if we have another round, but I just want to congratulate you for standing in there and being willing to serve on the circuit court of appeals. I know you could make a fortune on the outside, but you have made public service your life and I do not see how we can find a better person to serve and give public service than you. So I just want to personally express my fondness for you, my high admiration for you, and the fact that you will have my support in every step of this process.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Hatch.

Under the early-bird rule, on the side for the Democrats are Senator Feinstein, Senator Durbin, Senator Kennedy, Senator Feingold, and on the Republican side are Senator Coburn, Senator Graham, Senator Sessions, and Senator Kyl. So under the early-bird rule we now turn to Senator Durbin.

Senator Durbin. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Kavanaugh, thank you for returning. In 2003, Jay Bybee was confirmed to a seat on the Ninth Circuit. A year and a half later, we learned he had authored the infamous torture memo when he headed the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel. In the memo he claimed the President has the right to ignore the law that makes torture a crime and narrowly defined torture as abuse that causes pain equivalent to organ failure or death.

The torture memo was requested by, addressed to the then-White House Counsel, Alberto Gonzales. So clearly the White House Counsel's Office knew that Mr. Bybee had authored the torture memo at the time of his nomination. Did you know that Mr. Bybee authored the torture memo or similar memos at the time of his nomination?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Senator, I think you're referring to the August 1, 2002, memo. I was not aware of that memo until there was public disclosure of it in the news media, I think in the summer of 2004.

Senator Durbin. The administration has now repudiated the memo. In retrospect, should the fact that Mr. Bybee authored the torture memo have disqualified him from consideration as a nominee?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I don't think, sitting here as a prospective judge, as a nominee to a court of appeals, I should talk about another sitting judge and whether that person should or should not have been nominated. I just don't think that's a proper role for me.

Senator Durbin. But you see that is what we are struggling with here. We do not have a number of cases that you have argued before a court, because you haven't. We do not have trials that you have taken to a jury verdict, because there are none. We have to rely on what you have done with your life and where you have been to try to determine what your values are. Senator Schumer asked you a series of questions related to the work of your life, which you did not feel were appropriate to answer. And now I am trying to plumb that same type of well to find out what you really believe and who you are. And every time we get close, you say sorry, I can't answer. That is a problem for a person seeking a seat on the second-highest court in the land. I do not know where to go in questioning you. You do not want to talk about what you have done that might have any political implication. And frankly, when it comes to legal work, there is not much to turn to. Do you see the problem we are facing?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, on that memo, I can say that the administration has repealed that memo. I agree with that decision. I do not believe the analysis in that memo was correct. I think that memo did not serve the presidency or this President well. And I am willing to talk about the memo itself.

Senator Durbin. Well, let me ask you. You were in charge of judicial nominations, or at least involved in judicial nominations with the White House. And that is why we are going into this. Let's go to another nominee and see if you might respond to this.

In September 2003, the President nominated William Haynes to be a judge on the Fourth Circuit. As General Counsel to the Department of Defense, Mr. Haynes had been the architect of the administration's discredited detention and interrogation policies. For example, Mr. Haynes recommended that Secretary Rumsfeld approve the use of abusive interrogation techniques, like threatening detainees with dogs, forced nudity, and for forcing detainees into painful stress positions. During the 108th Congress, Mr. Haynes's nomination stalled after his involvement in this scandal came to light. Just this February, the President decided to renominate him.

What was your role in the original Haynes nomination and decision to renominate him? And at the time of the nomination, what did you know about Mr. Haynes's role in crafting the administration's detention and interrogation policies?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I did not--I was not involved and am not involved in the questions about the rules governing detention of combatants or--and so I do not have the involvement with that. And with respect to Mr. Haynes's nomination, I've--I know Jim Haynes, but it was not one of the nominations that I handled. I handled a number of nominations in the Counsel's Office. That was not one of the ones that I handled.

Senator Durbin. So let me try this approach and see if we can learn a little more. Manny Miranda was an employee of the Senate Judiciary Committee on the Republican staff and then on the Senate Majority Leader's staff. He hacked into the computers of the members and staff of this Committee, stealing thousands of documents and memoranda which were then shared with others. Did you know Manny Miranda, or do you know him today?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I knew Manny Miranda because he was a member of Senator Hatch's staff and then Senator Frist's staff working on judicial nominations.

Senator Durbin. Did you ever work with him in terms of judicial nominations?

Mr. Kavanaugh. He was part of a group of Senate staffers that did work on judicial nominations with people at the Department of Justice and the White House Counsel's Office. We talked about this last time. I did not know about any memos from the Democratic side. I did not suspect that. Had I known or suspected that, I would have immediately told Judge Gonzales, who I'm sure would have immediately talked to Chairman Hatch about it. Did not know about it, did not suspect it. He was part, however, of the staff, of course, that worked on judicial nominations, including with--on both sides.

Senator Durbin. My time is up. But I think one of the problems you had with the American Bar Association when they downgraded your rating was they thought you were dismissive of this, that you did not take this as a serious problem, that a Republican staffer had broken into the computers of Democratic Senators and their staff, were stealing documents and sharing them with those who were plotting the strategy for the White House. Would you like to respond as to whether or not you think this was a serious matter, perhaps criminal?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I don't know what the American Bar Association said about that, but I know what I told them and what I've told the Committee. Had I known or suspected anything like that, I would have immediately told Judge Gonzales, who I'm sure would have immediately called Chairman Hatch. I know the matter has been under investigation in the Senate. I know the matter has been under investigation by a special prosecutor. That is a serious matter. And that is what I said to the American Bar Association and that's what I'm saying to this Committee.

So that's my view on the matter.

Senator Durbin. Thank you.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Senator Durbin.

Senator Coburn.

Senator Coburn. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I just want to put a few points into the record. Of the 12 members of the D.C. Circuit and the two seniors, none have as broad experience in terms of measurement points as our nominee here today. Only five have clerked on the Federal appeals court out of the 14; only four have clerked on the Supreme Court; only six have argued before the court of appeals; only five have argued before the Supreme Court; only seven have had editorial positions on law review; only four have had previous judicial experience. Of everybody that is on there now, only four have had previous judicial experience and only four had any legislative branch experience.

Again, I want to address the issues out in the open. I think what is happening here today I am somewhat embarrassed about. We have somebody who is obviously qualified. The ABA says he is qualified. He is not downgraded, he is recognized as qualified. He is extremely well qualified and well qualified. This time he is well qualified, with a minority extremely well qualified--or qualified and well qualified.

But what it requires is "qualified." And if you look at the ABA's position of what "qualified" is--and let me read it for you, should we have any questions regarding that--let me find it. It means that the nominee meets the committee's very--this is "qualified." --means that the nominee meets the committee's very high standards with respect to integrity, professional competence, judicial temperament, and that the committee believes that the nominee will be able to perform satisfactorily all of the duties and responsibilities required by the high office of a Federal judge.

Everybody on that ABA says you are qualified. And I just read what it means. The idea that we are fishing around because we do not like something the Bush administration has done, or we are going to imply and impugn the integrity of somebody who has been in a position of responsibility and has offered his good services to fulfill the requirements of the executive branch, and anything you do not like about the executive branch you are going to try to tie to this gentleman, is improper. It also is dismissive of our open form of Government. And is exactly, again--I will say again--exactly what the American people are sick of, partisan sniping that is not about the issues but trying to score a point and trying to undermine somebody's integrity who has absolute integrity on these issues.

They have answered the questions. We are here--we are here--to give a second look at somebody who has already answered the questions. And there is precedent to not give answers to questions about certain privileged communications within the White House. That does not mean that those are necessarily devious or wrong. It means you protect the Office of the Presidency. That is an appropriate role. There is nothing wrong with that.

I will have one question for you. Why do you want to be a Federal judge?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I want to be a Federal judge because I know from experience and through my upbringing the role of the courts in protecting the rights and liberties of the people. I know how essential the rule of law is to our country. I know how the independence of our Federal judiciary is central to our constitutional form of Government. I think, based on my experience and my background, I can make a contribution to the administration of justice. I think I can be a good judge. And it's part of my commitment to public service that I've carried out for most of the 16 years since I graduated from law school.

Senator Coburn. Do you think it makes any difference on your ability to be an appellate judge in this country which side of the issue you were on the impeachment or which side of the issue you were on any of these issues that have been raised? Your personal opinion, when you have testified that you are not going to allow a personal opinion to interfere in your interpretation of the law and the independence of the judiciary, does that have a bearing?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I absolutely believe in the idea that judges are neutral and impartial and that whatever activities may have occurred in someone's past life in terms of Government activities, those are good experience to have to become a good judge. But it also is true, once you put on the black robe, you're impartial and you represent the law. As Justice Kennedy used to tell us, the essential neutrality of the law. And I think that is a principle that I would seek to follow were I to be confirmed to the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals. I think it's essential to our entire system of Government. There's no such thing on the courts as a Republican judge or a Democratic judge. Once you're on the court, all the judges are there representing the justice system, representing the idea of justice.

Senator Coburn. Thank you. My time has expired.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Coburn.

Senator Feinstein.

Senator Feinstein. I am happy to yield to Senator Kennedy. My understanding is you wanted to go next?

Senator Kennedy. I appreciate that. We have this health legislation on the floor now which we are trying to work through. If it is convenient for the Senator from California, I would just take the time. I thank the Chair.

Congratulations to you, Mr. Kavanaugh, for gaining the President's confidence. The Circuit Court, as you know, has such special jurisdiction in terms of so many different areas of legislation that we pass--National Labor Relations Board, the relationship of workers and what happens to workers, discrimination against workers in the workplace, environmental kinds of issues they are working through. And their judgments on so many of these end up being the law, and so few go on to the Supreme Court. And we have seen very interesting trends that have taken place in the District court. So this has a special relevancy and importance. So that is at least why we spend as much time as we do on this particular nomination.

Just on the--I want to just really focus in on this issue, again, of torture and rendition, your role there. I am on the Armed Services Committee and we have spent a lot of time. We have had 10 investigations of torture, and none of them have revealed what we are constantly seeing revealed now with newer reports that have come on up in the newspapers and exposed by Freedom of Information reports. So it is something that is--And we have a policy of rendition which is of enormous concern to many of us.

And we also know that Mr. Gonzales was in touch with Mr. Bybee when he was over at OLC. I mean, we have gone through all of this. This was all through the Gonzales--when Mr. Gonzales was up for Attorney General. And we also know that Haynes was in touch with the White House at that time, good chance that he was in touch with OLC.

So this is the background. Have you ever previously--as you well know, that Bybee memorandum effectively said that if you go on out, you are in the military service or under contract and you go out and torture someone, it does not make any difference how badly you torture or what pain you inflict, as long as your purpose is to get information rather than to hurt an individual, you are going to be vindicated in terms of any kind of protections. I mean, effectively. That also was included in the Bybee.

And Mr. Gonzales repudiated it when he came up before the Committee to be Attorney General. Is this the first time you have every made a comment on the Bybee memorandum? You responded to Senator Durbin and said that, in sort of a follow-up question, that you did not agree with the reasoning or the rationale for it. Is this the first time that you have ever said anything about the Bybee?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I believe it is. It is possible I have said something to people I work with, but this is the first time, certainly, I have been questioned about it.

Senator Kennedy. But you have not, prior to this time, ever made a comment or statement to others indicating that you found it particularly offensive. Because it has been a major issue, an issue in question out there. Please.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I know that Judge Gonzales in the summer of 2004 had a press conference where the memo was repealed and talked about this issue. I think also at his confirmation hearing in 2005, he said he disagreed, I believe, with the legal analysis in there, that the legal analysis in there was incorrect. And so I know members of the administration have repudiated that memorandum, or at least the legal analysis in that memorandum.

Senator Kennedy. And your testimony is that you had nothing with the promotion of Bybee to the Ninth Circuit. Is that correct?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That was not one of the nominations I worked on, and I knew he was, of course, being nominated but I didn't know some of the issues that you're talking about today.

Senator Kennedy. Well, then you are saying that you did not know he wrote what we know is the Bybee memorandum at the time that he was being considered for the circuit?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I first learned of the existence of that memo, I think, when there was a Washington Post story in the summer of 2004. I think that is the first--I'm pretty sure that's the first time I learned anything about the August 1 memo.

Senator Kennedy. And for Mr. Haynes, have you expressed an opinion in terms of the legal counsel for the Defense Department, for promotion? I understand you have not handled the Haynes nomination?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct, Senator. And in terms of my portfolio in the Counsel's office, it involved a lot of civil justice issues--worked on nominations, some ethics issues, separation of powers issues. It did not involve the kinds of issues you're raising in your questions.

Senator Kennedy. Well, are not most of those--I mean, the--most of those issues, class actions, insurance reform, are not most of those handled in the various departments, or were they--are those not sort of policy issues handled in the departments? Those are the issues that you were working on?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I worked, I would say, primarily on judicial nominations. In the wake of September 11th, there were a number of civil justice issues that I worked on, including the terrorism insurance litigation.

Senator Kennedy. Okay. Just finally, on the documents that were taken here from the Committee and that you have the familiarity -- and you have indicated that you, in reviewing them, had no understanding or awareness that they had been taken, been stolen. Have you ever gone back, now that you are aware of it, and seen what decisions you may or might not have taken on the basis of documents that were illegally taken? To see whether you may have made some judgments or decisions to reach certain conclusions, now that you know that they were not properly taken? Have you ever thought, well, I ought to go back, I might have made some judgments or decisions when I was working for the President and I ought to take a look at this, since you know that these documents now were taken? Have you ever thought about that?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, there's a very important premise in your question that I think is incorrect, which is I didn't know about the memos or see the memos that I think you're describing. So I think--

Senator Kennedy. Oh, you never saw any of those?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Senator, that's correct. I'm not aware of the memos, I never saw such memos that I think you're referring to. I mean, I don't know what the universe of memos might be, but I do know that I never received any memos and was not aware of any such memos. So I just want to correct that premise that I think was in your question.

Senator Kennedy. Okay. My time is up, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Kennedy.

On the Republican side, we have, in sequence, Senator Graham, Senator Sessions, Senator Cornyn, and Senator Kyl. And on the Democratic side, we have, who has not questioned, Senator Feinstein and Senator Feingold. I had Senator Feinstein ahead of Senator Kennedy on the list.

Senator Feinstein. Yes, I yielded to Senator Kennedy.

Chairman Specter. Okay, I just wanted to be sure that the list is correct. It is sometimes judgmental. Senator Feinstein was here first, but she left for awhile. Senator Kennedy came. But at any rate, Senator Feinstein yielded. But I wanted it known that that was the list that I had. And now Senator Graham.

Senator Graham. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to congratulate you for having the hearing, because I think it is appropriate. It is a lifetime appointment, that people be able to ask questions and he be able to answer within his ability to do so without compromising what he believes to be his ethics or any proper role he may have played as a lawyer.

Do you believe you were treated fairly by the ABA?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, the American Bar Association has rated me three times. I'm going to get directly to the question, but I'm going to give you some background, if I could. I've been rated three times by the American Bar Association. And each time, there were 14 individual reviews conducted by members of the Committee. So there have been a total of 42 separate reviews conducted of me based on interviews with lots of people and review of lots of record.

All 42 have found that I'm well qualified or qualified to serve on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals. So I'm pleased with that and I'm proud of that. And to the extent--and none of the 42 has found that I'm not qualified, and I think the Chair of the Committee yesterday said that there's not been a breath of anyone saying that I'm not qualified. So I'm proud and pleased with the 42 of 42.

Senator Graham. So do you think you were fairly treated?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I think, sitting here as a nominee, I would prefer not to talk about my--you know, about the American Bar Association other than to say that I'm pleased and proud to have 42 of 42 rating me well qualified or qualified.

Senator Graham. Based on your going through that experience, would you recommend that we continue to consult the ABA when it comes to judges?

[Laughter.]

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, again, I'm pleased and proud of the ratings. Their--in the future, maybe, will look back and have some observations, but right now I don't think I have any observations to offer the Committee about the American Bar Association.

Senator Graham. Your time at the White House, you dealt with, I think you described your job. One of these constitutional questions that we are trying to wrestle with here is the inherent authority of the President in a time of war versus any designated role of the judiciary or the Congress in general. Do you agree with Justice Jackson's evaluation in the Youngstown Steel case that the President or the executive branch is at their strongest maximum power when they have concurrence of the legislative body?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I agree completely with that, Senator.

Senator Graham. Very specific question. Do you believe that at a time of war, the Congress has the ability to amend, pass the Uniform Code of Military Justice and not infringe on the President's inherent authority as commander in chief?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, that sounds like a specific hypothetical that could come before the court, so I'd hesitate to give an answer. In terms of Justice Jackson's framework, that of course for a half century has been the guiding framework. I think it's a work of genius, that opinion, in terms of setting out the different categories of presidential power and congressional power in times of war and otherwise, in terms of, as you say, category I, when the President and the Congress work together, that's when the power is at the strongest. And category II, that's what they call the twilight zone in the opinion. And then in category III, where a President acts against the express or implied will of Congress, that's where the President's power is at its lowest ebb and raises some very serious constitutional questions, according to Justice Jackson. I think that's an exceptional opinion that has guided American law, the relationship between Congress and the executive for about a half-century, and it's really been the foundation of these kinds of issues that I know you and the Committee have been working on.

Senator Graham. Finally, and if you don't want to answer it, you don't have to, but are you a Republican? If so, why?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I am a registered Republican. As I said before to Senator Coburn, I believe very much that it's good to have judges who've participated in Government. That's been part of our experience in the past, to have judges on the D.C. Circuit who've participated in the executive branch, who've worked in the executive branch; judges on the Supreme Court.

Specifically, to answer your question, when I was first registering to vote, President Reagan was President and I agreed with him on some issues and registered Republican in the first election in--I guess 1984 was the first one I voted in.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Senator Graham.

Senator Feinstein.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Let me just say this. This is a difficult nomination. First of all, you're very young, which is, I think, a blessing for you. But in terms of an appellate judge, I think it is a detriment. Obviously, you've had a good education, you have done well. You have spent a lot of your life in at least a semi-political capacity. The question comes up, how can you assure us that you will be fair? Would you recuse yourself from any judgment that concerned this administration?

Without a record either as a trial lawyer or as a judge, it's very difficult for some of us to know what kind of a judge you would be and whether you can move away from the partisanship and into that arena of objectivity and fairness.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, thank you for the question. I think in the past, on the D.C. Circuit and on the Supreme Court and on other courts of appeals other than the D.C. Circuit, prior Government experience in the legislative branch or the executive branch has been seen as a very valuable asset, whether it was Judge Abner Mikva or Judge Patricia Wald, Judge John Roberts on the D.C. Circuit, Judge Merrick Garland, who President Clinton appointed to the D.C. Circuit. That kind of experience has been seen as very valuable experience and valuable background.

And of course the question--I think only four of the last 21 judges on the D.C. Circuit have actually had prior judicial experience, so the norm on the D.C. Circuit, in fact the overwhelming norm, is for the judges on the D.C., Circuit since 1977, not to have had prior judicial experience. What they've had usually is Government experience in the legislative branches or the executive branches.

And your question really goes to how do you assess someone's record. And I think that's done through an assessment of going back, in my case 16 years in my career, and looking at the things I've done. In the Staff Secretary's Office now, where I'm an honest broker, where I have to be fair and even-handed in the kind of role I perform for the President, some of the work I've done in the Counsel's Office on judges, I've worked with your office and Senator Boxer's office in the past on judges I know and worked closely on that. When I was in private practices, working on not just institutional clients, but pro bono cases. One of my proudest cases is I worked on a pro bono case for a synagogue in my home county that was seeking to build in a new location. Some of the neighbors didn't want it there. I represented them. They won in Federal district court.

And the Independent Counsel's Office, I know, Senator, that that's controversial and that's raised some questions. And I think in that office, my record shows that I was fair and conducted myself responsibly. I've written an article about some reforms that I think would help avoid some of the problems that I think were systemic in the Independent Counsel's--

Senator Feinstein. I am running out of time. Answer the recusal question?

Mr. Kavanaugh. On the recusal question, I know that there will be issues of recusal that I will face. There are standards in place under 28 U.S.C. 455, and I will analyze those closely were I to be confirmed to be a judge. There will be some difficult questions. I do not want to prejudge how I would rule on any recusal motion or how I would handle any particular case, but I do know, Senator, that it will be an issue in certain cases. I pledge to you that I'll take that seriously, that I'll study the precedents of people like myself who've come to the bench, that I will talk to my colleagues, were I to be confirmed, and that I'll make the judgment responsibly. I pledge that to you.

Senator Feinstein. As you look back at the Kenneth Starr investigation today--I just read the op-ed you wrote in 1999--what are your thoughts? What do you think?

Mr. Kavanaugh. On the Independent Counsel Office investigation in general, I think a couple things, Senator. First of all, I think it was, in retrospect, probably a mistake for Judge Starr to be assigned additional investigations after the initial Whitewater and Madison investigations. So he got new jurisdiction over a Travel Office matter, an FBI files matter, and eventually the Lewinsky matter. I think it would have been better in retrospect for Judge Starr to have handled what he was initially assigned and, if there was a new Special Counsel needed in these other matters, for new people to be appointed. By adding to the jurisdiction, it created the impression that Judge Starr was somehow the permanent special investigator of the administration. He was assigned a very specific matter.

So that's one thing in retrospect. And frankly, even at the time that I thought it was a concern, I think the way the report was released was a real problem. I thought that at the time. And I think the way that was released did not serve anyone well. And I've written in my law journal article about the problems with prosecutorial reports, the way people's reputations are damaged. So I've proposed some real reforms there.

I also know that it was a very serious matter in terms of the underlying issue in 1998 in terms of the things that members of this body weighed and members of the House of Representatives weighed and that Judge Wright dealt with in terms of the contempt motion that she dealt with. So there was a serious underlying matter there; I believe that. I believe that there was--that Judge Starr tried to do it thoroughly. But again, to go back to the core problem, I think there was too much jurisdiction added to Judge Starr that created a mistaken public impression that harmed the credibility of the investigation.

Senator Feinstein. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Senator Feinstein.

The next questioner on the Republican side is Senator Sessions.

Senator Sessions. Mr. Kavanaugh, thank you for your thoughts on Senator Feinstein's question about the Starr investigation. I think you have provided some good insight and I think that probably is a reason why your reputation as a member of that prosecutorial team was very high, and people had a clear impression that you were a cool head and a wise member of that team. And that is the reputation I have heard, and I can see why you had that.

I would note that Ken Starr was former Solicitor General of the United States, a man of impeccable integrity, extraordinary legal skill, and anyone would have been proud to answer his call to serve him.

Looking at the ABA evaluation, I think, first of all, you did extremely well, extraordinarily well to be rated well qualified by them, in the sense that you were relatively young and were working in the Bush administration. You were given the highest possible rating by them. And you have been there now in a less legal capacity and a few more new members and a few members decided to give you the qualified rating instead of well qualified rating, but I do not think that is a big issue.

In fact, I would quote Mr. Tober, Stephen Tober, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. This is what he said in a conversation with him just the other day in this telephone conversation. He said this: "Let me underscore, we did not find him unqualified. There's not a breath in that report or any earlier report. We found him qualified; minority, well qualified. What I said at the end is what in fact many people said, that he has a solid reputation for integrity, intellectual capacity--a lot of people refer to him as brilliant--and an excellent writing and analytical ability. Those are great skills to bring to the court of appeals. There's no question about that."

You wouldn't object to them saying that about you, would you?

Mr. Kavanaugh. As I said, Senator--

Senator Sessions. We will pass over that.

Then he went on to say this: "He is found to have high integrity. He is found to be brilliant. He is a very skilled writer and legal analyst. He has those components. He has those skills that will serve him well, certainly on a federal court."

And then he goes on to say: "It is true"--I think maybe to Senator Hatch's question--"it is true there's not a single not-qualified vote in the picture."

So I think the ABA rating, whether it is as high as it could be, and all of them did not vote you well qualified, the highest possible rating, but they did rate you qualified and the chairman of the committee gave some very interesting insights, I think.

I would just like to note on the age question that you are 6 years older, I believe, than Judge Stapleton when he was appointed to the bench, the court of appeals, and 6 years older than Judge Kozinski when he was appointed to the bench, both of whom you clerked for. I think the Chairman made that earlier. And Justice Kennedy was appointed to the Ninth Circuit 3 years younger than you are today. I think those are qualities that--I think other qualities are at stake here.

Let me just say this about my thinking of how you evaluate a nominee, that is, you consider the entire breadth of the gifts and graces they bring to the job. And if a person has less--I like a person who has been in private practice. I think that is fine. But if a person does not have private practice or a lot of--you were a partner in one of the country's best law firms; that ought to be some private practice experience. But whether you had a great deal of that experience or not, other factors are considered in here. You were editor of the Yale Law Journal, one of the editors of that. You clerked for two circuit judges, both of whom have testified for you. The first one said you should be a judge, he saw that in you when you first clerked for him and advised you of that as a career path.

So you worked for two court of appeals judges. You sat at the right hand of two judges who hold the very position you will be holding today. And then you were given the rare honor of clerking for a justice on the U.S. Supreme Court, Justice Kennedy, a judge who is considered a moderate, middle-of-the-road judge, I guess. You served under his leadership. So those are things that I think are extraordinarily important.

And you served in the Solicitor General's Office of the United States. That is the greatest law office in the world, where you represent the United States before the Federal appellate courts in the country arguing cases before the very court that you would sit upon, as well as arguing cases before the U.S. Supreme Court, an honor very few lawyers have.

So I think it is a good experience and extraordinary academic record, Mr. Chairman, and I believe he should be confirmed.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Senator Sessions.

Senator Feingold arrived earlier but has departed. Senator Leahy arrived later and is ranking, and Senator Leahy has agreed he will yield to Senator Feingold.

Senator Leahy. Go ahead. After these tough, tough questions that Senator Sessions has been asking, where the nominee just sits there and is canonized, I am overwhelmed by that. So I yield to Senator Feingold.

Chairman Specter. You should have been here earlier to hear Senator Hatch's tough questions.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. Senator Feingold?

Senator Leahy. He only asks tough questions of Democrats. He coordinates the others.

Senator Sessions. Well, this is the second time around.

Senator Feingold. I thank both the Chairman and the Ranking Member. And I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for holding this hearing. It was obviously the right thing to do, given that it has been nearly 2 years since the first hearing and, frankly, in light of Mr. Kavanaugh's incomplete responses to written questions, even though he delayed providing those responses for 7 months.

Among those written questions were several questions that I submitted concerning ethical issues that came up in connection with the nominations of three judges who I believe Mr. Kavanaugh assisted as part of his duties in the White House: Charles Pickering, who received a recess appoint and subsequently retired; and D. Brooke Smith and Ron Clark, who are currently on the bench.

In his November 2004 responses, Mr. Kavanaugh essentially refused to answer my questions. I wrote him a letter on Friday explaining why I believe these questions are appropriate and asking him to supplement his responses. Late yesterday I received a response, not from Mr. Kavanaugh but from Mr. Moschella at the Justice Department, that said the following:

"As you know, Chairman Specter has scheduled a hearing on Mr. Kavanaugh's nomination on May 9, 2006. At that time, Mr. Kavanaugh will be available to respond to questions from all Senators on the Committee."

Mr. Chairman, first, I would like to put in the record a copy of my letter and Mr. Moschella's response.

Chairman Specter. Without objection, it will be made a part of the record.

[The information follows:]

Senator Feingold. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Now, Mr. Kavanaugh, I assume you were consulted and approved of Mr. Moschella's response. I hope that you will now respond to my questions. Here is the first one for which I sought an additional response.

During the Senate's consideration of Judge Charles Pickering's nomination to the Fifth Circuit, the Judiciary Committee learned that he solicited and collected letters of support from lawyers who had appeared in his courtroom and practiced in his district. It later became apparent that some of these lawyers had cases pending before him when they wrote the letters that Judge Pickering requested. Professor Stephen Gillars of NYU Law School has written, "Judge Pickering's solicitation creates the appearance of impropriety in violation of Canon 2 of the Code of Conduct for U.S. Judges. The impropriety becomes particularly acute if lawyers or litigants with matters currently pending before the Judge were solicited."

So, sir, my first question is this. Did you know that Judge Pickering planned to solicit letters of support in this manner before he did so? And if not, when did you become aware that Judge Pickering had solicited these letters of support?

Mr. Kavanaugh. The answer to the first question, Senator, is no. This was not one of the judicial nominees that I was primarily handling. I became aware of suggestions of this sort,

I assume, at some time during the proceedings, probably when it was raised. I don't know if it was raised in the media or raised by the Senate in the first instance. Without commenting on the facts and circumstances of that matter, because I really don't know the facts and circumstances, when a judge asks a lawyer who's got a case before him or her to do something, that does put the lawyer in a very awkward position and makes it difficult for the lawyer to say no. So just in terms of a hypothetical situation, there is a situation there. Again, I don't know the facts and circumstances of what was going on there. I only heard about it, really, from either the media or from when the members of this Committee were talking about that issue.

Senator Feingold. Well, I would like to know if you think that Judge Pickering's conduct was consistent with the ethical obligations of a Federal judge.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I don't know if there's been fact finding on what his conduct was. In terms of the hypothetical situation of a judge asking a lawyer who has a case before him or her to do something, I know that raises some questions. Again, I don't know the facts and circumstances of what Judge Pickering did. I've given you my general principle.

Senator Feingold. Well, it's a good general principle, but the facts are pretty clear. I don't think he denied that he solicited these letters and that these were individuals that appeared before him. There was some debate about the significance of it, but-- Am I off track in suggesting that it looks like at least those set of facts, whether you think they occurred in this case, would be a violation of the Code of Ethics?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I hesitate to comment on another judicial nominee. Again, Senator, I'm happy to state a general principle that I believe in. Again--

Senator Feingold. Let's go with the general principle, then. If a judge is up for nomination and he solicits letters from lawyers who have cases before him, is not the general principle that that would be a violation of the Code of Ethics?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think that raises some questions that warrant some further questions to find out what happened.

Senator Feingold. Mr. Kavanaugh, I--my time is up. Thank you.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Senator Feingold. The next questioner is Senator Cornyn.

Senator Cornyn. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Welcome back, Mr. Kavanaugh.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Thank you, Senator.

Senator Cornyn. This is the second hearing 2 years, roughly, after your first hearing, and we have learned a lot has changed in your personal life.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes, sir.

Senator Cornyn. But I do not think a lot has changed in terms of your professional record as it would relate to your qualifications to serve on the D.C. Circuit.

Mr. Chairman, I have a statement that I would like to make part of the record, without objection.

Senator Hatch. (Presiding.) Without objection.

Senator Cornyn. Thank you.

[The information follows:]

Senator Cornyn. I want to ask a little bit about some of the questions that you have been asked here today. The rationale given for a second hearing that was requested is that there might be some new information that would be revealed that might change the minds of some of those who have previously expressed some skepticism as to whether you should be confirmed or not. But I think--this is my observation, not yours, but I think what we have seen is part of what has become a fairly common practice in the course of these hearings, and that is to ask you questions, the nominee questions that they cannot or should not ethically answer. And that, coupled frequently with demanding documents which are not in your possession and which you cannot produce because they are the subject of a privilege. And then of course there is, of course, then the claim that you are somehow too extreme, out of the mainstream.

Unfortunately, I do not think those are the kinds of questions or the kind of approach that is designed really to reveal very much in the way of information that is helpful to us to make decisions, but rather part of a plan to try to damage your nomination and to justify a No vote, or perhaps even a filibuster of your nomination on the Senate floor. You have been asked about everything from the Clinton impeachment to torture to rendition policy to Judge Pickering. It strikes me that, rather than finding out about your experience and background and your qualifications as an individual, that there has been some attempt to associate you with other issues with which you have no knowledge and perhaps, as you say, have not had any contact.

So I know that Chairman Specter had agreed to do this second hearing based on the representation that there might be some bona fide attempt to elicit information that would actually change some votes and attitudes, but unfortunately I do not see that happening in the course of this hearing so far. I guess one can always hope.

Of course, as you know, I met you a number of years ago when I was Attorney General of Texas and had the honor to represent my State in an argument before the United States Supreme Court. That was Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, which involved a question of whether school children could voluntarily offer a prayer or an inspirational saying before school football games in Texas. And as you know, the Court ultimately ruled against that voluntary student prayer in the case. Chief Justice Rehnquist, in dissent, said that the Court's ruling exhibited hostility to all things religious in public life. And I am very concerned about that because I do believe that the Founders thought that the posture of the Government with regard to religious expression should be one of neutrality, not hostility.

I realize as a lower court judge you are going to be bound by the Supreme Court's precedents, but I wonder if you would address the issue of religious liberty and religious speech insofar as how you believe in your position as a circuit court judge, how you would approach those issues.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, if I were confirmed to be a D.C. Circuit judge, I would of course follow the precedent of the Santa Fe case. That case addressed a question that had been left open in the Lee v. Weisman case in 1992. In that case, there was a school-sponsored prayer at a graduation ceremony where the Government was actually involved, and one of the questions that was left open was what happens if a student or a private speaker participates in a school event as a private speaker. And in the Santa Fe case, I think the Court concluded, based on the facts and circumstances of the case, that it could be attributed to the school and so was a violation of the Establishment Clause.

I think the overall area represents a tension the Supreme Court has attempted to resolve throughout the years in terms of facilitating the free exercise of religion without crossing the Establishment Clause lines that the Court has set out for many years now. I know that the Court in recent years has made clear in a number of cases that private religious speech, religious people, religious organizations cannot be, or should not be, discriminated against and that treating religious speech, religious people, religious organizations equally--in other words, on a level playing field with nonreligious organizations--is not a violation of the Establishment Clause. In past years there had been some suggestion that treating religious organizations the same way in the public square as nonreligious organizations could sometimes be a violation of the Establishment Clause. I think the Court's really gone to a principle of equality of treatment does not ordinarily violate the Establishment Clause--again, equality of treatment of religious speech, religious people, religious organizations; equality in the public square. That's been something we've seen over the last, I'd say, decade or a little more.

The Santa Fe case, again, the issue there was that although it was a private speaker, the Court found, based on all the facts and circumstances, that it was attributed to the school and therefore fell within the prohibition in Lee v. Weisman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Cornyn.

Mr. Kavanaugh, we are almost to the two-hour mark. Would you care to take a break?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I'm okay, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Senator Leahy.

Senator Leahy. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, I have an opening statement, which I will not make, but I would like to put in the record.

Chairman Specter. Without objection, your opening statement will be made a part of the record.

[The prepared statement of Senator Leahy follows:]

Senator Leahy. I would also note for the record, in that, I realize we have--the President wants to move forward Judge Terence Boyle, and I have suggested, in fact, call on the President to withdraw Terence Boyle's name. The North Carolina Police Benevolent Association, North Carolina Troopers Association, Police Benevolent Associations, South Carolina, Virginia, the National Association of Police Organizations, many other civil rights groups and others have opposed it. I can think of an awful lot of reasons why he should withdraw it. That is not in the province of what Mr. Kavanaugh has to worry about, but I would hope, rather than go through a needless exercise, that Terence Boyle's name be withdrawn, especially in light of the recent allegations of unethical conduct.

Mr. Kavanaugh, you are aware of the somewhat unique--we originally understood there would be ABA to testify here today. That had been agreed to, but apparently that was done by a phone call Monday while most of us were out of town. Are you aware of what transpired in that phone call?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I'm--

Senator Leahy. You have seen the transcript?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I have not read the whole transcript. I have seen some excerpts of the transcript that were reported in news articles, as well as other excerpts that I've seen.

Senator Leahy. I'd ask that the transcript be made part of the record if it's not already.

Chairman Specter. Without objection, it will be made part of the record.

Senator Leahy. They spoke of you as not having handled a case to verdict; is that right; you never tried a case to verdict, or have you?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That is correct, Senator. I have not been a trial lawyer. I think I'm in the same boat there with people like Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Breyer.

Senator Leahy. I am asking about you. We had a hearing on Chief Justice Roberts. I voted for him for Chief Justice, and I voted for him for the D.C. Circuit. I know Chief Justice Roberts. You are not Chief Justice Roberts. You have your own qualities, so let's just talk about you, if that is all right, if you do not mind.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I have not tried a case to verdict. I have been an appellate lawyer.

Senator Leahy. That was my question. They also said your litigation experiences over the years was in the company of senior counsel; is that correct?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I've argued many cases on my own, Senator Leahy. I've argued in the Supreme Court of the United States. I've argued in the Fifth Circuit. I've argued twice in the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Senator Leahy. Did you do those as the sole person arguing?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes, Senator.

Senator Leahy. Thank you.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, let me just add one thing. In one D.C. Circuit case there were two counsel that argued on our side, so I just want to be clear on that, but I also--I argued for myself on--it was a Government attorney client privilege case.

Senator Leahy. I was going to ask you about that, but you clarified it. Thank you.

Why did you take seven months to answer the written questions you were given after your hearing last time?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I take responsibility for that, and I'm happy to answer any additional questions.

Senator Leahy. Why did you take seven months?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, again, I take responsibility for that, and--

Senator Leahy. Of course you take responsibility for it. Obviously, they are your answers. But why seven months?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, if there was--I take responsibility for that. I think I had a misunderstanding, which is my responsibility. I'm happy to answer additional questions today that you may have, or other members of the Committee may have. Again, I take--

Senator Leahy. What was the misunderstanding?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I take responsibility for that.

Senator Leahy. Mr. Kavanaugh, we are not playing games.

I am just asking you a question.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes, Senator.

Senator Leahy. One of the--I will not go into one of the ways one judge described your conduct in court. I began to think that perhaps he was right. But I take responsibility, fine. That is kind of a catch-all. Everybody says that. I just asked you why? I mean is it that difficult?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, my understanding was that the timeline for the questions was to make sure they were in before the end of the congressional session because there was going to be no further action on my nomination in the Committee. I met that timeline. From a later letter that members of the Committee, that you signed, it appears that I had a misunderstanding of that, and I take responsibility for that, and I'm happy to answer any questions you have.

Senator Leahy. What was your reaction--as Staff Secretary, you see virtually every piece of paper that goes to the President; is that correct?

Mr. Kavanaugh. On many issues, yes, Senator. Not everything, but on many issues.

Senator Leahy. Did you see documents relating to the President's NSA warrantless wiretapping program?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I learned of that program when there was a New York Times story--reports of that program when there was a New York Times story that came over the wire, I think on a Thursday night in mid December of last year.

Senator Leahy. You had not seen anything, or had you heard anything about it prior to the New York Times article?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No.

Senator Leahy. Nothing at all?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Nothing at all.

Senator Leahy. What about the documents relating to the administration's policies and practice on torture; did you see anything about that, or did you first hear about that when you read about it in the paper?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think with respect to the legal justifications or the policies relating to the treatment of detainees, I was not aware of any issues on that or the legal memos that subsequently came out until the summer, sometime in 2004 when there started to be news reports on that. This was not part of my docket, either in the Counsel's Office or as Staff Secretary.

Senator Leahy. I have more questions. My time is up, and I will save them for the next round.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Thank you.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Leahy.

Senator Kyl.

Senator Kyl. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Just on that last point, I gather that in the briefings to the President by the CIA and other members of the intelligence agency, there were a lot of things that did not come across your desk, that they were given directly to the President; is that correct?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct.

Senator Kyl. I was not here, unfortunately, to hear the introduction of you, but I was impressed by what was said. It was written down for me, and I am very impressed that these judges for whom you clerked would have such a high opinion of you. Judge Kozinski, who is one of the finest judges that I know, said that you were one of the finest clerks he has had, and a breadth of mind and breadth of vision, and a great sense of humanity. And I think Judge Stapleton, a judge's dream as a law clerk, and that you understand the rule of precedent, exceptionally well qualified in terms of experience, superb candidate, and so on.

I think those are important because they represent the opinion of someone for whom we have a great deal of regard, as sitting appellate judges, of you, and I think that is an important qualification.

There have been a couple of questions raised about this matter of qualification, one, the ABA rating, and two, your relative age. I just want to talk about a couple of those here. As I understand it from Mr. Stephen Tober's statement, that this entire difference between qualified and well qualified boils down--and I will quote it from his statement, page 7, "It is, at its most basic, the difference between the highest standard and a very high standard." And so it seems to me that for us to try to make some distinction, and somehow deem you not qualified based upon that very fine distinction, is the establish a standard that we have never applied in this Committee in the past.

May I just ask you, how many of the people that rated you were there again who either rated you qualified or well qualified, and was there anyone who dissented from either of those two rankings?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, from the ABA ratings, there were 42 individual reviews conducted over the course of 3 years, and all 42 found me well qualified or qualified to sit on the D.C. Circuit.

Senator Kyl. So this seems to me, in terms of making a decision on this Committee, a distinction without a difference. I will just quote from page 9 and then move on to the next point. After talking about your breadth of experience, consistently praiseworthy statements, and so on, here is what Mr. Tober said: "The nominee enjoys a solid reputation for integrity, intellectual capacity, and writing and analytical ability." And it seems to me that that pretty well answers that point.

Now, this matter of age is something that perhaps we should take a look at. As was noted, several important nominees--Justice Kennedy, appointed to the Ninth Circuit we he was 38; Judge Kozinski, 35; Judge Stapleton, 35. I also note the current chief of the Ninth Circuit, my circuit, Marie Schroeder, 38 when she was appointed. Judge Sam Alito, age 40, all younger than you are. But it seems to me that we could actually take some solace from your age based upon the experience in this Committee, Mr. Chairman. We have to look no further than the distinguished ranking member of the Committee and the senior Senator from Massachusetts and the second-ranking member of this Committee to note that in all three cases of Senator Biden, Senator Kennedy, and Senator Leahy--

Senator Leahy. We were elected.

Senator Kyl. Elected at the age of 30, 30, and 34. And look what great things each of them accomplished from those early beginnings.

[Laughter.]

Senator Schumer. May I interrupt? Each of them has almost a lifetime appointment.

[Laughter.]

Senator Kyl. Well, we did not have any say in that.

Senator Leahy. My Republican State did.

Senator Kyl. And it certainly makes the point that at the constitutional age, that is, the age at which the Constitution says one must be qualified, we have elected to the United States Senate and confirmed to the courts of appeals and even the United States Supreme Court some incredibly qualified individuals who have acquitted themselves very well, and I count all of the colleagues whom I have mentioned here in that category. And, therefore, it seems to me that if that is any precedent, we have nothing but the greatest expectations for your service on the court of appeals, and I am very proud to add my voice to those who are in support of that nomination.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Kyl.

Senator Brownback?

Senator Brownback. Thanks, Mr. Chairman, and welcome, Mr. Kavanaugh. I appreciate your meeting with me. I think I am only one of two people on the Committee now that were not on the Committee when you previously--or the first time you came in front of the Committee, and I appreciated your time that you spent with me answering my questions. I appreciate the information you provided to my staff, and that has been very helpful in my decisionmaking process with you.

I want to ask a couple of questions that I find important. You may have answered them in other types of settings, but I wanted to look at--and they are general, but I think they are the sort of thing that we on the legislative side need to get out in the open for our decisionmaking--your view of the Constitution and the issue of judicial restraint. These were key items on Judge Roberts' and Judge Alito's hearings. They are important going to a circuit court.

Just if you would--and you have probably answered this already, and I apologize if you have and I have not heard it. But just give me your view of the Constitution as a document itself. Can you put yourself in a category? Do you have a view that it is established as a living document, as a strict constructionist of the Constitution itself?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I believe very much in interpreting text as it is written and not seeking to impose one's own personal policy preferences into the text of the document. I believe very much in judicial restraint, recognizing the primary policymaking role of the legislative branch in our constitutional democracy.

I believe very much, as a prospective inferior court judge, were I to be confirmed, in following the Supreme Court precedent strictly and absolutely. Once as a lower court judge, I think that is very important for the stability of our three-level system for lower courts to faithfully Supreme Court precedent, and so that is something that I think is very important.

In terms of the independence of the judiciary, I think that is something that is the hallmark of our judiciary, the hallmark of our system that judges are independent from the legislative branch and independent from the executive branch. I think that is central to my understanding of the proper judicial role.

So in terms of text, precedent, restraint, independence, those are the kinds of principles that I think would inform my approach to judicial decisionmaking were I to be confirmed.

Senator Brownback. Let me go specifically to the issue of judicial restraint, if I could, on that particular area. I believe it was Judge Roberts who noted that that is the--where a number of us are concerned about areas that the court has gotten involved in in recent years, and that that has really led to the public's concern about the judiciary in general because it keeps getting into more and more areas that many of us thought were the proper purview of the legislative process rather than the judicial branch. And so the judicial activism charge then gets put forward.

Several have said, well, the key restraint on the judiciary is the judiciary itself. And yet if the judiciary does not show restraint on what cases that it brings up or what cases that it takes, you know, the Congress is left to try to act on limiting review by the courts to try to amend the Constitution, to change the court interpretation, all of which are difficult things to do.

There was a case recently--we just held the flag-burning amendment that passed through the Subcommittee that I chair, and that is in response to the Court saying that you can burn the flag as a statement of free speech. And it was as a response to a court that overturned a prior court opinion saying you could not do it.

It is those sorts of things that I think really frustrate the public, and then the issue of marriage that is coming up that has been a longstanding issue for legislative process, coming now, working through the court system.

Do you have a viewpoint on issues, say, as marriage and the determination of the definition of that? Is that something that the court should establish or is it left to the legislative bodies?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Well, Senator, that is the kind of question that, were I to be confirmed, could come before me, so I would hesitate to talk about the specific issue.

In terms of your general principle about judicial activism, I do think that some of the worst moments in the Supreme Court's history have been moments of judicial activism, like the Dred Scott case, like the Lochner case, where the Court went outside its proper bounds, in my judgment, in interpreting clauses of the Constitution to impose its own policy views and to supplant the proper role of the legislative branch.

So I think in terms of judicial activism, that is something that all judges have to guard against. That is something that the Supreme Court has to guard against. And throughout our history, we have seen that some of the worst moments in the Supreme Court history have been moments of judicial activism where courts have imposed their own policy preferences.

Senator Brownback. Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Senator Brownback.

Let me make an assessment here as to a potential second round. Senator Leahy, do you care for a second round?

Senator Leahy. I do.

Chairman Specter. Senator Schumer?

Senator Schumer. Yes.

Chairman Specter. I infer that all those absent do not.

Senator Leahy. I would not infer. We will ask them on this side.

Chairman Specter. Could you find out?

Senator Leahy. We are doing that right now.

Chairman Specter. Senator Hatch?

Senator Hatch. Frankly, I will pass for now.

Chairman Specter. Senator Cornyn?

Senator Cornyn. Mr. Chairman, my intention would be to pass, but if questions come up during the questioning, if you would give me an opportunity to follow up on that. Otherwise, I will pass.

Chairman Specter. That is a qualified pass. All right.

Senator Hatch. Same here. Qualified pass.

Chairman Specter. Qualified pass for Senator Hatch.

Well, we will proceed with the second round. I think we will finish before 5 o'clock, as it appears to me, Mr. Kavanaugh. You declined a break 20 minutes ago. You may reconsider that without petition at any time you choose, if you would like a break.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am okay.

Chairman Specter. You are okay. Okay, then you have established a number of qualities without further comment.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. Mr. Kavanaugh, on the second round, which we begin now, I have noticed a reticence on your part to criticize people, not necessarily a bad habit. You did not want to criticize Karl Rove. You did not want to say how you would vote on impeachment to criticize President Clinton. You did not want to criticize Judge Pryor on Roe being an abomination. You did not want to criticize Judge Bybee on the Bybee memo. You did not want to criticize Mr. Manny Miranda. You did not want to criticize Judge Pickering. You did not even want to criticize the American Bar Association.

Now, I do not consider that--and you did not want to criticize Justice Scalia or Justice Thomas. I do not consider that necessarily bad qualities. Senators sometimes criticize people. In fact, it is seldom when we do not. That seems to be a stock in trade by the United States Senators, and perhaps most people in public office. Maybe that is our calling really in connection with our oversight responsibilities.

But let's take up the values behind your declination to criticize. As to what Judge Pickering is alleged to have done--never mind the hypothetical--would you ask lawyers to write letters for you? If you were a judge sitting on their cases, and you were under consideration for a higher court, would you do that?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. When you were asked about Mr. Manny Miranda, the investigation is still ongoing, but there has been considerable information about his having invaded the Democrats' computer system and downloaded and used it for partisan political purposes. Now, without characterizing it as larceny, would you engage in that kind of a practice?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Would you sanction or participate in torture?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Would you accept the principle that you could inflict any amount of pain in order to get information, as long as you were seeking information, no limit as to the amount of pain you would inflict?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Would you engage in rendition, send a suspect to a foreign country where torture was a practice, in order to get information where you would not have to commit the torture on U.S. soil?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No, Mr. Chairman. I do not want to--no,

Mr. Chairman. I think that is an issue I have not been involved in. I do not know the facts and circumstances--

Chairman Specter. I know you have not been involved in it, but now we are trying to find out your values.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Right, and I--

Chairman Specter. You have not criticized certain people, and somebody may say you have not answered the question, so let's go beyond the hypothetical or let's go beyond the criticism, and let's take up the values, which is what I am asking you now.

Now, you did not want to criticize Justice Scalia or Justice Thomas, but when you were asked the question would you consider yourself in their mold, you selected Justice Byron White and Justice Robert Jackson.

Now, Mr. Kavanaugh, there may be some implicit criticism there, but we will move beyond that. Why do you choose Justice White? What are his qualities distinguished from Justice Scalia or Justice Thomas that you choose Justice White?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I do not want to comment on currently sitting Justices. The reason I chose Justice White is for several reasons: He was a rock of integrity. His work as Deputy Attorney General in the Department of Justice enforcing the civil rights laws in the early 1960s I think was heroic. I think his approach to judging, judicial restraint, in terms of recognizing the primary policy--

Chairman Specter. Okay. That is enough. Why did you choose Justice Jackson?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I chose Justice Jackson--

Chairman Specter. You are not permitted to filibuster, Mr. Kavanaugh.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Why did you choose Jackson?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I chose Justice Jackson because of, again, his leading role in the Department of Justice, being involved in the public--

Chairman Specter. That is enough, Mr. Kavanaugh.

Now, on independent counsel, you have some criticism of the structure of independent counsel on the operation you had with Judge Starr, and that is why you made some recommendations for changes, right?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. And you have a value not to exclude blacks, African Americans, on peremptory challenges. That is your value.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes, Mr. Chairman, and I believe in proper procedures to make sure that racial bias does not occur in the courtroom in the jury selection process.

Chairman Specter. Okay. My red light went on on round two. I will yield now to Senator Leahy.

Senator Leahy. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

You know, the reason I kept asking about your taking 7 months to answer the questions and why I found your answer inadequate, you did spend years vetting judicial nominees up here and telling them what they were supposed to do and everything else. And it is difficult to understand, having told them how they are supposed to answer, that you did not understand yourself.

Be that as it may, tomorrow the White House is finally going to release its logs of visitors to the White House, having been forced by a Federal judge to do so, something they did not want to do. So I ask you this: Do you know Mr. Abramoff?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I do not.

Senator Leahy. Have you ever met him or seen him at the White House?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No.

Senator Leahy. Have you ever met Susan Ralston, who is Karl Rove's personal assistant at the White House, formerly worked as Mr. Abramoff's secretary?

Mr. Kavanaugh. She works in the Deputy Chief of Staff's office today.

Senator Leahy. You know her.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I do know her, yes, sir.

Senator Leahy. Thank you. Have you ever met David Safavian?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No.

Senator Leahy. When did you learn that he was being investigated for receiving illegal payments?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, on that matter, I think whatever I learned, I learned reading the newspapers.

Senator Leahy. So prior to the time it became public that he was being charged, you did not know about it prior to that time?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct, Senator.

Senator Leahy. Have you ever met Michael Scanlon?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No.

Senator Leahy. When did you learn that he was being investigated for criminal activities? These are all people from the White House. That is why I am asking.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I don't think Michael Scanlon worked at the White House. I could be wrong about that.

Senator Leahy. He was connected--well, go ahead. When did you first learn of his--

Mr. Kavanaugh. Again, reading the newspapers is all I know about that matter.

Senator Leahy. And what about the disclosure of the identity of Valerie Plame?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I do not know anything about the facts and circumstances of that matter.

Senator Leahy. So you did not do anything about it or were not required to do anything about it? You did not do anything about it?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I didn't know anything about the facts and circumstances of that matter. I know it's under investigation, of course, and it's not part of my responsibilities nor have I learned about it.

Senator Leahy. So what you would know about it would be what you have gotten from news sources, public sources?

Mr. Kavanaugh. What I've read in the newspapers, that's correct. I do not know the facts and circumstances of that matter. It is under investigation, of course.

Senator Leahy. Did you see documents of the President relating to the NSA's warrantless wiretapping program?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No.

Senator Leahy. What about documents related to the administration's policies and practice on torture? Did you see any documents on that whatsoever, according to the President?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No. The only time I have learned of the legal memos and have read some of them was after there was public disclosure of some of those memos in the summer of 2004, and I think in late 2004 or early 2005 I might have read some of those memos. Of course, they had already been publicly released at that point.

Senator Leahy. What about the Presidential signing statements that indicated reservation on the part of the President regarding provisions in law passed by the Congress? You have seen those signing statements, have you not?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Signing statements come through the staff secretary's office and also when I was in the counsel's office before that, the counsel's office sometimes has a role in signing statements. So signing statements traditionally for past Presidents and this President identified potential constitutional issues such as Appointments Clause, Presentment Clause, or record--

Senator Leahy. These signing statements reserving the President's rights of whether to follow or not follow some parts of the law that he is signing, there have been more--you said this has been done by past Presidents, but there have been more done by this President than all past Presidents put together. So let me ask you this: There was a great deal of publicity here on the Hill and at the White House when the President signed the so-called McCain amendment against torture or inhuman treatment of detainees and prisoners, far less fanfare a couple days later there was a signing statement to basically reserve--the President reserved the right to determine who is going to have to follow the law. Did you see that signing statement?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I did see that signing statement, Senator.

Senator Leahy. What was your reaction to it?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, the President has made clear that the United States and this Government does not torture or condone--

Senator Leahy. That is not my question. Do you believe that the President had a right to reserve the exercise of parts of that law that he might not like or to reserve its application to certain people?

Mr. Kavanaugh. My understanding of that signing statement, which is what the President's spokesman said a few days after it was issued, and questions like the one you are raising were raised to him, is that the President intends to follow that law as written. He shook hands with Senator McCain in the Oval Office about that. He has made clear and the President's spokesman made clear that the administration will follow that law as written, as I understand it.

Senator Leahy. Then why the--I mean, you saw the signing statement. It passed through your hands. Why have a signing statement then that basically reserves the President's right not to follow the law if he does not want to? Why do that? Do you have any qualms about these kind of signing statements?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, that signing statement, as I recall it, identified a number of issues other than the one you are talking about. On the specific sentence that relates to the question you are raising, I believe the signing statement identified that this fell into something that the President has authority on, to go back to Justice Jackson's Youngstown concurrence that I--

Senator Leahy. Well, that also makes it very clear if there is a law that the President's ability to act, as Justice Jackson pointed out, is at its absolute minimum.

Let me ask you this: Does the President, if he is claiming a Commander-in-Chief override or anything else, does he have the authority to authorize or excuse the use of torture in interrogations of enemy prisoners despite domestic and international laws prohibiting the practice?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, the President under Article II of the Constitution has the constitutional responsibility to follow the Constitution and the laws passed by the Congress of the United States. That is part of his responsibility, including--

Senator Leahy. In treaties we--

Chairman Specter. Let him finish his answer.

Senator Leahy. I want to make--

Chairman Specter. No, no. Let him finish his answer. He is in the middle of an answer.

Senator Leahy. Go ahead.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Including the laws against torture reflected in 18 U.S.C. 2340 and related provisions, including other statutes passed by this body. That is part of his Article II responsibility.

Senator Leahy. Including treaties that this country has entered into, which have become the law of the land once we have entered into them.

Mr. Kavanaugh. When the treaty is the law of the land, the President has the constitutional responsibility to follow the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States.

Senator Leahy. So is your answer--and I do not want to interrupt you from answering. Does the President have the authority to authorize or excuse the use of torture in interrogation of enemy prisoners when there are domestic or international laws that we have entered into prohibiting the practice?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, the President has said that the administration follows the law, that the United States does not torture, that the United States does not condone torture, the United States does not participate in torture. The President has said that many times. He said he met with Senator McCain in the Oval Office on one statute. The President's spokesman clarified a question you raised and said that the President intends to follow that law as written.

Senator Leahy. You know, it is funny, but I would think differently after Abu Ghraib and after the rendition by Americans under the authority of the Commander-in-Chief, renditioning of people to countries knowing they would be tortured.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Leahy.

Senator Hatch, anything further?

Senator Hatch. Let me take just a few seconds. You know, I do not know why we needed this second hearing. In fact, I know we did not. Everybody had a shot at the first hearing and, frankly, I do not see any reason--and especially when I read through this transcript of the ABA. Here is what they say: "This nominee"--I am just reading a few of the accolades towards you. And, by the way, I read the ABA description of each member on the Standing Committee. A number of them are Democrats, have very strongly supported Democratic Senators and others, but found you not only qualified but well qualified.

Here is what they say: "This nominee enjoys a solid reputation of integrity, intellectual capacity, and writing and analytical ability. The concern has been and remains focused on the breadth of his professional experience and the most recent supplemental evaluation has enhanced that concern. Taken in combination with the additional concern of whether this nominee is so insulated that he should be unable to judge fairly in the future and placed alongside the consistently praiseworthy statements about the nominee in many other areas, the 2006 rating can be seen in context."

And then he said, when he was asked by Mr. Jensen whether--you know, you provided a few negative quotes about Mr. Kavanaugh in your written statement. He said, "Let me underscore, Pete, that we did not find him not qualified. There is not a breath of bad in this report or the earlier report. We found him qualified, minority well qualified. What I said at the end is that, in fact, many people said he has a solid reputation for integrity, intellectual capacity. A lot of people refer to him as brilliant and an excellent writing and analytical ability. These are great skills to bring to the court of appeals."

Now, these are just a few of the comments. Let me just give a couple others.

Mr. Tober again for the Bar Association: "The positive factors haven't changed a whole lot. He is found to have high integrity. He is found to be brilliant. He is a very skilled writer and legal analyst. He has those components. And I have said this before, but I think you were probably doing better things. He has those skills that will serve him well certainly on a Federal court."

Well, I asked him, I said, "I just wanted to mention that I am correct in looking at the record that he has had some 24 people evaluate him, and not one has found him not qualified." Mr. Tober of the Bar Association: "I don't know the number to be 24. I would take your word on that. But it is true there is not a single `not qualified' vote in the picture."

I wonder what all the fuss is about. Frankly, to force a second hearing--now, I acknowledge our colleagues have a right to do that, but the fact of the matter is I have not heard anything here today that would cause anybody to vote against you who is fair. I have just got to say, you know, I came here expecting to hear some bombastic things that might show that they think you might not be qualified to sit on the court. My gosh, your experience is virtually, other than the law firm experience where you were a partner in Kirkland and Ellis, one of the greatest law firms in the country, your experience has been an experience of service. And everybody with whom you have worked has felt the same way.

I want to put in the record, Mr. Chairman, a whole list of letters from former Attorneys General, former Solicitors General, your classmates, bipartisan, both Democrats and Republicans, all of whom support you wholly and without reservation.

Again, I just say, you know, I do not want to question my colleagues. They have a right to ask these questions, and I suspect they had a right to call for this second meeting. But I have not heard anything here today that justifies having had the second meeting.

Now, all I can say is that I am proud to support you because I believe that the Bar Association is right here.

Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Hatch.

Senator Schumer?

Senator Schumer. Thank you, and I would say to my good friend from Utah, hope springs eternal. Many of us had hoped that maybe Mr. Kavanaugh would answer some of the questions he did not answer in the first hearing in the writings, but he has not, in general.

In your written responses to Senator Durbin, you said--well, let me first--you said you were not involved in the nomination process either of Mr. Haynes or of Judge Bybee. Is that right? You said that in reference to questions asked before?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I did not have primary responsibility--

Senator Schumer. I did not ask that. Were you involved?

Mr. Kavanaugh. There is a committee that meets to discuss prospective judicial nominees.

Senator Schumer. Were you involved in those discussions? Did you voice opinions about Haynes and Bybee at that committee?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I don't remember the timing of that, but if it was when I was in the counsel's office, it would have come through the Judicial Selection Committee when I was part of it, and it would have been part of the committee's--

Senator Schumer. Can you give me a yes or no answer? Were you involved in discussions involving the nominations of Haynes or Bybee?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I believe those were when I was still in the counsel's office, so the answer would be yes.

Senator Schumer. Thank you. I think before you--

Mr. Kavanaugh. I want to--

Senator Schumer. I would just like--I do not have the record in front of me, but I would like to look at what you said in reference to other people's questions there.

Here is what you said in your written questions in response. You said, "It is fair to say that all of the attorneys in the White House Counsel's Office who worked on judges, usually ten lawyers, participated in discussions and meetings concerning all of the President's judicial nominees."

Do you remember, were you supportive of the nominations of Haynes and Bybee at the time?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I don't remember talking about them, but they were members of the administration who people had worked with and knew. So I don't--

Senator Schumer. You don't remember talking--

Chairman Specter. Let him finish his answer.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I assume it would have come up at a Judicial Selection Committee meeting, and maybe I should explain how that works, Senator.

Senator Schumer. I don't have that kind--unless I can have a little extra time, and I would be happy to let him explain.

Chairman Specter. Well, that is part of the answer to the question, Senator Schumer.

Senator Schumer. Okay. Then I will--I will not--

Chairman Specter. You can have an extra 2 minutes. Go ahead.

Senator Schumer. Well, that is very kind of you. Thanks, Mr. Chairman. Go ahead.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Judge Gonzales, when he was counsel, set up a committee which included members of the White House Counsel's Office as well as Justice Department officials. Within the White House Counsel's Office, one of the associate counsel--there were eight of us--would ordinarily be assigned to particular States, particular circuit seats, so--

Senator Schumer. I understand that. I am just asking a--

Chairman Specter. Senator Schumer, let him finish his answer.

Senator Schumer. Mr. Chairman, please, we have limited--all right. Then I will ask for a third round, because there is limited time here, and we know the general structure. It is described in the writings. I am asking a specific question. I am asking whether Mr. Kavanaugh can recall whether he was supportive in those discussions. He said here, it is fair to say, all of the attorneys participated in the discussions concerning all of the President's judicial nominations. He is brilliant. He went to every law school--or the best law schools--Haynes and Bybee, no, he cannot. Okay. I am now on that. He said so he probably did.

I am asking if he remembers being supportive of either of those nominees, not--you were not in charge of those nominees.

We have established that three times over. Were you supportive in those general discussions, which you say all of the attorneys participated in?

Mr. Kavanaugh. If both of them were nominated before July 2003, then the answer is yes.

Senator Schumer. Were you supportive?

Chairman Specter. Now he is right in the middle of an answer, Senator Schumer. Let him finish.

Senator Schumer. That as not my question.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Then the answer would have been yes, because it would have come before the Judicial Selection Committee.

Senator Schumer. Thank you. Now, let me ask you this.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, if I may--

Senator Schumer. Please.

Mr. Kavanaugh. What question--the answer is yes, that they would have been discussed at the Judicial Selection Committee.

Senator Schumer. I thought you were answering--so, please, answer my question, not the general procedure. Were you supportive of the nominations of Haynes and Bybee when they came before that committee? Did you dissent? Did you say nothing? Were you supportive?

Mr. Kavanaugh. With respect to--this is a line that I think Judge Gonzales has maintained--with respect to individual deliberations about prospective judicial nominees, that's something that it's not appropriate for me to disclose in this context.

Senator Schumer. And why is that?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Because the President benefits from having candid and full discussions of his prospective judicial nominees, and for those to be candid, there has to be a guarantee of confidentiality there.

Senator Schumer. Let me ask you this. Do you ever recall having dissented when a name was brought before this committee in the general discussions? Did you ever--to any of them, do you ever recall having dissented and saying, "I don't think this person should be put forward?"

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, in all the deliberations that we've had on judges and other issues, I've never been a shrinking violet. I've always been--put forward my views, and you can assume I put forward my views strongly. Once Judge Gonzales or the President makes a decision, I also adhere to that decision.

Senator Schumer. I understand. I am asking you did you dissent about potential nominees before--when the committee discussed it before the President made a decision? You were the committee that was vetting these people.

Mr. Kavanaugh. And I'm giving you an answer that says there was a lot of deliberations. A lot of people would debate the merits of nominations, and you can assume that various people would disagree about particular nominees.

Senator Schumer. Did you disagree?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I don't want--

Senator Schumer. To any of these nominees, any of these potential nominees when it came before the committee? You said you are a person of strong opinion, which you are. I know that, or my colleague, the Chairman, said you did not criticize this list of people, but I have a long list of people you were free to criticize, who happen to be at a different political viewpoint. But that is not what I am asking here. I am asking you, did you object and say, "I don't think this person or that person should be nominated," when you were in this committee?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I do not think it's appropriate--

Senator Schumer. I am not asking a specific person.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I do not think it's appropriate for members of the President's staff to disclose whether they agreed or disagreed with recommendations on particular judicial nominees.

Senator Schumer. Why is not appropriate? There is no privilege, I presume?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Because that would chill the candid discussion that the President benefits from in hearing advice about prospective--

Senator Schumer. You mean not to mention a specific name, but to simply ask someone whether they dissented on any would chill discussion? That if you admitted you dissented on some, then people would be chilled from saying that? I did not ask a particular name.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I'm saying that there were candid deliberations in the judicial selection process.

Senator Schumer. We know that.

Mr. Kavanaugh. That there would be particular people that would come up for consideration, and there would be debate about them.

Senator Schumer. Did you dissent? Did you ever say in the meetings, "I don't think this particular person belongs on the bench?" That is not a question that should chill anybody. That, in fact, I would argue, sir, is your obligation to answer us. We do not have much of a record here. My colleagues here, justifiably, have said you have had a lot of Government service and that is what justifies you. We try to find out anything about that Government service, and we do not get an answer. Now, what is the harm to future deliberations of future counsels, deputy counsels, by your saying I did or I did not dissent and say certain people should not be on the bench, other than you just do not want to answer the question for us, and we cannot compel you, particularly when everyone on the other side is going to vote for you no matter what you say.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, let me try it this way. On a previous question you had, I said I needed to check with the counsel. I went back. Karl Rove does participate in the White House Judicial Selection Committee.

Senator Schumer. Thank you.

Mr. Kavanaugh. On this question I would like also to go back to the counsel, if I could, and I'll try to provide you a timely answer in the same way.

Senator Schumer. But I have some follow-up questions I would then ask you to answer as well. What was the basis of your dissent? I do not want to ask about specific people. I would like to. I think it is relevant, but there you might have an argument. I would also like you then, if the counsel says that it is okay to answer, that you tell us the basis for the dissent. Was it temperament? Was it ideology? Was it this? Was it that?

Chairman Specter. Senator Schumer, you are two minutes over the extended time. That means you are 9 minutes plus into this questioning. How much longer would you like?

Senator Schumer. I would like another few minutes. I think it is important. I cannot tell you. It depends where the questions go, but I will not take a half hour. I will not take much time.

Chairman Specter. Well, we are going to go--

Senator Schumer. I think this is-- Chairman Specter. You are almost up to 10 minutes. We are going to go to this side for a minute or two, and we will come back to you for another round.

Senator Schumer. Thank you. That is just fine. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Senator Schumer, I do not want you to be cut short.

When you say that everybody on this side is going to vote in favor of Mr. Kavanaugh, if that raises any suggestion that everybody on this side is not going to vote against him, that might draw some raised eyebrows.

Senator Schumer. Mr. Chairman--

Chairman Specter. Now wait a minute. It is my five minutes. Start the clock. I am on round 3, because Senator Schumer is going to have round 3. And I will come back to you too, Senator Coburn.

I have listened to your testimony very carefully, Mr. Kavanaugh, but, frankly, it has been hard because there have been so many interruptions. But let me plow this ground again to see if I understand what you have said.

You have said that when you had a certain job up till 2003, it was your responsibility to sit on a panel, a group of people evaluating judges; is that right?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct, Senator.

Chairman Specter. And then when you changed jobs, it was no longer your responsibility to sit on a panel evaluating judges?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. And what date is that?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That would be early July 2003.

Chairman Specter. And that is when you changed from being an Assistant White House Counsel to being Staff Secretary?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct.

Chairman Specter. Now, you said that you are no shrinking violet and you disagreed when you thought that there was somebody up whom you disagreed with as to their qualifications. Isn't that what you said?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. And you would not specify which individuals you disagreed on?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No.

Chairman Specter. You are not going to specify which individuals you disagree on because you think that is part of the deliberative process and it would unfairly impinge on freedom of discussion there, or a chilling effect. Is that what you have testified to, the Senator Schumer?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Now, you also testified, as I could de-garble it through the interruptions, that you do not remember which people you disagreed on, or do you remember which people you disagreed on? I am not asking you which ones they were, but do you recall the specific individuals whom you thought should not be submitted for a judgeship?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think the question here is because there can be multiple candidates for a particular judgeship that would come up, and you may rank them differently from how the ultimate decision comes out. That doesn't mean that the final selection is a bad decision.

Chairman Specter. Are you saying then that you never said as to any, "I think they're unqualified," but only that you ranked them?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Well, Mr. Chairman, I don't think I should talk about that issue, at least without checking.

Chairman Specter. Well, let's explore that for just a minute. We are talking about generalized procedures, and you sit on a panel. This is while you are Assistant White House Counsel. And you are asked about a number of possible nominees for a judgeship. That is the procedure. Do you feel comfortable answering that?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes. Yes, Mr. Chairman, that's the procedure.

Chairman Specter. You have said that you are not a shrinking violet and you speak your mind. So at some point you either disagreed with the qualification of an individual, or thought that they fell behind some others in terms of a ranking system. Is that a fair inference or conclusion from your testimony?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think it is, Mr. Chairman. The one thing I want to be careful about is talking about the qualifications of an individual as opposed to ranking individuals. And that's, in terms of the qualifications of an individual, some people are more qualified than others. You may rank them differently from how some other members of the committee, and you may disagree with the ultimate selection. I'm sure that happens all the time in any process like that.

Chairman Specter. I am sure it does too. That is what you are testifying about. How many individuals were you considering, many, many, many, were you not?

Mr. Kavanaugh. There have been hundreds, Senator, that have been confirmed, and that means that there are many hundreds more, because you assume for each one of those spots--

Chairman Specter. Okay, so we are in the hundreds.

Mr. Kavanaugh. It could be over a thousand.

Chairman Specter. I am not asking you whom you disagreed with or whom you ranked where. Do you remember among those hundreds you confirmed and hundreds more you considered, among those hundreds and hundreds of people, can you recall specific individuals and rankings at this time, some three years after the fact?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I certainly, Mr. Chairman, do not recall the specific deliberations. I do recall some, of course, and that is natural. It is also natural for there to be debate and discussion on judicial nominations by the Judicial Selection Committee. That's what we want so that the President gets the best advice, the best recommendations of the staff.

Chairman Specter. Okay. There are some that you recollect because they stand out for one reason or another, right? Correct?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. And you are not prepared to identify those individuals because you believe that would restrict the candid discussion. We have been through this on Chief Justice Roberts, on the Solicitor General's Office. We have been through it on a lot of decisionmaking processes, and I do not want to get into the question about limited privilege here today. I just want to understand your thinking as to why, among those whom you remember, you will not identify. And as I think you have testified in response to Senator Schumer, but I am not sure because of the garbled nature with the interruptions, that you will not be specific even as to those whom you remember because you do not want to impinge upon that deliberative process. Is that right?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Senator Schumer, you have five more minutes, and then we are going to wrap up your side.

Senator Leahy. I just wanted to respond to something that you said, Mr. Chairman, this idea of a closed mind. I spent 17 months as Chairman of this Committee.

Chairman Specter. Let's start the clock if Senator Leahy is speaking.

Senator Leahy. I spent 17 months as Chairman of this Committee during President Bush's term. We moved 100 judges. We have had two Republican chairmen since. Both are friends of mine. Neither one of them have moved President Bush's nominees as through as fast as I did. So let's not talk about closed minds or the partisanship. And we did this notwithstanding the fact that the Republicans had pocket-filibustered 64 of President Clinton's nominees in the few years leading up to that. We Democrats moved 100 of President Bush's nominees through in 17 months, an all-time record.

Now, what I want to know is how do you approach recusal? You have been a key member of the Bush-Cheney administration. We have a President making sweeping claims, nearly unchecked executive power. A number of these matters, issues are going to come before the D.C. Circuit, assuming we have any check and balances. The Congress has not done much in the way--with some few notable exceptions, has not done much in the way of checks and balances. The rest of America waits for the courts to do that. How do you determine what you are going to recuse yourself from? What about if it is a challenge to the administration's practice of rendition, of sending people to other countries to be tortured? What if it is about the administration's interrogation practices in detention? What about their wiretapping of Americans without warrants through NSA? Where do you recuse yourself?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, if I am confirmed to the D.C. Circuit, I will do the analysis under 28 U.S.C. 455. There are some specific recusal obligations in Section 455(b), which I would of course follow. There's also a more general recusal prescription in Section 455(a), which talks about when a judge's impartiality reasonably might be questioned. I would do the analysis of that by looking at the precedents. There have been other people have gone from the executive branch to the judicial branch, of course. I would do it by consulting with my colleagues, and do it by looking at the facts and circumstances of each particular case.

I think it's hard to make a recusal determination in the abstract here--

Senator Leahy. Would you think if a question came up about the administration's practice, the Bush-Cheney administration's practice of rendition of people to other countries, would that at least raise a red flag in your mind?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, on recusal questions generally, I don't think I can--because I haven't done the work necessary--identify specific cases, and we don't know what those cases might be where I might recuse. I can pledge to you a serious process. I understand there could be issues. I would follow the precedents, look at the precedents, consult with my colleagues.

Senator Leahy. What if it is questioning a policy or practice with which you were involved at the White House, either forming the policy or making the decisions; would that be a pretty easy one?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Well, I think without knowing exactly where you're saying, on 28 U.S.C. 455(b), there's a specific prohibition that applies to Government lawyers who have worked on certain matters, and depending on the hypothetical, if that fell within that, I would have no hesitation about recusing. And just generally, Senator, I would have no hesitation about recusing. I just want to do the work and know the facts and circumstances before I make any determination.

Senator Leahy. These are not dissimilar to questions I asked Judge Roberts both when he was up for D.C. Circuit, and the Supreme Court. In his case, I was satisfied with his answer, and I voted for him, in his case.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, Senator Feingold is not able to return for another round. He has written a follow-up letter to Mr. Kavanaugh. I ask that that letter be made part of the record.

Chairman Specter. Without objection it can be made part of the record, but he is not seeking follow-up answers from the witness, is he?

Senator Leahy. I think that this is--yes, there is a specific one which the nominee has expressed a willingness to respond, so that is very specific. Mr. Kavanaugh has been handed this. He has not seen it yet. The staff has--

Chairman Specter. I want all the questions for Mr. Kavanaugh to be asked because as stated during our Executive last week, it is the intention to vote on him on Thursday, and he is going to stay here long enough within reason to answer the questions.

Senator Leahy. Well, I would hope that he would look at this, and I would hope that he might be prepared to answer. I think it can be done fairly quickly.

Chairman Specter. Let me take a look at it first, and give him a copy, and I will pass it on to him, and meanwhile we will go on to Senator Coburn for a round of questions.

Senator Coburn. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Kavanaugh, does the president have--

Chairman Specter. But we are coming back to you, Senator Schumer.

Senator Coburn. --an obligation to try to preserve presidential powers through signing statements? Is that not the purpose for them?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Presidential signing statements have been used throughout our history, Senator, and particularly in the last four Presidents that I'm aware of, to identify specific constitutional issues that can arise in provisions of statutes. They're usually focused on things like the Appointments Clause. Suppose there's a new board or commission and there's an Appointments Clause issue. The Recommendations Clause, when reports are required that might be inconsistent with the Recommendations Clause. This is part of the conversation, the dialogue, that the executive and the legislative branch have on issues like this through the years.

Senator Coburn. But it is an important function of the president to elicit those areas of potential conflict on a constitutional basis, and to put a statement from the sitting President in in regards to those. Is that not correct?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That is correct, Senator, and Presidents have been doing that throughout our history.

Senator Coburn. So a reasonable man could believe somebody would not necessarily believe in torture, but might put something into the record on a signing statement that might be related to preserve presidential powers or appointments or some other area, and not necessarily believing in torture, but be castigated that they do believe in torture because they happened to put that in, not for the purpose of torture, but for the purpose of protecting and enhancing or--not enhancing--protecting and securing what was there before in terms of presidential powers. Is that not--a reasonable could not think that?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, presidential signing statements, I think, the Counsel's Office in particular in the Department of Justice, seek to rely on the precedents of the executive branch and legislative branch interaction, where there have been issues identified, and when new legislation comes up, say an Appointments Clause issue, a Presentment Clause issue, or Recommendations Clause issue, to identify that kind of issue.

That's been done throughout our history, and I think it's very traditional.

Senator Coburn. Would you think much of a President, who if they just ignored not doing that, they just decided, well, that is not important, I am not going to do that?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I think all the Presidents, at least in modern times, have identified issues when they come up. And again, it's part of the conversation, part of the healthy back and forth between the executive and the legislative when these kinds of issues come up.

Senator Coburn. But it is also done to preserve a point of view, so that when it is looked at in the future, somebody can understand what the debate was at that time; is that not correct?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Exactly, Senator. Puts it on the record. People know. It's an open process. Then there can be discussion about issues that might be, for example, an Appointments Clause problem with a new board or commission, then there can be discussion back and forth. If there is a problem, it can be fixed in a subsequent statute, for example.

Senator Coburn. Do you believe President Bush's statements on torture?

Mr. Kavanaugh. President Bush has said the United States does not torture, condone torture--

Senator Coburn. I know what he said. I am asking you do you believe him?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Absolutely, Senator.

Senator Coburn. So you do not have any heartburn over his signing statements in regard to anything if they are consistent with what he said and what he believes?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's absolutely correct, Senator. He has stated that the United States will not torture, does not condone torture, follows the laws against torture. He's made that clear.

Senator Coburn. Thank you.

I yield back, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Coburn.

Senator Schumer, you had a little over 10 minutes on an opening statement, 6-1/2 minutes on your first round, a little over 10 minutes on the last round. I want to conclude by five o'clock. You have five more minutes.

Senator Schumer. Mr. Chairman, it is a lifetime appointment, and I think we should be allowed to ask questions. You put people in a box. If he goes on, I do not get a chance to answer all my questions. If I try to get to my answer by cutting him short, you take some umbrage. I do not think that is a fair way to proceed. Okay?

Chairman Specter. Well, I do not cut short. I asked you not to cut him short.

Senator Schumer. Well, then just give me the time that I need instead of telling me we must end at five o'clock for a lifetime appointment.

Chairman Specter. Well, your questions may exceed the tenure of his appointment, Senator Schumer.

Senator Schumer. No. My questions are fair questions for somebody who is going to have tremendous power. I think they are relevant.

Chairman Specter. Let's put the clock back to five minutes, and start in, and see how we do.

Senator Schumer. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate it. And I just make a couple of quick comments here.

First, I did not ask you, Mr. Kavanaugh, although Senator Specter interpreted it that way, to name specific judges. I asked you did you ever dissent--and I was explicit--not on specific judges. And you said to me you would not be able to answer that question until you checked with counsel. Is that correct?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct, Senator.

Senator Schumer. Did you then answer Senator Specter saying you did dissent? Did you change that answer? That is what I am trying to figure out here.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think it goes, Senator, to whether there was a different rank order in particular discussions, or whether you thought someone was unqualified for the--

Senator Schumer. I never asked about a rank order. I asked you--

Mr. Kavanaugh. It just came up.

Senator Schumer. Yes, Senator Specter did, but he was saying what I asked you, and he was not interpreting what I asked you. I asked you explicitly, was there ever a nominee--you don't have to name him, and I was explicit--that you thought should not go forward and you said that? Not where you ranked him, but that you said should not go forward and you ranked him. Now, you said to me, as I recall--we can check the transcript--that you were not sure you could answer that question, although I expressed befuddlement as to why because we were not asking a specific name. Are you will to say that you blocked certain--not blocked--that you urged that certain potential nominees not go forward, or do you want to go to counsel and see if you can answer that question?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I'm sure I, in the course of 2-1/2 years of debate over judges, I'm sure that all of us had preferences that weren't reflected in the final decision. Is that your question?

Senator Schumer. My question is did you, do you recall having ever stated that you do not think X potential nominee should move forward for whatever reason?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I'm confident, Senator, that on occasion, I would have rank ordered them differently from how the--so that the final decision was different from what my recommendation would have been.

Senator Schumer. I did not ask that. I asked you did you ever express, at these meeting of the 10 counsel, this person should not be nominated? Do you want to go back and check your recollection and answer in writing before tomorrow?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Can I just ask a follow up?

Senator Schumer. Please.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Which is, do you mean should not go forward, period, regardless of who else was in the mix? Is that the-- Senator Schumer. I mean, yes, that a person, regardless of who is in the mix, there might be certain people who you did not think deserved to be on the bench, whether someone else was in the mix or not?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think that kind of question goes to the heart of the deliberative process that the President relies on for picking judges, to talk about whether you disagreed with the final selection, really, that's something the President--

Senator Schumer. Okay. I am not asking an explicit name. I am just asking whether that happened. And you cannot recall, you cannot give me a yes or no answer to that?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, again, I think that would go to the heart of the deliberative process. As I understand it, it's important to protect the deliberative process so that the President gets the best advice. When the President makes a decision to nominate someone, it defeats the process for members of the staff subsequently to go out and say, "Well, I disagreed with the President on that," or even if you don't name names, to say, "I disagreed with some of his selections," that's--

Senator Schumer. I think that is--

Mr. Kavanaugh. --inconsistent with--

Senator Schumer. Is--

Chairman Specter. Let him finish, Senator Schumer.

Senator Schumer. I have 1:27 left here. Are you going to let me ask a few more questions if I might?

Chairman Specter. How many?

Senator Schumer. I do not know. A few.

Chairman Specter. Finish your answer, Mr. Kavanaugh, if you can remember where you were.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think that's inconsistent with the deliberative process that the President needs to rely on to pick the best judges for the Federal judiciary.

Senator Schumer. I fail to see any reason. I think people are put on the committee to make that very decision, and I have a lot of questions. It put my questions I my mind why you refuse to answer that question. But let's move on.

You did say you would check with counsel earlier, and then you came back to me about Karl Rove, and you said he was involved in the process. Okay. In what capacity was he involved? How often did he consult with you and the other counsels about prospective nominees?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Again, Senator, he's part of the committee. The committee meets weekly. I'm not sure how often he attended. I know he participated though.

Senator Schumer. Was it more than once?

Mr. Kavanaugh. He was a regular participant.

Senator Schumer. A regular participant in the committee of 10?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Well, it's actually much bigger than 10. The committee--

Senator Schumer. But he was a regular participant in the decisions?

Mr. Kavanaugh. In the committee process there's many more than 10. I'd say it's about--

Senator Schumer. And what do you recall--

Chairman Specter. He is right in the middle of an answer, Senator Schumer.

Senator Schumer. Go ahead.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I just want to be careful to make sure you understood that the committee, at least when I was on it--I don't--haven't gone since 2003--but included all the people in the White House Counsel's Office plus several Justice Department lawyers, plus people from other White House offices like the Legislative Office on occasion it k would attend. So it's many more than 10. I don't know the exact number though.

Senator Schumer. And did he ever discuss politics relevant to why this judge should go forward or that one should not, like it is am important State to us, it is an important reason, so-and-so wants him? Did that ever come up?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I think it's important not to disclose the internal deliberations that might occur. Of course we worked very closely with the Senators in each State. We've worked closely in New York with you and Senator Clinton on judicial nominations, and Judge Raggi, and many district court nominations. We've worked well together with you, and so that's of course part of the process, is, okay, the Senators in this home State are suggesting so-and-so. Is that person the best person? And then a back and forth of the home State Senators. That's part of the process, and those discussions would often occur at the--those kinds of discussions would often occur. And so I think that's-- Senator Schumer. And Karl Rove was involved in those?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Karl Rove participated in the process.

Senator Schumer. Okay. Let me ask you this. Who else was on that--you said Karl Rove was a regular participant. Who else who was not in the Counsel's Office was a regular participant?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I would think the Counsel's Office, if the Counsel though this was appropriate, could provide you a list, if she thought it was appropriate, and I don't know the answer to that question.

Senator Schumer. But you said you consulted her and it was okay to mention that Karl Rove was part of the process?

Chairman Specter. Mr. Kavanaugh, answer the questions within the scope of your recollection, not referencing anybody else who can provide a list. I do not want to have any strings outstanding. You are here today to answer questions.

Senator Schumer. I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. You answer the questions as to what you know.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Mr. Chairman, Senator Schumer, I don't know that it's appropriate for me to list everyone who's on the committee. I can tell you the offices that are in it, the White House Counsel's Office, the Department of Justice, offices that work closely with the committee, Office of Legal Policy on Judges, Karl Rove was involved. Chief of Staff's Office on occasion. I think those are the people--if I'm leaving anyone out, Senator Schumer, I'll make sure to-- Senator Schumer. Was there ever anyone outside of Government who participated in these groups?

Mr. Kavanaugh. No.

Senator Schumer. And if you told us that Karl Rover participated, is there any legal, imaginable, legal reason that you couldn't tell us who else participated by name, not by their offices?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator Schumer, I think I was saying that I could tell you the offices. I don't that I could remember all the names, sitting here, of who was at the particular meetings, but I told you the offices.

Senator Schumer. Anyone from outside those three offices that you mentioned, the White House Counsel, the Office of Legal Council, the Justice Department, anyone else from--Rove was not part of those--anyone else from outside of those offices?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Office of Legal Policy. Again, going back, it was Office of Legal Policy at Justice, just to be clear.

Senator Schumer. Right, thank you.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Going back to my own time, from 2001 to 2003, and keeping in mind what the Chairman told me to testify what I remember--

Senator Schumer. Well, the Chairman is trying to move your nomination forward as quickly as possible. That is why he did that.

Chairman Specter. Senator Schumer and I finally found an agreeable point.

[Laughter.]

Senator Schumer. There are more than you think, but not on judges.

Mr. Kavanaugh. If I'm leaving anyone out, I'll send it in later, but Legislative Affairs, of course, on occasion because we deal with the Senate staffs; the Chief of Staff's Office on occasion--

Chairman Specter. When you send it in later, Mr. Kavanaugh, anything you are going to send in later has got to be in by tomorrow.

Mr. Kavanaugh. It will be in this evening, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Okay.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I just want to make sure I'm not leaving anyone out, so the offices that I've mentioned, Deputy Chief of Staff's Office on occasion would participate.

Senator Schumer. Okay. Just one final line of questioning, Mr. Chairman.

And this involves what you said last time, which is that you testified that what the President is looking for is nominees who have respect for the law and who understand the legal system, and the role as a judge is different from one's personal views. Do you believe that Justice Ginsberg and Justice Breyer have a respect for the law?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Absolutely, Senator.

Senator Schumer. Why then do you believe the President keeps talking about judges in the mold of Scalia and Thomas, if the methodology, the rationale is respect for the law?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I think the President has talked about a general judicial philosophy that he's looking for in prospective judicial nominees.

Senator Schumer. But you indicated to me in the first hearing that you did not think ideology played a role at all in the selection of nominees, which I found incredulous.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, in the first hearing, there was--I don't think I explained clearly what ideology could entail. To my mind, the President considers, of course, one's judicial approach, whether someone believes in interpreting the law and not imposing their own policy views. We do not ask your views on specific cases or issues.

Senator Schumer. Understood.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Do not ask your views on policy issues that might exist. The President looks and wants his staff to look for people who share the kind of judicial approach he's outlined, and of course, with this President, as with past Presidents, most judicial nominees are of the same party--

Senator Schumer. So let me ask you this. If you believe that Justice Ginsberg and Justice Breyer have a respect for the law, as well as Justice Scalia and Justice Thomas, why are there so few nominees who seem to have the judicial philosophy of Justice Ginsberg and Justice Breyer, and many, many, many, who have the judicial philosophy of Justice Scalia and Thomas if ideology does not play a role in the selection? I am not saying it is wrong that it does, and I am not saying that it--but I was surprised that you, at your initial hearing, said it did not. If respect for the law is the judicial philosophy, that is what the President is looking for, then theoretically, the panoply of nominees should be much broader in terms of all kinds of things, their political affiliation, their judicial philosophy, their views on a variety of issues, and you are saying it did not play any role when you were there or others were there. I find that hard to believe, given who the President has sent before us.

And one other point I would make just parenthetically. The reason I mentioned I sort of had an idea that that side of the Committee would vote one way, was because they voted yes on every single nominee the President has sent forward thus far. There has not been one single dissent of the 240 nominees, where on our side there have been a lot of yeses and a lot of noes. So it would be harder, at least by past experience, to judge that. That is why I said that.

But anyway, go ahead.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I want to be very clear that the President has said that one's judicial philosophy does play a role, does in fact play a role in the types of judges he's looking for. Your approach to judging, whether you're someone who believes in interpreting the law and not legislating from the bench. He's made it very clear that does matter. What doesn't matter is your view on--and what we do not ask--

Senator Schumer. I understand. You have said that, and I accept that, that you do not ask about specific issues like are you pro-choice or pro-life.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Correct.

Senator Schumer. But still, do you think that, for instance, Justice Breyer and Justice Ginsberg have any less respect for the law or are less likely to try to interpret the law than say Justice Thomas or Justice Scalia?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Well, Senator, as a nominee for an inferior court, I don't think I should be talking about the Supreme Court Justices and trying to assess them. What I will say is the President has--

Senator Schumer. How about between--

Chairman Specter. What he will say is? Let him finish his answer.

Senator Schumer. He did not answer my question. That is why I am trying to get an answer.

Chairman Specter. Well, that is his answer.

Senator Schumer. Go ahead. As long as we have time.

Chairman Specter. And you may have a follow-up question.

Senator Schumer. Thank you.

Mr. Kavanaugh. What I will say is the President has made it very clear that he does believe in appointing judges who will interpret the law as written, who will not legislate from the bench, who will not seek to impose their own policy views. He's made that very clear. So judicial philosophy is a part of the judicial selection process. He said that many times, and I just want to be clear on that.

Senator Schumer. Do you think that former Justice, the last Justice Thurgood Marshall, and say, Robert Bork, have a different view of what interpreting the law is, as opposed to imposing their own views, or do you think they each do it the same way?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think Judge Bork has made clear that he has a different interpretive approach than say, Justice Marshall. For example, both in his testimony before this Committee, and in books he's written since, Judge Bork made clear he had a different type of approach than Justice Marshall.

Senator Schumer. Even though both have a respect for the law and understand the legal system?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I think--

Senator Schumer. Those were your words.

Mr. Kavanaugh. Respect for the law is a necessary qualification, of course, but it does not encompass judicial philosophy. That's a separate issue to look at in terms--

Senator Schumer. The reason I ask you this is we rarely get an opportunity to question somebody who has sat on the committee in this administration who does this. But it is obvious to me in what you say that clearly judicial philosophy and ideology make a difference here, and you have more or less said that. Nothing wrong with it. Democratic Presidents might do it too. But that is clearly happening. Would you disagree with that?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Judicial philosophy is part of what the President looks at because he's made clear he wants to appoint judges who interpret the law.

Senator Schumer. How is that different than the word "ideology" which I used to you at the first hearing?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Because I think "ideology" can encompass four different things, and we need to be very clear what we're talking about so there's no confusion. Ideology could encompass political affiliation. It could encompass your general approach to judging. It could encompass your specific view on particular cases, and it could encompass your policy views. The first two are the factors that are looked at in the final--

Senator Schumer. But if what you mean by ideology is differing judicial philosophies, then clearly the President--if you mean that--then clearly ideology enters into the selection process, right?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Judicial philosophy matters, and if that's how you're defining it, then judicial philosophy matters.

Senator Schumer. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Thank you, Senator Schumer.

Mr. Kavanaugh, I do not want the record to be incomplete in any way. Senator Feingold, rather, Senator Leahy handed to me a letter that Senator Feingold purportedly wrote to you, dated yesterday, marked "hand delivery," relating to answers to questions 3 through 7, which he had asked you before. Did you get this letter? Aside from what was just handed to you, Mr. Kavanaugh--look at me--did you get this letter?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes, sir.

Chairman Specter. Hand him the letter, would you, please?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think this is a copy, sir. I was told about this letter and that--

Chairman Specter. Now, never mind what you were told about. Just answer my question. Did you get this letter?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I don't believe I got this letter, Senator. I'm just making sure.

Chairman Specter. Okay. Well, it is dated yesterday. Senator Feingold was here. He could have handed you the letter, or he could have asked you these questions. But he says he did not ask you questions 3 through 7, so I am going to take his part and ask his questions, although he should have. I do not want any loose threads hanging out of this hearing. I will ask them as best I can because his questions are not, with all due respect, self-explanatory. The staff has marked up the record on his written questions, saying that he had asked you all of the parts of question 3.

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct.

Chairman Specter. And moving on to question 4, he asked you about Judge D. Brook Smith's not resigning from a club which he promised during a Senate hearing he would resign from. If you promised to resign from a club, Mr. Kavanaugh, will you keep that promise and resign from the club?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. On to question 5. This also refers to Judge Smith, but the relevant question is your values. And you probably already covered this in connection with other questions, but I will ask it to be sure that everything Judge Feingold wants asked is asked. Would you conform to the Judicial Disqualification Statute, 28 U.S.C. Section 455, and recuse yourself if it is called for by that statute?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. On to Number 6. There was a question about whether Judge Smith complied with Advisory Opinion No. 67, which sets forth the standards for free trips to educational seminars sponsored by, as he put it, ideological organizations, such as the Montana-based Foundation, et cetera. Will you comply with the requisite ruling with respect to acceptance of free trips?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I certainly will.

Chairman Specter. Would you go further, and decline to go on free trips? There are quite a few of us around here who decline to go on free trips because of the conflicts question involved and the reporting. I made a speech at NYU several years ago on a legal issue, took the train up and back, and read about it in the newspaper forever. Would you consider declining going on free trips?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's my intention, Mr. Chairman, for the reason you identify, that I would not go on any trips, and, you know, basically would go by a pay my own way philosophy. That's my intention.

Chairman Specter. Senator Feingold's last question, No. 7, was related to a district judge, after confirmed by the Senate to a district judgeship in Texas, he told the New York Times that despite his confirmation, right now he is running for State representative. If you are confirmed, will you run for any other office?

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. Would that articulate a value that you would avoid?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I will not run for any other office, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman Specter. Wise answer. Now, back to a revisit on dissenting and ranking. We played a tennis game here with Senator Schumer questioning you and my trying to clarify it, and Senator Schumer going back and asking some more questions, some might say not clarifying it, but Senator Schumer would not agree with that, so I will not press it. But let me review the bidding here very briefly.

You engaged in a system where you ranked prospective nominees where there were a number of people for a single judgeship, correct?

Mr. Kavanaugh. That's correct, Mr. Chairman, through a process. It may not be as formal as you're describing, but, yes, basically.

Chairman Specter. In that process, were you ever called upon to dissent, in Senator Schumer's terms, that is to say, "Candidate X is unqualified as far as I am concerned," or did you pursue the ranking, which you have already testified to?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Well, certainly with respect to candidates, of course there would be certain candidates you'd say, "I don't think this person is suitable for the bench," when you're talking about candidates. I think Senator Schumer was talking about whether ultimate nominees, if there was dissent on ultimate nominees.

Senator Schumer. If I might, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman Specter. I will yield to you, Senator Schumer.

Senator Schumer. Thank you.

Chairman Specter. For one question.

Senator Schumer. I was asking about potential nominees.

Were there potential nominees that you said, as it came before this committee--not the ranking system, I have said it three times. I think it I clear as a bell, even if my colleague does not want to say that is true.

Chairman Specter. Are you saying who came before the committee?

Senator Schumer. Who were discussed at this committee, who you said--I am not asking names--who said, "This person does not belong on the bench, and I don't think we should recommend to the President that that person be nominated." It is a very simple, clear question that I have asked three or four times.

Chairman Specter. I do not--

Senator Schumer. Can I--

Chairman Specter. Go ahead.

Senator Schumer. And at one point you said to me that you would have to ask counsel if you could answer that question, and at another point I believed you said that you did not think it was appropriate to answer that question, and now, in reference to Senator Specter's question--maybe you did not know it was potential nominees--you said--well, why don't you answer it?

Mr. Kavanaugh. If it's talking about--

Chairman Specter. If you understand that question, go ahead.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Kavanaugh. If we're talking about--

Senator Schumer. I think everybody understands that question.

Mr. Kavanaugh. If we're talking about the general--

Chairman Specter. I do not care about everybody. I care about him. Do you understand that question?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I now do. I think there might have been some confusion. Of course, when there's a list of candidates that come before the committee, you might say someone's not qualified, of course, before the Judicial Selection Committee. Some people just are not suitable for the bench. They might be recommended by someone. For example, they get on a list of recommended people that come from a Senator, from a Governor, from a member of Congress, and you might assess that person's record and say, "You know what? That person is just not suitable for the Federal bench." Of course that happens.

Senator Schumer. Then may I ask a follow-up question, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman Specter. Yes.

Senator Schumer. Give us some of the reasons. Did you ever invoke the notion that their judicial philosophy was not appropriate for a judge?

Mr. Kavanaugh. The President's made clear that judicial philosophy matters, so if someone did not share the judicial philosophy that the President has articulated, of course, that would be a reason, yeah. Also--

Senator Schumer. And you would say that? You would say, "I don't think Mr. X or Ms. X shares the President's judicial philosophy?"

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think the President's made clear that he will not appoint judges who seek to use the bench to impose their own personal--

Senator Schumer. I understand. So you would say that on occasion when a nominee came before the committee?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Well, that's what the President wanted, so we work for the President.

Chairman Specter. Can you give him a simple yes?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes.

Senator Schumer. Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think the question was pretty clear.

And do you recall--and again, I do not need the name of the nominee--an example of why this person was not appropriate in terms of judicial philosophy?

Mr. Kavanaugh. If someone in our judgment or the assessment of the committee or the assessment of the interviewers, concluded that this person, in either direction, had policy views that they couldn't separate from their judicial views, who didn't seem to understand the difference that I think I've articulated today between the judicial role and the legislative role--and there are such people who sometimes get interviewed--if someone doesn't understand that role, then that person would be--could be deemed not suitable for--

Senator Schumer. And how often did that happen? And I do not need an exact number or anything like it.

Mr. Kavanaugh. I think most of the candidates that members of the Senate recommend, that Governors recommend, usually come with the proper appreciation of the judicial role, but there are occasions where people share a different philosophy, or where people simply do not--someone might be interviewed who simply does not seem to recognize the distinction, which is critical in my judgment, between the policymaking role and the judicial role, but that--

Senator Schumer. But you would never use the words, too liberal or too conservative, or would you?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Well, I think too activist.

Senator Schumer. Would you? You would say too activist?

Mr. Kavanaugh. If someone doesn't understand the judicial role and you would say that person believes in judicial activism and not judicial restraint, and the President's made clear to us and made clear to the American people, that he's looking for people who believe in judicial restraint to be judges. And, of course, that person wouldn't fit what the President told us to look for.

Senator Schumer. So you would occasionally say somebody would be too activist, in your opinion, to meet the President's criteria?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Well--

Chairman Specter. That is what you are saying, Mr. Kavanaugh. Can you give him another yes?

Mr. Kavanaugh. I'll give him a yes, and say that's what the President said to the American people--

Senator Schumer. I understand.

Mr. Kavanaugh. --twice--

Chairman Specter. Okay, Senator Schumer.

Senator Schumer. Just one more question. Were there ever people who were too activist from the conservative side as opposed to the liberal side?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes.

Chairman Specter. This is your last question, Mr. Kavanaugh. Did you say yes?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes.

Chairman Specter. Atta boy.

[Laughter.]

Senator Schumer. You can see why the Senator from Pennsylvania was a very fine prosecutor. He is very good at helping his witness.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. All out in the open, all out in the open, all transparent.

Senator Graham, you have been waiting patiently. I have tabulated Senator Schumer's questions were 42-3/4 minutes, so you are limited now to 37-3/4 minutes.

[Laughter.]

Senator Graham. I really do not have much to add, but that will not stop me. I found it actually fascinating. I mean you seem no worse for the wear. Senator Kennedy's staff has a good question I think. Maybe I should not have said that, but I think it is a good enough question I will make it my own.

Mr. Bybee, Judge Bybee, if you had known--well, you repudiated the memo, you thought it was not good legal reasoning; is that correct, the Bybee memo?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Yes. The administration has repealed that memo, and I stated my own personal agreement with repealing the memo.

Senator Graham. Would that have disqualified him, in your opinion, from being a judge if you had known it?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, I've drawn a line here today which I think is important for maintaining the integrity of the judicial selection process, not to talk about people who are currently sitting judges or other judicial nominees by name. I don't think that is appropriate for me to do.

Senator Graham. I will just end it and take my time. There is a fine line between doing your job as a White House counselor, being part of the judicial selection team and being a judge yourself. There is a line between being advocate and being a judge. I think you understand that line. And I think the questions have been very, very good, to be honest with you. And I expect President Bush to live up to his campaign promise of picking strict constructionist, non-judicial activists as he sees it. That is what the election was about. And if you have been part of that weeding-out process to make sure somebody in the conservative movement or the liberal movement does not get on the court, then I think not only have you done a good job in the White House, you fulfilled your obligation to the President.

Now, your obligation is no longer to President Bush. Your obligation is to those people that come before you like they came before your mother. You are going to have a lot of characters come before you in a courtroom where their case is on appeal. And some of them you won't like, and some of them you may feel close to philosophically.

If you could, just in a very short statement, tell me what your job, what you will do with that responsibility, no matter who the person is that comes before you. What is your job now?

Mr. Kavanaugh. Senator, if I were confirmed, I believe in the absolute sanctity of ensuring the integrity of the--sanctity and integrity of the judicial process, which means treating all parties who come before the court equally. I think I did that as a law clerk for the two Court of Appeals judges and Justice Kennedy. I understand that function. That's really central to the whole judicial role, equal justice under law. It doesn't matter where you come from, it doesn't matter what you look like, doesn't matter what your background is. When you come into that courtroom, you have the right to present your case, and if you're right on the law, you should prevail in your case. It doesn't matter.

And that's the genius of our system. It's been part of our system throughout our history, and if I were confirmed, I pledge to you and to all the members of the Senate that I would absolutely fall within that tradition.

Senator Graham. I look forward to voting for you. Thank you.

Chairman Specter. Thank you very much, Mr. Kavanaugh. As previously announced, we will proceed to a vote on Mr. Kavanaugh on Thursday. I believe at this date--and I have checked with staff, who have been listening attentively, as have I--there are no outstanding questions for you to answer. Gone over what Senator Feingold's letter said, and I believe you have responded on the Karl Rove answer, and I believe all the issues have been responded to.

I want to compliment you on your stamina. I will reserve comments on your testimony until we meet on Thursday, when we will discuss your nomination, Mr. Kavanaugh, but I do not think there will be any disagreement in 3 hours and 27 minutes, without having moved from the witness chair, of your stamina, which is a tribute to your age and good health.

[Laughter.]

Chairman Specter. That concludes the hearing.

[Whereupon, at 5:27 p.m., the Committee was adjourned.]

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Seeks Dismissal Of Surveillance Suit. The Bay City News (6/21) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has told a federal judge in San Francisco that allowing a surveillance lawsuit against AT&T Corp. to proceed 'would cause grave harm to the nation's security.'" The BCN continues, "U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker is scheduled to hear arguments on Friday on the government's motion for dismissal of a lawsuit filed against AT&T by the San Francisco-based Electronic Frontier Foundation on behalf of four Californians. … The government contends the case must be dismissed because there is no way it could be litigated without revealing state secrets vital to national security." The BCN adds, "In a brief filed with the judge last week, Justice Department lawyers wrote that 'the very subject matter of the case is a state secret.' … The lawsuit alleges that AT&T has violated communications privacy laws and the plaintiffs' constitutional rights by allegedly giving the National Security Agency records of millions of Americans' telephone and Internet communications. … But the government argues in its brief, 'Plaintiffs cannot establish whether or not such cooperation exists because that factual question is itself a state secret.'"

Cheney's Role In Launching War On Terror Analyzed. Frontline (6/20) last night examined the Administration's response to the September 11th, 2001 attacks in a segment called, "The Dark Side," a reference to comments made shortly after 9/11 by Vice President Cheney. The focus of the documentary is on the Vice President's supposed role as the architect of the US war on terrorism. Cheney, bolstered by his close alliance with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, is portrayed as using the formal and informal levers of power in Washington to marginalize the Central Intelligence Agency and State Department in order to imprint his preferences on the Administration's policy choices.

A key element of the Cheney strategy, according to the Frontline documentary, was his use intelligence analysis process: in fighting the war, the US was to "spend time in the shadows," will "work to the dark side, if you will," in Cheney's words. The tenor of the piece was markedly skeptical of the credibility of Administration officials such as Cheney, Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and others, and cited prominent critics of the Administration such as former CIA official Michael Scheuer and State Department official Lawrence Wilkerson. Some defenders of the Administration's approach, such as Defense Department official F. Michael Maloof, were also quoted for balance.

Frontline portrays Cheney as successfully swaying President Bush, who developed a close relationship with CIA Director George Tenet, from backing CIA priorities in the pursuit of terrorists in Afghanistan in late 2001 to turning to the confrontation with Saddam Hussein that led to the war with Iraq in 2003. Cheney accomplished this by first seeking to establish a link between Saddam and al Qaeda and later focusing on intelligence on Iraq's supposed weapons of mass destruction.

In one instance, Frontline notes that after the successful prosecution of the Afghan campaign in 2001, Vice President Cheney "wanted information that linked Osama bin Laden and Saddam Hussein." Author James Bamford: "But they weren't getting that information from the CIA. And so, he put pressure, I think, on Rumsfeld and on the Pentagon to come up with their own estimates." Frontline added, "Inside the Pentagon bureaucracy, Rumsfeld could easily and quietly grow a nearly invisible operation." Melvin Goodman, former CIA officer: "They needed an office that would produce the intelligence that the CIA wouldn't produce. Rumsfeld said, 'I can solve your problem,' and he put Douglas Feith on that issue."

Frontline added, "They needed people with experience in the world of intelligence, but they hired politically connected policy analysts." F. Michael Maloof, former Defense Department intelligence official: "I got a phone call. The next thing I know, I'm being detailed on over to Doug Feith's office, and that I would be joined by Dave Wurmser, who today works in the office of the Vice President." Frontline: "The information was rarely vetted. Instead, it moved up the chain of command to the office of the Vice President." Lawrence Wilkerson, former chief of staff to Secretary of State Colin Powell: "And this became material that was then used, sort of in white paper-like fashion, to be leaked to journalists or to create links between Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda."

In a second instance, after the CIA was directed to hurriedly provide a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction systems, Frontline says, "Many members of the CIA believed the Vice President himself was determined to control the content of the NIE. The Vice President and his chief of staff, Scooter Libby, had made about ten trips to CIA headquarters, where they personally questioned analysts."

Current, Former Officials Question Some Accounts In Suskind Book. CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Snow) reported that Ron Suskind's book "The One Percent Doctrine" details "pivotal moments inside the White House and among top government officials in the days leading up to the 9/11 attacks and the years that followed. Some of the book's accounts are being questioned by current and former counterterrorism officials." CNN added, "A number of officials say some of the information is accurate, such as a 2003 plot believed to be linked to al Qaeda to disperse cyanide in New York City's subway system. While officials in New York don't comment on intelligence information specifics, the book claims that a computer hard drive of New York City buildings and landmarks was discovered that contained what was described as a very professional casing effort of the city."

Suskind Calls Cheney "One Percent Chance" Statement "Eye-Popping." Author Ron Suskind was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/20) what "the most eye-popping piece of information" he learned in the course of your researching his book "The One Percent Doctrine." Suskind said, "The broadest part, the thing that covers the most, is this one percent doctrine. It explains everything. That's why it's the title of the book." Suskind explained that two months after 9/11, Vice President Dick Cheney was "being given harrowing intelligence. … Cheney says something fascinating. He says for these low probability high impact type of events, we need to think about them in a different way. Then as the briefing goes on, he stops the proceedings and says, 'Here it is. If there's even a one percent chance that WMDs have been given to terrorists, we need to treat it as a certainty. Not in our analysis but in our response.'"

Suskind Says Cheney Creates Platform For Bush To Be Effective. Author Ron Suskind said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/20), "Bush is one of the least experienced presidents to come into office. Cheney, the most experienced vice president. They had to work out how they're going to work together." After 9/11, Cheney "really is embracing the broad, sweeping doctrinaire thinking. What are the big strategies? He essentially creates an architecture, a platform, where Bush can be Bush, a man of action and still be effective as president. That's the relationship. Cheney essentially sets the framework, Bush acts within it."

Suskind Says Al Jazeera's Kabul Office Was Bombed On Purpose. Author Ron Suskind said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/20) that the bombing of al Jazeera's office in Kabul "was done on purpose, precisely to send a message to Al Jazeera, and essentially a message was sent." Suskind added, "There was great anger at Al Jazeera at this point. We were pulling our hair out. We thought they were a mouthpiece for bin Laden. And we acted."

Dowd Says Administration Rejected Need For Evidence In War On Terror. Maureen Dowd writes in The New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) that Adam Smith and Edmund Burke "would blanch at the shape W. and Karl Rove have given conservatism — the political muscle of the Christian right, the withering of the social contract, greedy capitalism, fiscal profligacy." Ron Suskind reports in his new book, The One Percent Doctrine, that Vice President Dick Cheney "dictated that the war on terror allowed the administration to summarily reject the need for evidence and analysis before action. Mr. Suskind describes the Cheney doctrine: 'Even if there's just a 1 percent chance of the unimaginable coming due, act as if it is a certainty. It's not about "our analysis," as Cheney said. It's about "our response." ... Justified or not, fact-based or not, "our response" is what matters. As to "evidence," the bar was set "so low that the word itself almost didn't apply."

Grassley Aleges FBI, Mueller Tried To Cover Up "Botched" Terrorism Probe. The Washington Times (6/21, Seper, 90K) reports that in a letter to Director Robert Mueller, Sen. Charles Grassley alleges that "the FBI sought to cover up a 'botched' investigation into a terrorist financing scheme by classifying a probe into the case as secret and misleading Congress about how the inquiry was handled." Grassley "said the FBI blocked the full release of an investigative report he sought last year from the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department of what he called a 'turf fight' between the FBI and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement" in a Houston terrorism probe. Grassley "also targeted Mr. Mueller, saying that during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in May, the director painted 'a distorted picture' of findings in the report from the inspectors general at Homeland Security and Justice, reading 'selectively' from unclassified portions."

Canadian Terror Probe Expands To Britain. The CBS Evening News (6/20, story 4, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The investigation of that terror plot in Canada that charged 17 with plotting to behead the prime minister and bomb government buildings has now spread to Britain. Scotland Yard is now holding six young men and today in Canada, bail hearings were underway for the original suspects."

Al Qaeda Says Saudi Killed In 2004 Was To Have Been 20th Hijacker. The New York Times/AP (6/21) reports, "Al Qaeda has identified a would-be 20th hijacker for the Sept. 11 attacks as a Saudi who was killed in a 2004 shootout with his country's security forces. In a statement accompanying a new video, whose authenticity has not been verified, Al Qaeda's propaganda arm asserts that the Saudi, Fawaz al-Nashimi, also known as Turki bin Fuheid al-Muteiry, would have rounded out a team that ultimately took over United Airlines Flight 93, which crashed in Pennsylvania before reaching its target." The Washington Post (6/21, Shrader, 744K) also reports the story.

Arkansas Man Acquitted Of Terror Charges, Convicted Of Immigration Violations. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/21) reports former University of Arkansas graduate student Arwah Jaber "has been acquitted of attempting to provide material support to a Palestinian terrorist organization but convicted of immigration charges. ... The government moved to revoke his citizenship after the jury returned its verdicts Monday." The AP notes, "Jaber was born on the West Bank and became a U.S. citizen in 1994." He "said he now expects to leave the country with his wife, Dawn, and find a teaching position in the Middle East. 'I am not a terrorist. (The jury) knew it,' Jaber said after Monday's verdict." The Springdale (AR) Daily News (6/21, Mehaffey) adds, "Jaber still could face jail time on the charges of making false statements to obtain a passport and unlawful procurement of naturalization and credit card fraud. He will be sentenced within 90 days after a presentencing investigation is completed. The defense is still considering whether it has grounds for an appeal." The New York Times (6/21, Barnes, 1.19M) also briefly reports the verdict.

Judge Orders Prosecutors To Provide Padilla Defense With Detailed Evidence. The AP (6/21, Anderson) reports, "A federal judge ordered prosecutors Tuesday to turn over more detailed evidence to back up allegations that Jose Padilla and two co-defendants conspired to kill, injure or kidnap people overseas as part of a global Islamic terrorist network. U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke said she agreed with many of the claims made by defense attorneys that the federal indictment against Padilla and the others is 'very light on facts' that would link the defendants to specific acts of terrorism or victims. … Cooke ordered the government to flesh out its charges by providing defense lawyers with names of unindicted co-conspirators, broad descriptions of intended victims of alleged acts of violence and specifics about false statements Hassoun allegedly made about the meaning of phone calls intercepted by the government."

Judge Hears Arguments On Defense Motion To Suppress Evidence From FBI Search. The AP (6/21, Anderson) also reports US Magistrate Judge Stephen Brown yesterday heard arguments from codefendant Adham Amin Hassoun's "lawyers seeking to suppress evidence seized by the FBI from his Broward County home, saying the FBI 'frightened and intimidated' his wife before seizing a handgun and other key evidence such as documents in Arabic and videotapes." But FBI Special Agent Gregory McDermott "testified Hassoun's wife freely consented in writing to the search of the home…after he was arrested on an immigration violation on June 12, 2002." McDermott said, "She didn't have a problem with that. It was very professional and friendly."

"LA 8" Figure Testifies At Deportation Hearing. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Spano, 958K) reports, "A man at the center of a long-running immigration legal fight that came to be known as the 'L.A. 8' case returned to court Tuesday to renew his two-decade-long quest for citizenship." Aiad Barakat "fielded a barrage of questions in a bid to avoid deportation. Almost 20 years ago, federal officials sought to deport Barakat and seven others because of their association with causes promoting Palestinian statehood, such as the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. The eight were never accused of an act of terrorism or of any other crime." The Times notes, "The only question in court Tuesday was whether Barakat should be denied citizenship for allegedly lying about his association with Palestinian advocate Ali Kased when he sought U.S. citizenship. The government plans to introduce an FBI surveillance videotape of a meeting Barakat attended with Kased…in 1985 outside of Los Angeles."

WPost Urges Administration To Design New System To Try Terror Suspects. The Washington Post (6/21, A20, 744K) editorializes, "In the next few days the Supreme Court is expected to pass judgment on the administration's effort to establish military commissions -- a long-dormant trial system the executive branch seeks to revive in order to try al-Qaeda terrorists." But "even if the court lets the commissions stand, the administration should go back to the drawing board, to create a fairer system for trying alleged war criminals in which this country can have confidence." The Post adds, "The conflict with Islamic extremists will not be over soon. The nation needs now, and will continue to need, a means to try some of the most fateful criminals of all time according to fair rules that bear the stamp of democratic approval: legislative enactment. Only the administration's rigidly ideological approach to this problem prevents its timely resolution."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Police Skirt Privacy Laws Through Use Of Data Brokers. The AP (6/21, Bridis, Solomon) reports, "Federal and local police across the country have been gathering Americans' phone records from private data brokers without subpoenas or warrants." The AP continues, "These brokers, many of whom market aggressively on the Internet, have broken into customer accounts online, tricked phone companies into revealing information and sometimes acknowledged that their practices violate laws, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press." The AP adds, "Legal experts and privacy advocates said police reliance on private vendors who commit such acts raises civil liberties questions. … Those using data brokers include agencies of the Homeland Security and Justice departments – including the FBI and U.S. Marshals Service – and municipal police departments in California, Florida, Georgia and Utah. Experts believe hundreds of other departments frequently use such services. … 'We are requesting any and all information you have regarding the above cell phone account and the account holder ... including account activity and the account holder's address,' Ana Bueno, a police investigator in Redwood City, Calif., wrote in October to PDJ Investigations of Granbury, southwest of Fort Worth. … An agent in Denver for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Anna Wells, sent a similar request on March 31 on Homeland Security stationery: 'I am looking for all available subscriber information for the following phone number,' Ms. Wells wrote to a corporate alias used by PDJ. … Congressional investigators estimated the U.S. government spent $30 million last year buying personal data from private brokers. But that number probably understates the breadth of transactions, since brokers said they rarely charge law enforcement agencies."

Congress Looking Into Data Sellers' Methods. USA Today (6/21, Eisler, 2.31M) reports that Congress today will begin hearings on "the techniques used by private data-collection companies to obtain phone records and other information. Law enforcement agencies often go to such companies for information. They do so to save time and avoid seeking subpoenas or warrants for the information, even though the data brokers do not always obtain their information legitimately, according to an investigation by the House Energy and Commerce investigations subcommittee." A panel subcommittee, chaired by Rep. Ed Whitfield, "will hold a series of hearings on the matter."

TSA Delays Registered Traveler Program. The AP (6/20) reported the Transportation Security Administration has delayed the Registered Traveler program "as the government and private businesses grapple with ways to ensure retention of tough security standards." The program, which "would have allowed certain airline passengers to quickly go through a separate airport security lane if they paid a fee, passed a government background check and submitted fingerprints," was scheduled "to be rolled out gradually starting Tuesday." TSA spokeswoman Yolanda Clark said "the agency was still working with private firms running the program to make certain that it 'does not decrease security in any way'" or "hold up travelers who aren't enrolled."

HHS Places Order For Anthrax Drug. The New York Times (6/21, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "The Department of Health and Human Services has placed a $165 million order for 20,000 doses of a new anthrax drug that it hopes to put in a biodefense stockpile starting in 2009." The drug, Abthrax, "neutralizes the deadly toxin that anthrax bacteria produce."

New Plan For 9/11 Memorial Proposed. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Frangos, 2.11M) reports, "A simpler plan for the World Trade Center memorial will include several cost-saving design changes, while aiming to preserve the overall look and feel of the project." In a report commissioned by New York Gov. George Pataki and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, "real-estate developer Frank Sciame suggested modifications that would bring the cost of the memorial and an adjacent museum to $510 million, plus another $150 million for underground infrastructure." New York State "would spend an additional $80 million on a visitors center. A cost estimate in May showed the project, minus the visitors center, approaching $1 billion." USA Today (6/21, Moore, 2.31M) says the plan is "part of a redesign to cut the project's cost to $500 million from nearly $1 billion." The Washington Post (6/21, Kugler, 744K) also reports the story.

House Approves Bill To Increase Penalties For Disaster Fraud. The AP (6/20, Abrams) reported in the wake of a GAO report that found FEMA "was defrauded of up to $1.4 billion as it rushed to provide relief after last year's hurricanes Katrina and Rita," the House approved legislation Tuesday that would impose "sentences of up to 30 years for fraud related to disaster relief. … The legislation, which now goes to the Senate, imposes a fine of up to $1 million and prison terms of up to 30 years for wire, radio, television or mail fraud in connection with a presidentially declared major disaster or emergency."

CQ (6/20, Schuler, Stern) reported, "The legislation targets public officials involved in bribery or extortion, as well as anyone who makes a 'materially false, fictitious or fraudulent statement or representation' to obtain benefits, property or services after a disaster or declared emergency."

National Guard Returns To New Orleans To Help Combat Crime Wave. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 7, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Nine months after Hurricane Katrina, the National Guard rolled back into New Orleans. This time, the problem, not floods, but crime." ABC (Osunsami) added, "Already this year, 53 people have been murdered in New Orleans. This morning, just a few hours before the troops arrived…residents woke up to murder number 54." Mayor Ray Nagin "asked the Governor for the troops after five teenagers were murdered over the weekend at this intersection. Three other teenagers were killed at this same intersection in April."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 6, 2;15, Williams, 9.87M) reported Operation Crescent Guard "will send the soldiers into large areas of the city like Lakeview, New Orleans East, and the Lower Ninth Ward, where there is still plenty of damage but not many people." Officials "insist it's not that crime is so bad, it's that the New Orleans police force remains weakened by Katrina."

The AP (6/21, Burdeau) reports "troops, dressed in full camouflage fatigues, carried M-16s, handguns and belt clips of ammunition as they arrived in a convoy of 75 vehicles. They parked their Humvees and tanker trucks in formation in front of the Convention Center, drawing waves and thumbs-up from onlookers." The AP adds, "Many of the soldiers that arrived Tuesday were sent to New Orleans during Katrina, but they had not seen the city since those desperate days."

Post-Katrina New Orleans Sees Spike In Suicides. The New York Times (6/21, Saulny, 1.19M) reports, "New Orleans is experiencing what appears to be a near epidemic of depression and post-traumatic stress disorders," as well as "a suicide rate that state and local officials describe as close to triple what it was before Hurricane Katrina struck and the levees broke 10 months ago. Compounding the challenge, the local mental health system has suffered a near total collapse, heaping a great deal of the work to be done with emotionally disturbed residents onto the Police Department."

NYTimes Criticizes New Orleans' Lack Of Progress On Rebuilding Plan. The New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) editorializes that 10 months after Katrina, "there is still no redevelopment plan for New Orleans." With billions of dollars from the federal government headed to the city, "There are no more excuses for local officials, no more pointing toward Washington. It is time for southeastern Louisiana to rebuild itself." The fact "that it will be six months before a 'master planning document,'" as the Times reported Sunday, "is totally unacceptable." Meanwhile, the decision to send National Guard troops to help city police deal with an upsurge in violence "does not bolster our confidence that the city will be able to govern itself." The Times says Mayor Ray Nagin needs "to speak difficult truths" about where to rebuild. Residents "deserve answers. They have waited long enough."

WAR NEWS:

Senate Democrats To Offer Competing Troop-Withdrawal Plans. Knight Ridder (6/21, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Democrats, searching for a unified stance on Iraq, will kick off a Senate debate Wednesday over competing troop-withdrawal proposals that reflect mixed public opinions about the war." One proposal, offered by Democratic Sens. John Kerry and Russ Feingold, "would set a hard pullout deadline of July 2007. A more broadly backed bill, proposed by Democratic Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island, calls for troops to begin moving out of Iraq this year, but sets no timetable for final withdrawal." Knight Ridder adds, "Though the measures were designed to distinguish Democrats from Republicans on the dominant issue of the day as November's congressional elections near, they also exposed Democratic divisions on the war. Some top Republicans dismissed both proposals as 'cut and run' policies and evidence of Democratic incoherence on Iraq."

USA Today (6/21, 2.31M) quotes Kerry saying, ""We cannot retreat. We cannot surrender. We cannot go wobbly." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (6/21, Bellantoni, 90K) reports that last night, in a speech at the Hyatt Regency Washington to Republican volunteers, "Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said, 'Republicans unite on the need to stay on the offense to confront terrorists; Democrats are having a debate in their party.'" He "characterized the Democratic debate as some 'say we need to cut and run; some people say we need to walk ... and other people say we need to jog.'" On CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Blitzer), Mehlman said that if the US set a specific timetable for withdrawal as Democrats suggest "the enemy would see it as surrender and it would make America less safe. … The reason we are attacked is because for a generation we did what Jack Murtha suggested which is when they hit us, we backed down as opposed to the way we win this war on terror, which is the way we won World War II, the way we won the Cold War is the offense not the defense."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported Democrats "vigorously deny the charge, noting that most Senate Democrats oppose a firm deadline for withdrawing the troops. Cut and run, they say, is nothing more than a Republican campaign slogan." Sen. Harry Reid, Minority Leader: "Two things that don't exist in Iraq and have not -- weapons of mass destruction and cutting and running." Reid: "But in fact, some leading Democrats are badly split on when to bring the troops home. Senator John Kerry, for example, was cheered by liberal activists recently when he called for a timetable." But Senator Hillary Clinton "was heckled by the same group because she opposes a deadline."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Bash) reported that "behind closed doors, we understand, there were some impassioned pitches made by Sens. John Kerry and Russ Feingold on the one hand. They say they really think it's imperative, both from a policy point of view and a political point of view, to draw a hard line between Democrats and the Bush White House by saying there should be date certain for troops to come out of Iraq. Now, on the other hand in that lunch, we know that Senator Carl Levin and Jack Reed also made their pitch to say that's simply the wrong way to go, that that is not necessarily responsible and that it's better to take a more cautious approach, say that we should perhaps begin to be withdrawn this year." Minority Leader Harry Reid tried "to put best face on this, essentially saying that Democrats are united on one thing and that is, they don't think the Bush approach is right."

The Washington Post (6/21, A4, Babington, 744K) runs a similar report titled "Democrats Divided On Withdrawal Of Troops," and says Senate Republicans are "happy to clear the way for Democrats to showcase their divisions. Senators predicted that few, if any, Republicans will embrace the Democrats' proposals, mirroring the nearly unanimous support House Republicans displayed last week for Bush's policies."

Republicans Said To Be Hoping To Use Iraq War Debate For Political Purposes. NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported Republicans "are apparently hoping to use the debate" in the US Senate "as a chance to score political points that will help them in November." NBC (Reid) added, "In the past week, Republicans, led by chief White House strategist Karl Rove, have taken the offensive, accusing Democrats of advocating a strategy of cut and run." Emboldened by "the killing of al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and a slight up tick in the President's approval rating, congressional Republicans have relentlessly repeated the charge."

Democrats Say Kerry Jeopardizing His Party's Prospects In 2006. The New York Times (6/21, Zernike, 1.19M) reports, "When Senator John Kerry was their presidential nominee in 2004, Democrats fervently wished he would express himself firmly about the Iraq war." Kerry "has found his resolve. But it has not made his fellow Democrats any happier. They fear the latest evolution of Mr. Kerry's views on Iraq may now complicate their hopes of taking back a majority in Congress in 2006." The Times adds "interviews" with Democrats "suggest a frustration with Mr. Kerry, never popular among the caucus, and still unpopular among many Democrats for failing to defeat a president they considered vulnerable. Privately, some of his Democratic peers complain that he is too focused on the next presidential campaign."

The AP (6/21, Sidoti) reports Feingold "was the first Democratic senator to call for a withdrawal timetable, but his position has been overshadowed by Kerry, who has a stronger national profile because of his status as the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee." Both "are posturing for possible presidential runs in 2008, and their positions on Iraq play well with the liberal wing of the party -- the Democratic faithful who will vote for the next Democratic presidential nominee."

McCain Says Situation In Iraq Marginally Better. On the CBS Evening News (6/20, story 2, 1:20, Schieffer, 7.66M), Sen. John McCain said the situation in Iraq is "I think marginally better. I think we are progressing. It's long and it's hard and it's difficult and it's two steps forward and one step back. But the consequences of failure, I believe, are enormous."

Durbin Calls For "Reasonable Timetable" For Withdrawal. Sen. Dick Durbin said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/20) that Democrats "understand that the current strategy is not working well. There's no end in sight. As of today, this morning, we've lost 2,502 of our best and bravest soldiers, we've spent over $300 billion. We've been in this war for over three years, and there is no plan to bring it to an end." Durbin added, "I think we should have a reasonable timetable. There should be some considerations there, if circumstances arise, that would make a difference. But by and large, I think the Iraqis have to understand, now that they've trained 264,000 soldiers with our help, at our expense, that they have to stand and defend their own country."

Hutchison Says Setting A Timetable Sends Wrong Message. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/20), "All of us look forward to the time that our troops can come home. There's no question about that. But if we set a timetable, we are saying to every ally we have ever had, we'll be with you until times get tough. And worse, we are saying to the enemies, if you just make it hard for America, pretty soon our attention will flag and we will cut and run. That couldn't be a worse message from the United States of America."

Sessions Says Senate Will Reject Proposed Timetables For Troop Withdrawal. Sen. Jeff Sessions was asked on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (6/20) about the upcoming Senate vote on a Democratic proposal to set a timetable to getting our troops out of Iraq. Sessions said, "It's a resolution that I don't think has any good in it, and only mischief. We only voted a few days ago, 93-6 to reject a timetable as of the end of this year. And I think we'll reject this proposal."

Harman Calls For "Regime Change" At Pentagon. Democratic Rep. Jane Harman, appearing on CNN's Larry King Live (6/20, 9:42 p.m.), said, "We need to resolve now to change our strategy in Iraq. I would call it 'cut and win.' I think we should be redeploying troops now on a schedule set by the generals, focusing on achievable political objectives. And I should add one more thing: It's time to have regime change at the Defense Department. A new secretary of defense will help change our strategy."

US Embassy Memo Outlines Iraqi Employees' Security Fears. A memo by a junior US employee of the US Embassy in Iraq outlines the security risks faced by the Embassy's Iraqi employees. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 3, 1:45, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "The memo is called 'Snapshots from the Office.' And it's based on the reports from Iraqi employee of the US Embassy, written by a junior US Employee of the Embassy. Today, the snapshots add up to one very grim portrayal of life in Baghdad. The Iraqis say terror and violence have become a part of everyday life. The brother of one employee kidnapped. Another claims to attend a funeral every day. They fear informants, who the memo says have become more entrenched, as Iraqi security forces fail to gain public confidence." There are "also serious complaints about quality of life, chronic power outages and long gas lines."

In an editorial today, the New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) says the cable painted "a far grimmer picture of the mounting difficulties faced by its Iraqi employees," and "told of embassy employees running a daily gantlet of religious dress-code enforcers and harassment by militia-style security guards — even at checkpoints surrounding the fortified Green Zone, where the embassy is located. When the Iraqi employees return to their homes, they face sweltering neighborhoods without regular electric power, daylong gasoline lines, and families torn by religious and ethnic tensions and mounting fears for the future." The report "is only a raw snapshot of the daily experiences of embassy employees, not a systematic nationwide survey. Yet embassy employees are in many ways better off than most Iraqis. At least they have jobs and someone to turn to for help. … Now that he's home, Mr. Bush needs to take a hard, unfiltered look at the more disturbing picture relayed by America's embassy."

US To Keep Presence In Iraq At Current Levels Into Next Year. The New York Times (6/21, Shanker, 1.19M) reports, "The Pentagon announced Tuesday that it planned to send 21,000 troops to Iraq in the next rotation of forces. That would keep the American presence at current levels into next year, unless the security situation improved." The Times adds, "Senior military officials said that the announcement of units to be deployed between August and January could change, depending on conditions in Iraq, and that so-called off ramps for the troops bound for Iraq were still under discussion." Bryan G. Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said after the announcement, "One should not read into this a decision" about "long-term troop levels in Iraq." But "at a minimum, the announcement represents a decision that for planning purposes at least, American troops in Iraq would be replaced on a one-for-one basis for now."

US Distances Itself From Iraqi Official's Comments. The Financial Times (6/21, Sevastopulo, Dinmore) reports, "The Bush administration on Tuesday sought to distance itself from remarks by the Iraqi national security adviser that he envisaged a significant reduction in US troops in the country this year with most leaving next year." Writing in the Washington Post on Tuesday, Mowaffak al-Rubbaie, the Iraqi national security adviser, "said that while there was no 'defined timetable for coalition troops to leave Iraq, there was an 'unofficial roadmap' for troop reductions based on 'the achievement of set objectives for restoring security in Iraq.'"

Australia May Eye Troop Drawdown This Year. The AP (6/21, Foley) notes Canberra "will review its troop deployment to Iraq by the end of this year, the defense ministry said Wednesday, the first time the government has hinted at a possible timeline for eventual withdrawal." Defense Minister Brendan Nelson "said Australia would evaluate the success of the Iraqi forces in protecting Muthana province before reassessing its military presence in Iraq. … 'If we can see that the provincial Iraqi government in al-Muthana can successfully manage its own affairs and its own security then I would expect that by the end of this year we would be starting to think about our future deployment.'"

The New York Times (6/21, Onishi, 1.19M), meanwhile, runs a story reporting "Japan announced Tuesday that it would start pulling its ground troops out of Iraq, putting an end to the country's most significant military mission since the end of World War II."

Bodies Of Kidnapped US Soldiers Found. The bodies of PFC Kristian Menchaca and PFC Thomas Tucker, the members of the 101st Airborne captured by Iraqi insurgents, were found three miles from the location where they were abducted. The US military says the two were tortured and brutally slain. The story was the lead on each of the networks, and ABC and NBC ran follow-up stories on the reaction to the soldiers' deaths. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, lead story, 2:35, Marquez, 8.78M) reported, "US troops found the men last night after a tip from a local resident. But they were not able to recover their bodies until this morning. Troops first had to maneuver their way through explosives that had been planted around the bodies." In an "Internet posting, an insurgent group claimed that the new leader of al Qaeda in Iraq had 'beheaded the two captive crusaders.' Sources say that one of the soldiers was, in fact, beheaded and both were mutilated and burned."

In a separate story, ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 2, 2:20, Reynolds, 8.78M) reported, "The reports of kidnapping and possibly torture at the hands of their captors have added fuel to the domestic debate about the war."

The CBS Evening News (6/20, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It was like a story from the Middle Ages in the age of the Internet. 'We have slaughtered the crusaders,' read the message on a terrorist Website and the bodies of those American soldiers who had been kidnapped by al Qaeda were found. They had been tortured, and they were meant to be found. They had been laid out as lures in a booby trap." CBS (Cowan) added, "The same umbrella terror group that claimed al Qaeda had captured the men yesterday today posted another note on an obscure website, boasting the men were slaughtered by no other than Abu Hamza al-Muhajir himself, the man the US believes is the successor to terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, lead story, 3:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight there is a real fear that just days after the US was able to find and kill Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who as the head al Qaeda in Iraq became the very face of evil in this war, there may be a new face of evil already -- the new man in charge of al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, the same man believed to be behind the two murders of these two US soldiers." NBC (Boettcher) added, "

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 2, 2:05, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "US military officials tell NBC News the kidnapping and killing of the two American soldiers has all the earmarks of an al Qaeda operation." The "posting also claimed the two American soldiers were killed by al Qaeda's new leader in Iraq -- Abu Hamza al-Muhajir -- who experts believe was out to prove he's every bit as ruthless as his predecessor, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, killed in a US air strike two weeks ago."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On the floor of the US Senate today there was anger and revulsion over the killings of these two American soldiers."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Blitzer) reported, "Military sources tell CNN a tip from Iraqi civilians lead them to the bodies in the Yusufiyah area south of Baghdad. They say the area was booby-trapped and the bodies were mutilated beyond recognition."

The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Moore, 958K) reports, "The investigation into the circumstances of their capture has been opened by Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, chief of day-to-day military operations in Iraq." The Mujahedeen Shura Council, "an al-Qaida-affiliated group posted a message Tuesday on a jihadist Internet site taking responsibility for the killings, but offered no proof of its involvement."

The Washington Post (6/21, A1, Finer, Partlow, 744K) reports Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell "declined to describe the condition of the soldiers' bodies, saying it would be 'inappropriate until I know what the families were told.'" He "said it was clear the soldiers had died of wounds suffered in captivity, rather than at the site of the attack on the checkpoint, but that the cause of death could not be immediately determined."

The Washington Times (6/21, Scarborough, 90K) and New York Times (6/21, Filkins, 1.19M) run similar reports. The New York Times (6/21, Alvarez, 1.19M) also reports a profile of the dead soldiers, headlined "Relatives Describe Young Men Determined To Serve Country." USA Today (6/21, Bazar, Loew, 2.31M), meanwhile, describes the soldiers' families as "devastated" by the news.

US Says Al Qaeda In Iraq Religious Leader Captured. The CBS Evening News (6/20, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The US forces got one of al Qaeda's key people as well. Didn't they?" Cowan: "They did. It was actually the very same day that these two soldiers went missing. They say he was the leader, the religious leader of al Qaeda in Iraq. They say getting him in an air strike was yet another dent to this organization that they hope will stop or at least limit more attacks on US soldiers."

McCain Says Zarqawi's Elimination Hasn't Eliminated Threat. On the CBS Evening News (6/20, story 2, 1:20, Schieffer, 7.66M), Sen. John McCain said, "It's, again, the nature of the enemy. We saw this, of course, with Zarqawi and now obviously, we see this with his successor, which is why we should be extremely guarded in our optimism about the elimination of Zarqawi, because there are obviously people who are willing to take his place. This is still a long, tough slog in Iraq."

FBI Cracking Down On Phony War Heroes. In a front-page story, USA Today (6/21, Zoroya, 2.31M) reports, "The FBI is cracking down on phony war heroes, who often buy medals on the Internet and wear them at public events. This year, federal agents have launched a dozen investigations against people allegedly masquerading as decorated veterans. At that pace, the FBI would open about twice as many cases as it did last year." FBI Special Agent Thomas Cottone said, "These people, by wearing those medals, are literally stealing the valor and recognition of those who legitimately did the act. And this is absolutely disgraceful." USA notes, "The most recent conviction: Theodore Bantis…who pleaded guilty Tuesday to posing as a Marine Corps officer who had won the Navy Cross."

In a second story, USA Today (6/21, 3A, Zoroya, 2.31M) recounts the story of New Jersey resident Gerard Smigel, who pleaded guilty this month to impersonating a highly-decorated Marine Corps Lt. Colonel and "was sentenced to three years of probation and fined $3,000." USA adds, "Masquerading as a war hero has become riskier — but more tempting — during this time of war. 'Right now, most everybody loves the military, and that's why I'm seeing more and more of these impostors,' says…Cottone. The FBI has investigated 58 cases of people allegedly wearing fraudulent military decorations since 2001," and "the FBI could end up investigating more cases of medal fraud this year than in any other previous year, Cottone says."

Gonzales' Response To Question About Children's Music Downloading Noted. The "Reliable Source" column in the Washington Post (6/21, C03, Argetsinger, Roberts) quotes Attorney General Alberto Gonzales response to a reporter's question about whether his two children ever download music illegally: 'Of course not. I remind them: I AM the law!'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Greenberg Sues AIG Over Board Notes. The AP (6/21, Chase) reports, "The former CEO of American International Group Inc., Maurice 'Hank' Greenberg, filed a lawsuit Tuesday seeking records associated with the company's $1.6 billion settlement of allegations that it engaged in deceptive accounting practices." The AP continues, "Starr International Co., a private company led by Greenberg, alleges in the Chancery Court filing that AIG is violating Delaware law by refusing to allow representatives of Starr, which is AIG's largest shareholder, to inspect the company's books and records." The AP adds, "Starr is seeking minutes, notes, transcripts and any other records relating to AIG board and committee meetings dating from Feb. 9, 2005 to the present. … Starr alleges that AIG responded to a June 9 demand letter by offering only heavily redacted 'nonprivileged minutes' of board and audit committee meetings relating only to worker's compensation payments made in connection with the settlement announced Feb. 9 of this year. … In the settlement, AIG, one of the world's largest insurance companies, agreed to pay $1.64 billion to settle allegations by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that the company used deceptive accounting practices to mislead investors and regulatory agencies. The Securities and Exchange Commission filed and settled allegations of accounting fraud with the company simultaneously. … The settlement did not cover Greenberg, who was named in the suit but vowed to fight it in court."

US Subpoenas Delta Petroleum in Options Probe. The AP (6/21) reports, "Delta Petroleum Corp., a natural gas and oil producer, said late Monday it has received a federal subpoena requesting records back to 1996 over its granting of stock options." The AP continues, "The company said it believes the request comes because it was identified May 16 in a 'third-party report' as being at-risk for having backdated stock options for executives. On May 22, the Denver company said its board had formed a special committee to review Delta's option granting practices and related accounting. … The subpoena is from the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York."

DOJ_NMG_0036156

Options Backdating Probe Called "Witch Hunt." In a column for the Wall Street Journal (6/21), Holman Jenkins, Jr. writes, "Another business scandal, this one over options 'backdating,' reveals that some CEOs are 'in it' for the money. Tsk, tsk. … There has been outrage aplenty, lawsuits and even a grand jury investigation over a procession of companies accused of committing this violation of the moral code. A few are big names: Home Depot, Microsoft, UnitedHealth Group. But most are midsized tech companies with good reputations in their industries. So far, about 50 (the number grows daily) are suspected of having granted their executives and employees stock options whose issue date was retroactively established to coincide with a recent low in the company's stock price. … Missing, however, has been any cogent explanation of the possible reasons behind a practice apparently so widespread that companies must either have been sharing notes on it or have discovered it independently following some inner logic of corporate life. Also missing is any cogent explanation of why it's wrong." Jenkins adds, "Since Enron, a great deal has been said about corporate governance, most of it useless. The one lesson that should be reinforced is that overseeing CEO incentives is among the most important board responsibilities, and boards should keep control of it and do it clearheadedly. Yet there is nothing categorically corrupt or improper about backdating to justify a conclusion that the boards here weren't doing just that. … The scandal element, instead, arises because ever-shifting accounting, regulatory and tax standards were, by some readings, punitive during the years in question toward choosing a past date to make an options package effective. We wouldn't want the legal bills of UnitedHealth's Bill McGuire -- or Vitesse Semiconductor's Louis Tomasetta, or KLA-Tencor's Ken Levy. In the end, dozens of executives are likely now to find themselves skinned and hung out to dry over a practice that's innocuous and even sensible in its own right."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former GAO Official Safavian Convicted. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 8, :15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Former Bush Administration official David Safavian has been convicted in the first criminal trial stemming from the scandal surrounding Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Safavian was found guilty of lying about his dealings with Abramoff." NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 8, 0:30, Williams, 9.87M) noted Safavian "was the Bush Administration's procurement chief." USA Today (6/21, 2.31M) reports Safavian "was convicted of obstructing an investigation into whether he aided Abramoff in efforts to acquire property controlled by the GSA in 2002, when Safavian accompanied the lobbyist on a golfing trip to Scotland." The jury "found Safavian hid details of his relationship with Abramoff from a GSA ethics lawyer, the GSA's inspector general's office and the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. He was acquitted of obstructing a Senate investigation."

The CBS Evening News (6/20, story 6, 0:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Safavian "could get up to 20 years in prison." Meanwhile, Roll Call (6/21, Bresnahan) reports Safavian "plans to ask a federal judge to vacate portions of the decision and then will most likely appeal the case, his attorney said."

The Washington Post (6/21, Birnbaum) reports, "Safavian, a former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, was convicted in U.S. District Court here of covering up his many efforts to assist Abramoff in acquiring two properties controlled by the GSA, and also of concealing facts about a lavish weeklong golf trip he took with Abramoff to Scotland and London in the summer of 2002. … This was the first Abramoff-related legal action to go to trial and face a jury. Several legal experts said the case could embolden federal prosecutors to seek additional indictments against cronies of Abramoff, who has been cooperating with the Justice Department since pleading guilty in January to corrupting public officials."

The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Schmitt) reports, "Each count carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison, and a $250,000 fine. U.S. District Judge Paul Friedman set sentencing for Oct. 12." The Times adds, "Safavian sat without expression as the guilty verdicts were read. He was cleared of one count of obstructing the Senate Indian Affairs Committee's investigation. … The verdict adds momentum to a Justice Department investigation focusing on a number of members of Congress, including Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), whose former chief of staff was a government witness against Safavian."

The New York Times (6/21, Shenon) reports, "The verdict was hailed by Justice Department officials as a victory in their wide-ranging criminal investigation of the lobbying operations run by Mr. Abramoff, a Republican fundraiser who pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to go bribe public officials, including members of Congress, and is cooperating with prosecutors." The Times adds, "After four days of deliberation, the jury agreed with prosecutors that Mr. Safavian lied to investigators when he insisted there was no ethical conflict in joining Mr. Abramoff's August 2002 golfing trip to Scotland since, Mr. Safavian claimed, the lobbyist did 'no business' with the General Services Administration. Mr. Safavian was then the chief of staff of the G.S.A., which fuctions as the government's real-estate manager." The Times notes, "Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, the head of the Justice Department's criminal division, said in a statement that 'the message of this verdict is clear: in answering questions posed by Congress and by federal agencies, public officials have the same obligation as does the public for which they serve — to tell the truth.'"

The Financial Times (6/21, Kirchgaessner) reports, "For the Department of Justice, which has stepped up its focus on cases involving influence peddling since the Abramoff case emerged, the courtroom victory suggests that its strategy of working its way up the food chain – by securing guilty pleas from Mr Abramoff's former business associates, former congressional aides, and then from the lobbyist himself – is paying off."

The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Cummings, 2.11M), in a story titled "Probe Becomes Election Issue," says the conviction "is likely to have broad legal and political effects. The guilty verdict, handed down by a federal jury, could pressure more congressional aides to cooperate with the investigation, and complicate the re-election bids of a handful of Republican legislators named during the trial." The verdict also "places at least part of the Abramoff scandal inside the Bush administration, not solely in Congress. It is the first trial victory for the Justice Department's task force investigating Mr. Abramoff."

The Philadelphia Inquirer/Knight Ridder (6/21, Taylor) reports, "During the eight-day trial, prosecutors presented dozens of e-mail exchanges between Safavian and Abramoff that discussed the GSA properties." Knight Ridder continues, "Abramoff contacted Safavian days after his old friend became the GSA's chief of staff to talk to him about the properties, according to federal records. … Abramoff wanted to buy or lease a portion of 600 acres in Silver Spring, Md., and the Old Post Office Building in Washington. At the time, the GSA managed the properties. … Prosecutors said Safavian later advised Abramoff about leasing or buying the properties, gave him internal government documents, and set up a meeting with other GSA officials. … At the time, Safavian had been planning to take the Scotland golf trip with a group that included Abramoff and Ney."

Government Executive (6/21, Mandel) reports, "Safavian faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine for each of the four counts, though his lawyer, Barbara Van Gelder, said she would draw on his clean record in arguing that he serve less than the full 20 years. Sentencing is scheduled for Oct. 12. … Van Gelder said her client will appeal the jury's decision, a process she said could take many years." GE notes, "As possible grounds for appeal, Van Gelder cited concerns with the verdict form, which she said used overly broad language and introduced new wording that had not been defined during the trial. She also described instructions on how the jury was to consider a flood of e-mail traffic between Safavian and Abramoff as confusing and 'hypertechnical,' with some messages to be considered solely for the fact that they were sent, while others could be considered as statements of fact."

The Legal Times (6/21, Schwartz) reports, "Safavian's case was somewhat narrower than those of others targeted in the Abramoff probe. It focused on an August 2002 trip Safavian took to Scotland and London that Abramoff sponsored. Others on the junket included Ohio Republican Rep. Bob Ney and political strategist Ralph Reed, the former head of the Christian Coalition. Attendees played rounds of golf at the Old Course of St. Andrews and stayed at luxury hotels in London and Scotland. … At the time of the trip, Safavian had just been appointed chief of staff to the administrator of the Government Services Administration. But when asking for clearance to go on the trip, Safavian told a GSA ethics officer that Abramoff had no business before the agency because he did all of his work on Capitol Hill. In fact, Abramoff had previously sought assistance from Safavian to secure leases on two GSA-controlled properties."

Bloomberg (6/21, Jensen) reports, "Abramoff, 47, became the subject of a U.S. government task force investigation after a series of articles in the Washington Post in 2004 about his financial dealings with partner Michael Scanlon and their work for American Indian tribes. In January this year, Abramoff pleaded guilty to defrauding the tribes and conspiring to corrupt public officials. … Scanlon and two other former congressional aides, who later worked for Abramoff, have also pleaded guilty to conspiracy. They are cooperating with prosecutors investigating other lobbyists and public officials including U.S. Representative Bob Ney, who traveled with Safavian on an Abramoff-arranged golf trip to Scotland in 2002. Ney has denied all wrongdoing. … 'Prosecutors now have a bigger sword to rattle when they are trying to convince witnesses to cooperate, or individuals to plead guilty,' said Joshua Berman, a former Justice Department lawyer and partner at Sonnenschein, Nath & Rosenthal LLP in Washington. 'The prosecutors can essentially say to a reluctant target or subject, "Look, we're prepared to try these cases. We did it with Safavian and are ready to do it with you."'"

The Washington Times/AP (6/21), Knight Ridder (6/21, Taylor), Los Angeles Times (6/21, Schmidt, 958K) and The Hill (6/21, Tiron) run similar reports.

Nominee To Replace Safavian Promises Effective, Ethical Acquisition System. The Washington Post (6/21, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that Paul A. Denett , the president's choice to head the White House's federal procurement policy office, "promised at his confirmation hearing 'to build a world-class acquisition system that garners the confidence of our taxpayers by consistently delivering efficient, effective and ethical contracting service.'" At the same time, federal jury announced that the man he would replace, David Safavian, "had been found guilty on four of five felony charges tied to a corruption and influence-peddling scandal centered around lobbyist Jack Abramoff ."

Abramoff, Kidan Imprisonment Postponed. The AP (6/21, Yost) reports, "In Miami, meanwhile, a judge granted Abramoff and ex-business partner Adam Kidan another three months before they must begin serving prison sentences for fraud convictions stemming from the purchase of a gambling boat fleet. Abramoff also faces sentencing in Washington on federal charges of conspiracy, tax evasion and mail fraud. … The delay will give the two more time to cooperate with investigators."

Tribe Seeks Probe Of Former Employee Linked To Abramoff. The AP (6/21, Martin) reports, "The Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe wants the U.S. Department of Justice to investigate one of its former employees and his ties to tainted lobbyist Jack Abramoff." The AP continues, "Former legislative affairs worker Christopher Petras is accused by the tribe of giving 'incorrect and misleading' testimony to the U.S. Senate Affairs Committee in September 2004 during hearings about Abramoff and Abramoff's associate, Michael Scanlon. … Although Petras testified before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee that he didn't recall many of the details about his communications with Abramoff and Scanlon, the tribe says a trail of e-mails and other testimony indicate a stronger relationship than Petras revealed." The AP adds, "Federal prosecutors say Abramoff encouraged the tribe to expand a lobbying contract without disclosing that he would receive about 50 percent of the profits from the tribe's payments. From June 2002 to October 2003, the tribe paid about $3.5 million on the contract, with about $540,000 being kicked back to Abramoff, court documents say. … Abramoff's former employer, Greenberg Traurig LLP, has agreed to repay millions of dollars to the tribe as part of a settlement. The Saginaw Chippewas say they paid about $14 million to Abramoff and Scanlon overall. … Tribal Chief Fred Cantu sent a letter last month requesting the Justice Department investigation to U.S. Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican who heads the Senate Indian Affairs Committee. The Senate committee is expected to release its own report this week on its investigation into Abramoff and the tribes."

Libby Supporters Have Raised Over $2 Million For His Defense. The AP (6/21) reports, "Supporters of Vice President Dick Cheney's indicted former chief of staff have raised more than $2 million since late last year for his legal defense in the CIA leak case." Former Cheney spokeswoman Mary Matalin "was hosting a fundraiser at her home Tuesday night to help pay the legal expenses of I. Lewis Libby, who is charged with five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI in the Valerie Plame affair." The $2 million figure "came from Barbara Comstock, a member of Libby's legal team. Among the co-hosts for the event at Matalin's home were former Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham, former Rep. Bob Livingston and oil industry executive and former Commerce Secretary Don Evans." Former Republican Sen. Fred Thompson "hosted a fundraiser at his northern Virginia home last month to raise money for Libby's defense."

Judge Dismisses Fraud Charge Against Chicago Patronage Trial Defendants. The Chicago Tribune (6/21, Bush, O'Connor, 643K) reports, "Mayor Richard Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich and his three co-defendants scored a victory in court Tuesday when a federal judge tossed out a significant fraud charge against all of them in their City Hall corruption trial. U.S. District Judge David Coar's ruling came as prosecutors rested a six-week case that portrayed much of the city's hiring and promotions system as riddled with political favoritism, sham interviews and preselected job applicants. Coar also said Tuesday that he will reserve ruling on whether to dismiss all charges against" codefendants John Sullivan and Patrick Slattery," but "he rejected a defense request to dismiss remaining charges against Sorich and his former aide Timothy McCarthy." The AP (6/21, Reichgott) also reports that Coar's dismissal of the mail fraud charge, "which takes up 13 pages of an 18-page indictment, was a boost" for the defendants. Sorich, McCarthy "and Patrick Slattery still face other charges, including mail fraud," but former streets and sanitation deputy commissioner John Sullivan "now only is charged with lying to the FBI."

Two Ohio Investment Brokers Indicted On Bribery Charges. The Toledo Blade (6/20, Drew, Eder) reported, "The scandal that has gripped state government for 14 months broadened yesterday as two Cleveland-area investment brokers were indicted on charges that they conspired to bribe a high-ranking official of the Ohio Bureau of Workers' Compensation in exchange for getting and keeping a piece of the bureau's business." Michael W. Lewis and Daniel P. O'Neil "worked for three investment firms in the six years they gave Terrence Gasper, the bureau's chief financial officer, use of an oceanfront condominium and a boat slip in the Florida Keys, according to the indictment unsealed…in U.S. District Court" on Monday. US Attorney Gregory White "estimated that the firms for which Mr. Lewis and Mr. O'Neil worked received $5 million to $6 million in brokerage commissions, marketing, and solicitation fees from the bureau." The Columbus Dispatch (6/20, Niquette) noted that an "unprecedented task force of federal, state and county authorities" is "investigating state investment and ethics scandals," and added that Gaspar "pleaded guilty in both federal and state courts June 7 as part of plea agreements that require him to cooperate with the investigation. He admitted accepting free stays at the condominium…a $9,000 college tuition payment for his son and other gifts from former coin dealer Thomas W. Noe, brokers and others." The AP (6/20, Mabin) and Willoughby (OH) News-Herald (6/20, Read) also reported on the indictments.

LAPD, FBI Uncover New Evidence In Insurance Scam-Murder Probe. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Winton, 958K) reports, "Los Angeles police detectives and FBI agents investigating a pair of women suspected of killing two homeless men have turned their attention to one of those victims after uncovering new evidence that they say links the women to his death. Detectives looking into the case of Helen Golay and Olga Rutterschmidt are now focusing primarily on the death of Kenneth McDavid, who was run over in a Westwood alley last June in a hit-and-run that remains unsolved. Authorities said in a search warrant affidavit that an hour before McDavid's body was discovered, Golay called the Auto Club to have a Mercury Sable towed from an intersection a block from where the 50-year-old was hit. In new court papers obtained by The Times, detectives said they found blood and 'organic matter' on the damaged undercarriage of the Sable." The car's registered owner "told Det. Dennis Kilcoyne and FBI Special Agent Samuel A. Mayrose that she never owned the Sable but that her purse had been stolen around April 2003."

Former Chicago-Area Priest Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Possession. The AP (6/21) reports, "A Roman Catholic priest formerly based in suburban Hoffman Estates pleaded guilty Tuesday to possessing child pornography. The Rev. Daniel Schulte, 53, former chaplain at St. Alexius Medical Center, was accused after federal investigators found still and video sexual images of children on the hard drive of his computer. The images included girls and boys younger than 12 years old and some involved material that portrayed sadistic or masochistic acts, according to the plea agreement." The AP notes that after the ISP notified the assistant provincial of the order, "an attorney for the order contacted the FBI and Schulte was moved to St. Louis where both he and his access to the Internet were supervised."

Two Convicted In Internet Piracy Case. The Bay City News (6/21) reports, "Federal prosecutors announced today that two more people, including a Cupertino (CA) man, have been convicted as part of Operation Copycat, the Justice Department's crackdown on Internet piracy." BCN continues, "Cupertino resident Tom Leung, 53, and Ray Morada, 32, of Washington, D.C., were convicted today of conspiracy and copyright infringement charges for their participation in a 'warez group.' … Warez groups are the source of the majority of pirated movies, music and software distributed and downloaded on the Internet, according to federal prosecutors." BCN adds, "Once a warez release group prepares a stolen work for distribution, the material is distributed in minutes to secure, top-level Internet servers throughout the world. From there, within a matter of hours, the pirated works are distributed globally, filtering down to peer-to-peer and other public file sharing networks accessible to anyone with Internet access, according to authorities. … Federal authorities began cracking down on the groups last year with Operation Copycat. To date 36 people have been charged in connection with Operation Copycat and 30 have been convicted, including Paul Sherman, a film critic for the Boston Herald. Sherman pleaded guilty last month to selling more than 100 pre-release review copies of movies to a known warez supplier between 2002 and 2005."

Hooks Joins Father As Defendant In Tennessee Waltz Probe. The AP (6/21) reports, "Former Memphis school board member Michael Hooks Jr. became the 11th person charged in the Tennessee Waltz corruption scandal when he was indicted Tuesday on embezzlement charges." The AP continues, "Hooks' father, Shelby County Commissioner Michael Hooks Sr., was indicted last year on Tennessee Waltz bribery charges and is awaiting trial." The AP adds, "Five of the accused in the federal investigation are current or former state lawmakers, two of whom have been convicted. … The Hooks family has long been active in Memphis politics, and Hooks Jr.'s great-uncle, Benjamin Hooks, is a former national director of the NAACP. … Hooks Jr. is charged in a four-count indictment with skimming public money from the Shelby County Juvenile Court." The AP notes, "While Tennessee Waltz focused on an FBI front company called E-Cycle Management that offered bribes statewide for government favors, it grew out of an embezzlement investigation at the juvenile court in Memphis. … Offenses in the indictment against Hooks Jr. carrying a maximum punishment of 40 years in prison and fines totaling $1 million, though federal guidelines would call for a much lighter sentence upon conviction."

Retired FBI Agent Disputes Testimony Probe Targeted William Bulger. The Boston Globe (6/21, Murphy, 484K) reports, "A retired FBI agent, who went undercover in 1983 to offer bribes to officials, yesterday disputed testimony that the Massachusetts Senate president at the time, William M. Bulger, had been a target of the investigation. 'His name never came up,' John 'Jack' Callahan said in a telephone interview with The Boston Globe." The Globe adds, "Yesterday, Robert Fitzpatrick, who was second in command of the FBI's Boston office from 1981 to 1986, acknowledged that the FBI did not have any evidence of wrongdoing by Bulger during the 1983 investigation. But he stood by his testimony on Monday that Bulger was a target of the inquiry. Fitzpatrick said it was one of nine investigations in his tenure in Boston that he believed had been compromised by leaks to informants, including Bulger's gangster brother, James 'Whitey' Bulger, or others outside the agency."

Strangled NYC Investigator Was Seeking Meeting With Mob Murder Witness. The New York Daily News (6/21, Katz, 729K) reports, "When veteran forensic investigator Angela Clemente drove to a remote parking lot in the dead of night last week, she thought she was about to break another big mob case. Her longtime partner, Stephen Dresch, said yesterday that Clemente was hoping to meet an eyewitness to two 1992 mob slayings," but "instead, Clemente was beaten and nearly strangled last Friday -- and then threatened again. 'The threat that came after the attack was far more alarming than the attack itself,' Clemente told a source yesterday. 'I'm in hiding. … I'm not going to do any further investigation.' The case she was probing stemmed from the slayings of reputed Colombo soldiers" John Minerva and Michael Imbergamo. Clemente "has been seeking evidence that would help clear three men convicted of the murders -- and link the crimes instead to the late Colombo capo Greg Scarpa Sr. and his FBI handler, Lindley DeVecchio."

Study Finds One American In 20 Has Been Stalked. Scripps Howard (6/21, Bowman) reports, "Nearly 5 percent of adults in a national survey reported having been stalked at some point, translating to an at-risk pool of more than 7 million women and 2 million men in the United States." Scripps Howard continues, "Most stalkers aren't strangers, according to the study's lead researcher, Kathleen Basile, a behavioral scientist who works in violence prevention at the National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, part of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention." Scripps Howard adds, "Women, younger adults and those who are single, separated or divorced are most at risk. Younger adults being more likely victims 'goes along with what we know about violence in general,' Basile said. … The results, being published in the American Journal of Preventive Medicine in August, are based on phone interviews done with nearly 10,000 adults between 2001 and 2003, with responses about equally divided between women and men. … According to the researchers, 'Stalking continues to be a public health problem at a magnitude comparable to that measured in the National Violence Against Women Study (done for the Justice Department in 1995-96).'"

Tech Companies Back Efforts To Protect Consumer Privacy On The Internet. The Washington Post (6/21, D3, Hart, 744K) reports, "Several large technology companies, including Google Inc. and eBay Inc., announced support yesterday for stronger federal regulations to protect consumer privacy on the Internet." Twelve companies have formed an advocacy group, the Consumer Privacy Legislative Forum, to push for "greater protection of private information, and several members testified yesterday before a House subcommittee. … The group of companies is seeking federal legislation that would require businesses to notify consumers when collecting personal information, then allow individuals to choose how the information is used and to access data they have provided to cut down on unauthorized use."

AFP (6/21, Chapman) reports, "Google counsel Nicole Wong said Tuesday in a blog posting on the Google website that the company joined a group of 'notable US companies' calling for federal consumer privacy legislation. … There was a 'patchwork quilt' of US state consumer protection laws that varied depending on location and subject, with examples being health, financial, or child-related data, according to Wong. … 'This matrix of laws is complex, incomplete, and sometimes contradictory,' Wong wrote. 'For consumers, the result is a set of privacy protections that are uneven at best.'"

New York City To Try Measures Aimed At Helping Handicapped Voters. The New York Times (6/21, Chan) reports, "For the first time, New York City residents will be able to vote by 'puffing' and 'sipping' air through a straw, pumping a foot pedal, touching a computer screen or pressing flat plastic shapes — two triangles, a circle and a square — affixed to the four corners of a specially configured keyboard." The Times continues, "These new methods, which represent the biggest innovation in the city's voting technologies since the Shoup mechanical-lever machine was introduced in 1962, are a temporary measure intended to help disabled people vote. … The new voting methods are the product of a lawsuit from the federal government. They will be used in the Sept. 12 primary and the Nov. 7 general election as an interim step to comply with a new federal requirement that voting machines be accessible to the disabled." The Times adds, "The new voting methods can be used on 22 ballot-marking devices that will be available at one site in each of the five boroughs. It is an imperfect compromise: by placing the machines at centrally located offices, the city is essentially requiring some of the least mobile voters to travel the longest distances to vote. And because it can take up to 40 minutes to cast a vote using the new machines, voters may find themselves waiting in long lines. … The devices are not actual voting machines; they cannot record votes, but merely generate a printed ballot on a sheet of white paper. The voter, with help from a poll worker if necessary, would then place the ballot in an envelope. The ballot would then be counted by hand, along with other paper ballots, including absentee ballots, on Election Day or shortly after."

Voting Rights Suit Against Kissimmee, FL, Dropped. The AP (6/21) reports, "Four people want to drop a lawsuit alleging city election procedures unfairly diluted the voting power of Hispanics after they found that the minority group now outnumbers registered white voters." The AP continues, "The class-action complaint was filed last year to challenge the way city commissioners are elected, arguing that each spot should represent a geographic district. Instead, residents citywide are allowed to vote on each race, similar to the U.S. Senate. … Despite comprising about 45 percent of Kissimmee's 52,000 people, no Hispanic has ever been elected to the commission." The AP adds, "Armando Ramirez, one of the four residents behind the lawsuit, originally filed a federal complaint six years ago alleging unfair voting practices. In July, the U.S. Justice Department filed a lawsuit against Osceola County on similar grounds, and Ramirez's group said they wanted to carry that momentum by suing weeks later. … However, the voter registration rolls now show that Hispanic voters outnumber white voters by about 900. … 'The lawsuit is unsustainable,' said Ramirez, who ran unsuccessfully for the Kissimmee City Commission in 2002. 'Instead of waiting for the judge to tell us that, we directed our attorneys to' seek a voluntary dismissal. … The Justice Department case against Osceola County is still pending. A department spokesman declined to comment Tuesday on the request to drop the class-action suit."

WPost Opposes Efforts To Ban Flag Burning. The Washington Post (6/21, A20, 744K) editorializes, "If you haven't noticed a rash of flag-burning incidents sweeping the nation that's because, well, there isn't one. But that doesn't stop Republicans from trotting it out as a more-patriotic-than-thou card. They are, as always, close to having the votes to send it to the states for ratification." The amendment "would soil the First Amendment's command that Congress shall 'make no law...abridging the freedom of speech.' … The amendment's power is in its self-confident sweep: Speech, including expressive acts, will not be censored. Government cannot punish ideas."

DOJ Clears McClatchy Purchase Of Knight Ridder. Knight Ridder (6/21, Carey) reports, "The Justice Department has cleared McClatchy to buy Knight Ridder, after McClatchy agreed to sign a guarantee that it will sell the St. Paul Pioneer Press, according to people familiar with the process." Knight Ridder continues, "The Justice Department was concerned about McClatchy's purchase of Knight Ridder because the company would own two papers in the Twin Cities — its own Minneapolis-based Star-Tribune and Knight Ridder's Pioneer Press. … McClatchy already has a buyer lined up for the Pioneer Press: Denver-based MediaNews, which also is buying the San Jose Mercury News, Contra Costa Times and Monterey County Herald, all in California, in a complicated $1 billion deal. That deal is still under antitrust review. McClatchy was asked to guarantee that it would sell the Pioneer Press regardless of whether the sale to MediaNews is approved by regulators." Knight Ridder adds, "All that remains now for the Knight Ridder-McClatchy deal to be complete is to count the shareholder votes on Monday at Knight Ridder's annual meeting in San Jose. Eighty percent of shareholders must approve the deal. The final papers will be signed June 27., at which point Knight Ridder will cease to exist. … The Justice Department is continuing to review MediaNews' $1 billion plan to purchase the four papers, and is specifically looking at overlaps between the Contra Costa Times and MediaNews' Tri-Valley Herald. It is also reviewing the involvement of Hearst in the MediaNews purchase, because Hearst owns the San Francisco Chronicle, which competes with MediaNews in the Bay Area. Hearst is spending $263 million for the Monterey County Herald and the Pioneer Press, but will trade the two papers to MediaNews in exchange for a stake in MediaNews' assets outside the Bay Area." The San Jose Business Journal (6/21) also reports this story.

DOJ, FTC Launch E-Filing System For Pre-Merger Notification Documents. Federal Computer Week (6/21, Hubler) reports, "The Justice Department's Antitrust Division and the Federal Trade Commission announced today an electronic filing system that will allow merging companies to submit pre-merger notification filings, as required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act, via the Internet, eliminating the time and expense of duplicating and submitting written documents." FCW continues, "The new system ends the requirement to submit to Justice and the FTC paper copies of the required pre-merger notification form and attachments, according to a DOJ announcement."

The Dow Jones (6/21) reports, "Companies still will be allowed to file paper copies with the FTC and antitrust division, and also will be able to submit merger notification and report forms electronically along with paper copies of documentary attachments. … The electronic filing option will be available upon Federal Registry publication of the notice that makes the necessary changes to the Hart-Scott- Rodino Act's rules."

Gonzales Touts Progress In Intellectual Property Protection. The UPI (6/21) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department said Tuesday it is making progress in the fight against intellectual property piracy." UPI continues, "A new department report said all of the recommendations from an earlier task force report on intellectual property theft have been implemented. … Intellectual property theft includes the trading and online piracy of copyrighted movies, music and video games." UPI adds, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, in prepared remarks to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in Washington, said the department attempted to implement all 31 recommendations, and, 'I am proud to announce that the Department of Justice has achieved this goal.' … Gonzales cited "The 2006 Progress Report' on intellectual property theft. … Among the highlights, Gonzales said, was the fact that the task force increased the number of prosecutors in the field by not only creating the five additional Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property, or CHIP, units recommended in the 2004 report, but also created an additional seven CHIP units."

The IDG News Service (6/21, Gross) reports, "Since the Justice Department's task force made 31 recommendations for protecting intellectual property, the department has launched Computer Hacking and Intellectual Property units in seven more cities than the task force recommended. The department now has 25 CHIP units across the United States. Among the newest 12 are units in Washington, D.C., Baltimore, Denver, Detroit, and Philadelphia. … Gonzales called intellectual property the 'lifeblood' of the U.S. economy during a speech in Washington, D.C. 'We've done a lot,' he said. 'We have to do a lot more.' … The Justice Department, which released a progress report on the initiative today, has also stationed an experienced prosecutor to work on intellectual property enforcement in Southeast Asia, and will add a prosecutor in Eastern Europe. Those prosecutors will help train foreign prosecutors, investigators, and judges about intellectual property investigations, the department said."

Dow Jones (6/21) reports, "The doubling of federal prosecutions was noted in a 72-page progress report on the department's intellectual property task force, which was released this week. … Gonzales said the Justice Department has set up 25 special computer hacking and piracy units around the U.S. in the last two years, boosting the ability of government prosecutors to dismantle international and domestic counterfeiting organizations. The department also has worked with other agencies to, among other things, press China and other countries to do more in combatting illegal counterfeiting." Dow Jones notes, "Gonzales told the room of business representatives that the department has made combatting illegal counterfeiting a top agency priority, not only for artistic works but also for trademarks, trade secrets and patented products, such as pharmaceuticals and medical devices."

Broadcasting & Cable (6/21, Eggerton) reports, "In its 104-page progress report, the Task force on Intellectual Property says it has implemented recommendations made in October 2004, when it issued its initial report about what steps needed to be taken. … Content providers, arguably led by NBC Universal Chairman Bob Wright, have been pushing for stronger copyright protections and stepped-up pursuit of IP pirates, arguing they threaten hundreds of billions of dollars across a host of sectors, from counterfeit drugs to stolen TV shows, and could impede the transition to digital content distribution."

China Coming Under Pressure Over Increased Piracy. The Legal Times (6/21, Nelson) reports, "The entertainment industry hoped the counterfeiting of movies, music, software and books would plummet after China agreed in 2002 to abide by the World Trade Organization's standards for global intellectual property rights. … Instead, the industry says piracy has increased dramatically, leading some American companies to view the Chinese government as unable -- or unwilling -- to curb it. And industry lobbyists are now helping the U.S. government prepare a case that could be brought against China in the WTO's Dispute Settlement Body." The Times continues, "Earlier this month, Assistant U.S. Trade Representative Timothy Stratford told the American Industries U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission that the United States could launch a WTO case if China doesn't crack down on IP offenders. … But experts suggest that while both the industry and the government talk tough when it comes to taking on China, America may be reluctant to actually bring a complaint against the Asian superpower." The Times adds, "Pushing the industry's case is Washington's Smith & Metalitz, a deceptively small lobbying firm specializing in intellectual property. Although the firm employs just four partners, an associate and a consultant, its list of clients reads like an all-star roster of influential entertainment trade groups. The firm's secret: Smith & Metalitz plays Clark Kent to the International Intellectual Property Alliance's Superman."

Florida Officials Consider AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The Miami Herald (6/21) reports, "The Public Service Commission today is slated to consider AT&T's $67 million acquisition of BellSouth, a deal that some opponents claim will lead to reduced competition." The Herald continues, "On Monday, Florida Attorney General Charlie Crist sent a letter to the PSC urging it to ensure that merger doesn't harm competition for basic telephone service. … 'My concern here is that the merged company might squeeze out competition to the detriment of consumers, particularly seniors, and residential and small-business customers,' Crist wrote." The Herald adds, "AT&T would grow to 70 million local phone customers and nearly 10 million broad band subscribers in 22 states if the deal is completed. The merger requires approval from both companies' shareholders, the Federal Communications Commission and the Justice Department. State regulatory agencies, including the PSC, also are weighing in on the deal."

FTC Reportedly Nearing Approval Of Lockheed-Boeing Rocket Deal. The AP (6/21) reports, "Defense contractor Lockheed Martin Corp. has received a copy of a draft consent order proposed by federal antitrust regulators to approve the creation of a joint rocket venture with rival Boeing Co., which has rocket production facilities in Decatur, Ala." The AP continues, "Lockheed received the draft from the Federal Trade Commission about 10 days ago, company spokesman Tom Jurkowsky said Tuesday. He was unaware of the contents or how long Lockheed will review it before sending recommendations back to the FTC." The AP adds, "Boeing Co. has also received a copy, said Dan Beck, a company spokesman in Virginia. Beck did not know when the company would send recommendations back to the FTC. … He also said he didn't know when the FTC would approve or reject the merger announced in May 2005."

Bayer Proceeds With Schering Takeover. The AP (6/21, Rising) reports, "German drug and chemical maker Bayer AG said Tuesday it now controls enough shares of Schering AG for it to go ahead with its nearly 17 billion euros ($21.33 billion) takeover of the rival company. … 'Bayer has gained control of a total of 88.0 percent of Schering's approximately 191 million issued and outstanding shares,' Bayer said in a statement. [The attainment of a three-quarters majority was the last remaining condition of the takeover offer. Both the EU Commission and the U.S. antitrust authorities had already given their unconditional approval.'" The AP continues, "The announcement appeared to mark the final end to a merger battle over Schering between Bayer and fellow German drugmaker Merck KGaA. … Bayer's initial 16.5 billion euros ($20.7 billion) takeover bid for Schering trumped a hostile 14.9 billion euros ($18.69 billion) offer by Merck, which later said it was pulling out. … Merck then started snapping up Schering shares, making it look unlikely that Bayer would get the 75 percent stake it needed in order for the takeover to go through. … But at the last minute, Merck agreed to sell the 21.8 percent stake in Schering that it had accumulated to Bayer at a premium price of 89 euros ($111.66) per share, which bumped the total value of the takeover up to about 16.9 euros billion ($21.2 billion)."

Suits Allege Collusion On Nurses' Pay. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Maher) reports, "Four lawsuits filed in federal courts in four cities allege that hospital systems colluded to keep nurses' pay artificially low despite concerns of a nursing shortage." The Journal continues, "The suits, which seek class-action status, allege the systems shared information on pay practices with an understanding that they wouldn't outbid one another to recruit nurses." The Journal adds, "The lawsuits -- put together with the help of the Service Employees International Union, which represents nurses and others -- were filed yesterday in Chicago, San Antonio, Memphis, Tenn., and Albany, N.Y., against more than 17 hospitals and allege that they violated antitrust laws. … Several thousand nurses in each city could be eligible to participate if class-action status is granted, said Daniel Small, a partner at Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll PLLC, in Washington, D.C., which brought the suits. The accusations are based on information lawyers gathered from interviews with dozens of former and current system employees, Mr. Small said. The estimated wage losses came from economists, he said."

Studio Sues Man Over Internet Film. The Washington Post (6/21, C1, Weiss) reports, "Chris Moukarbel was intrigued by director Oliver Stone's latest project, a $60 million movie to be released this summer about two police officers rescued from the rubble of the twin towers. … But as a 28-year-old filmmaker, Moukarbel wanted to do more than simply watch Stone's 'World Trade Center.' He decided to create his own version -- using a bootleg copy of the screenplay and Yale University student actors -- and offer it free on the Internet." The Post continues, "Although his film is only 12 minutes long and doesn't have a cast to rival Nicolas Cage and Maria Bello, it has brought the power of Hollywood down on him. … Paramount Pictures is suing Moukarbel in U.S. District Court in Washington, asking the court to prohibit the distribution of his movie. 'He's free to make any World Trade Center movie he wants to make, but not our movie with our script,' said Nancy Kirkpatrick, a Paramount spokeswoman." The Journal adds, "According to its lawsuit, which was filed Friday, the studio is afraid that people will see the student film on the Internet and confuse it with the big-time Hollywood version set to hit 1,500 screens on Aug. 9 and backed up with a $40 million marketing campaign."

Televisa Group Is Early Favorite In Univision Auction. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Berman, Sender, Lyons) reports, "The two groups bidding for Univision Communications Inc. were last night preparing offers near the range of the company's current stock price of $35.40 a share, valuing the broadcasting concern at around $11 billion, people familiar with the matter said." The Journal continues, "As in any auction, the prices offered in the first round can differ substantially from final offers. But bidders are coping with skittish debt markets and banks that have reined in their lending in recent weeks. That has made it harder for buyers to reach the $40-a-share price that Univision, the nation's largest Spanish-language broadcaster by audience, first hoped to reach." The Journal adds, "The group widely viewed as the favorite to win -- consisting of Mexican broadcaster Televisa SA, Venezuela's Venevision Investments LLC and private-equity shops Bain Capital, Blackstone Group, Cascade Investments, and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. -- was last night discussing an offer below Univision's current market price, though that could rise to at or around market at the last moment, these people said. Televisa already owns 11% of Univision. … Another group -- Texas Pacific Group Inc., Thomas H. Lee Partners, Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners Inc. and media mogul Haim Saban -- was preparing an offer in the $35 range, people familiar with the matter said. That is at or below where Univision's class A shares stood yesterday -- at $35.40, down 30 cents for the day -- in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading."

EU Antitrust Head Endorses China's Anti-Monopoly Law. The AP (6/21) reports, "European Union antitrust chief Neelie Kroes said Tuesday that China's move to adopt an anti-monopoly law would help benefit China's economy by attracting more business investors." The AP continues, "The EU Competition Commissioner made the comments after talks with China's Vice Minister of Commerce Ma Xiuhong at EU headquarters. … 'This is an important step toward an effective competition regime,' Kroes said in a statement. 'The Chinese economy will benefit from the implementation of a sound competition policy, as will any company seeking to do business in China.'" The AP adds, "The Chinese Cabinet endorsed a draft anti-monopoly law on June 8 aimed at boosting fair competition after decades of domination by state industry. Foreign business groups, however, have expressed concern that it might be used to restrict or interfere with their investments. … Beijing officials said the proposed legislation would not discriminate between domestic and foreign companies. China began drafting the law in 1994 and a first draft was completed in 2003. … But progress was stymied by controversy over how to carry out enforcement, given the prevalence of state-owned monopolies or semi-monopolies in many industries. The draft law still needs the backing of China's legislature before it can become law."

Former Firefighter Pleads Guilty To Setting Nevada Fires. The AP (6/21) reports, "An ex-firefighter has pleaded guilty to setting three wildfires that burned hundreds of acres of national forest in central Nevada last August, a federal prosecutor said Monday." The AP continues, "Mark E. Morgan worked temporarily with a U.S. Bureau of Land Management crew. Investigators said he started the fires because he was bored and needed the paycheck. … Morgan, 34, faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine, and he could be required to pay restitution, U.S. Attorney Daniel G. Bogden said in a statement. He entered the plea Thursday. Sentencing was set for October." The AP adds, "The fires in the Humboldt-Toiyabe National Forest in Lander County, about 170 miles east of Reno, burned more than 550 acres of timber, brush and grassland. Two miles of fence also burned, but no injuries were reported. … When questioned by investigators, Morgan admitted starting two fires with a cigarette lighter and the third with a flare gun."

Draft National Parks Regs Make Conservation A Priority. Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne has issued new draft guidelines for managing the national parks. According to the Washington Post (6/21, A19, Eilperin, 744K) reports, the draft guidelines "make conservation the top priority -- ahead of recreation and energy development." The Post said the proposed guidelines "pleased environmentalists but angered off-road vehicle users, who said they fear that the Interior Department is modeling its practices after those of the Clinton administration."

Leonhardt Says Government Should Encourage Purchase Of Fuel-Efficient Cars.

DOJ_NMG_0036166

David Leonhardt writes in the New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) that "since the start of the year, the federal government has been giving generous tax credits to hybrid buyers." The "point of a tax policy like this…is to give people an incentive to change their behavior, and persuading Americans to use less oil certainly sounds like one of Washington's priorities these days." Leonhardt suggests the government should "set up a simple system of rewards and penalties — with the single goal of reducing oil use, regardless of the means — and then let the marketplace work it out. Economists tend to prefer a gas tax, but it's not the only option. … The Big Three have the engineering expertise to build vehicles that can go a long way on a gallon of gas. If Washington would only nudge people to buy cars like that, Detroit would start making them."

Redesign Of Federal Ethanol Incentives Urged. David Morris, vice president of the Institute for Local Self-Reliance, writes in the New York Times (6/21, 1.19M), "Congress is considering several bills to extend the 51-cent-per-gallon tax credit for ethanol producers beyond its 2010 expiration date. But let's hope that our elected representatives don't make their decision in the grips of an ethanol haze. … How might Washington redesign the federal incentive to reflect the realities of an increasingly competitive absentee-owned, large-scale ethanol industry? First, tie incentive levels to an index comprised of the price of a bushel of corn and the wholesale price of a gallon of gasoline. … Second, transform part of the federal incentive from a gas tax exemption for those who market the ethanol into a direct payment to those who produce it."

Eminent Domain Actions Surge In Wake Of Kelo Decision. The Washington Times (6/21, Price, 90K) reports on a 100 page report form the Institute of Justice which says the Supreme Court's ruling last year on eminent domain has "opened the floodgates" to eminent domain actions nationwide. The Times reports, "In the year since the Kelo decision, nearly 6,000 properties nationwide have been threatened or taken under that precedent, more than half the number that had been seized over a previous five-year period," according to the report.

Report Says Government Funding Insufficient For Avian Flu Monitoring. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 9, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Agriculture Department's inspector general says the government does not now have adequate measures in place to monitor for the deadly H5N1 strain of the bird flu. That strain has killed 130 people worldwide but has never been detected in North America. Officials in charge of watching out for the virus says they have received more funding to improve surveillance in the future, but it is insufficient right now."

The New York Times (6/21, McNeil, 1.19M) reports the audit found that the department "relied too heavily on voluntary testing by the poultry industry and reports from state agriculture departments." A USDA spokeswoman, Hallie Pickhardt, said that the agency "agreed with everything in the report, and we're either doing it or going to be doing it." The audit "began before Congress passed President Bush's plan for dealing with a pandemic flu outbreak, which gave the department an additional $91 million to fight avian flu," Pickhardt noted. However, she said the agency "had no plans to make the voluntary testing now conducted by the poultry industry mandatory."

Veterans Agency Releases Bird Flu Plan. The AP (6/21, Bridges) reports the Department of Veterans Affairs said Tuesday it would close its national cemeteries in the event of a bird flu pandemic "because of staffing shortages, leaving families to delay burial or seek interment elsewhere." According to a draft plan, the veterans health care system would "continue treating veterans at its hospitals and clinics, and would provide care to active-duty military personnel and civilians if necessary."

US Falls Behind In Livestock Tracking. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (6/21, A1, Stecklow, 2.11M) reports that "more than two years" after the US Department of Agriculture "pledged to hasten creation of a national identification system for tracing livestock quickly during a disease outbreak" the US "still has no national ID system." The USDA, which has been spent a decade and $84.7 million to develop it, "now says one will begin operating next year." However, the agency has "abandoned the idea of mandatory participation, leaving critics to cast doubt on that projection." USDA officials "express confidence that market forces, including pressure from big beef buyers and export markets, will help drive cattle owners to register their animals." But the Journal reports that "a number of animal-health experts and several former USDA officials scoff at a voluntary system," saying many ranchers, "fearing legal liability if their animals are found to be diseased, will participate only if the system is mandatory."

Japan Agrees To Lift Ban On US Beef. The AP (6/21, Yamaguchi) reports Japan agreed Wednesday to lift its ban on US beef imports, "pending planned inspections of US meat processing plants," the agriculture ministry said. The AP says the announcement "resolves a thorny, long-running trade dispute between the allies, and gives US ranchers access to what was once their most lucrative export market."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Newly-Released Files Reveal Extensive FBI Surveillance Of Arthur Miller. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/21, Italie) reports on the FBI's files on playwright Arthur Miller, "obtained by The Associated Press through the Freedom of Information Act. … For a decade before his congressional testimony" before HUAC in 1956, "the FBI kept track of the playwright, but ended up making a more convincing case that Miller was a dissenter from the Communist Party rather than a sympathizer. 'Miller became disillusioned with the party because the party did not stimulate in him the ability and inspiration to do creative writing as he had expected when he joined the Party,' one informant told the FBI." The AP notes, "The FBI not only kept records of Miller's political statements, from his opposition to nuclear weapons to his attacks against the anti-communist blacklist, but of his affiliation with such organizations as the American Labor Party ('a communist front') and the 'communist infiltrated' American Civil Liberties Union."

FBI Adds Fugitive Nevada Murder Suspect To Most Wanted List. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/21, Sonner) reports, "The mothers of both the victim and the husband accused of killing her were among some 500 mourners who attended Charla Mack's private funeral service Tuesday as the FBI added Darren Mack to its list of 'Most Wanted' fugitives. … The FBI gave Mack top billing on it's Web site list for 'Most Wanted' fugitives, describing" him "as a bodybuilder and hunter with 'access to all types of weapons. He should be considered 'armed and dangerous,' FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said." The AP notes, "Authorities said they were uncertain whether Mack had fled the country. Mueller said anyone with information on Mack should contact the FBI or the nearest U.S. Embassy or Consulate." KVBC-TV Las Vegas (6/20) and KLAS-TV Las Vegas (6/20) also report on the FBI's addition of Mack to the Most Wanted fugitive list.

Police Found Explosive Materials In Mack's Apartment. The Reno Gazette-Journal (6/20, Bellisle) reported that a search warrant revealed "Darren Mack had bombmaking materials in his bedroom. The materials, when mixed together and attached to a blasting cap or shot at, will explode, said Washoe County sheriff's Sgt. Lou Gazes…who was at Mack's apartment. … During a search of Mack's apartment after the shooting and stabbing, police also found ammunition, notes and printed material that 'contain allegations that Judge Weller was corrupt and had exhibited favoritism in his rulings,' according to the search warrant affidavit."

Joint Effort Announced To Track Use Of Fentanyl-Laced Heroin. From Philadelphia, the AP (6/20, Loviglio) reports city state and federal law enforcement and public health officials on Tuesday "announced a joint regional effort to track the ongoing deaths attributed to painkiller-laced heroin and identify the suppliers of the drug. The fentanyl-laced heroin has caused about 70 deaths in the Philadelphia metropolitan region and more than 200 overdoses nationwide since it was first spotted in April," according to U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Meehan. "To determine the full scope of the problem in the region, officials representing law enforcement in Philadelphia and Camden County, N.J.; the federal Drug Enforcement Agency and the FBI; and Philadelphia's behavioral health department said they would share information and coordinate their investigations into the spike of fentanyl-related deaths since the spring."

The Gloucester County (NJ)Times (6/20, Mccarthy) reports on the death of a 20-year-old that may be linked to heroin laced with fentanyl.

Reporting Continues On Decline Of Illegal Drug Use Among US Workers. Bloomberg (6/20) reports, "Barry Sample, director of science and technology in Quest's employer solutions division, said he was encouraged by the findings, especially the drop in amphetamine use found among general workforce employees. About 75 percent of these tests are given before employment, and 10 percent are random screenings, he said."

California's Contra Costa Times (6/20) editorializes, "The Bush administration reported Monday that there has been a major decline in the number of meth lab seizures nationwide. … It is possible that the meth lab people are getting smarter and hiding their labs better or that the police don't have the adequate manpower to search for the labs and, therefore, the seizures have dropped. It is also possible that meth users have found ways to get around the drug tests."

Missoula, Montana's New West (6/20) writes, "New federal reports from the Drug Enforcement Administration say that use of methamphetamines is declining in some Western states, but officials in the energy industry in Utah say it's on the rise, so where are we in the fight against this destructive drug?"

Missouri Leads Nation In Meth Lab Seizures. The AP/KWMU (6/20) reports, "Despite a 22% decline from last year, Missouri still leads the nation in police seizures of illegal meth labs. Missouri is one of at least 37 states with laws that restrict the sale of cold medications."

$8 Million To Be Used To Combat Arizona Meth Problems. The Arizona Republic (6/20) writes, "State lawmakers have agreed to pump $8 million toward tackling meth addiction, crafting a plan to beef up law enforcement and provide money for prevention, treatment and education programs. The idea: Disrupt the flow and sale of meth in local communities while teaching children about the evils of meth before they are tempted to try the drug."

US Asks Suriname To Extradite Suspect Wanted On Drug Charges. The AP (6/21) reports a U.S. Embassy spokesman said Tuesday that the U.S. "has asked Suriname to extradite a Guyanese man wanted on drug charges in New York. Shaheed Khan was arrested Thursday by authorities in Suriname. He is accused of leading a criminal network that smuggled arms, ammunition and cocaine from Colombia to Europe and the United States via Guyana and Suriname."

Attorney Pleads Guilty In Virginia Marijuana Case. The Richmond (VA)Times Dispatch (6/21) reports, "A criminal-defense attorney appeared in federal court yesterday as a criminal defendant and pleaded guilty to peddling marijuana. Jeremy Clyde Sharp, 35, faces up to five years in prison…when he is sentenced on Sept. 20…on one count of conspiracy to possess marijuana with the intent to distribute it. … When Sharp's …home was searched in early February, investigators from the Drug Enforcement Administration, Henrico County police and Virginia Commonwealth University police also found the remains of a dismantled marijuana-growing operation."

Selig Against MLB Saving Samples To Deter Use Of Human Growth Hormone. According to the New York Times (6/21, Curry), several scientists, including Dr. Donald H. Catlin, who baseball officials "appointed to research a test for the hormone known as HGH, have said that such a search could be arduous. A possible option to deter HGH use would be to save urine samples already collected by baseball. If players knew there was a possibility they could be punished at a future date for drugs they had used in the past, the frozen samples might be a deterrent." However, the Times says Commissioner Bud Selig has dismissed the notion.

UN: Colombia's Coca Production Has Increased Despite Eradication Efforts. The AP (6/21) reports the United Nations "says production of the plant used to make cocaine has increased by 8 percent in Colombia, despite record drug seizures and spraying of herbicides. A similar report by the U.S. Office of National Drug Control Policy showed Colombia's coca production skyrocketed 26 percent from 2004 to 2005, in part due to a near-doubling of the area surveyed." According to the AP, the two reports "are the strongest evidence yet that a cornerstone of the U.S.-led war on drugs -- the aerial fumigation of coca fields -- is failing to meet its goal of halving coca production in the Andes."

In a similar but longer version of the story, the AP (6/20) writes, "Although production is on the rise in Colombia, the U.N. said it declined in Peru and Bolivia. Coca production in Bolivia fell by 8 percent last year, according to the U.N. The United States, however, is concerned Bolivia's leftist, coca-growing President Evo Morales _ who took office in January _ could relax his country's drug-fighting efforts." There are more than 100 media references to the report on Colombia's increased coca production. The AP story was published by CBS News, FOX News, the New York Times, Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, San Diego Union Tribune, Houston Chronicle, and UK's Guardian.

On its Web site, the BBC (6/20) reports, "The production of coca, the raw material for cocaine, reached 86,000 hectares last year, UNODC found. Despite the rise, it is half of Colombia's cultivation in 2000, which then stood at 163,000 hectares. Colombia needs more international help to find alternative livelihoods for ex-coca farmers, one of the report's authors, Anja Korenblik, said."

Bridgeport, CT, Mayor Admits Using Cocaine. The AP (6/21) reports Bridgeport Mayor John M. Fabrizi publicly "admitted Tuesday that he had abused cocaine while in office. The admission followed the inadvertent court filing of an FBI document in which an alleged drug dealer claimed an associate had a videotape of the mayor using cocaine. In a tearful speech to about 200 city employees in City Council chambers Tuesday, Fabrizi said he had not used drugs in 18 months and had sought help for a drug addiction that he had hoped to handle privately."

The New York Times (6/21, Cowan) reports, "His emotional admission followed months of rumors and the disclosure last week of a court document filed by federal prosecutors suggesting that he had used cocaine with a local Democratic official. The news of his problems was the latest black eye for this troubled city, whose last mayor, Joseph P. Ganim, a Democrat, was convicted on bribery, extortion and other corruption charges and is now serving a nine-year federal prison term."

The Connecticut Post (6/20) writes, "Fabrizi said flatly, 'Over the course of a number of years I abused alcohol and used cocaine occasionally.' Admitting he used cocaine during his time in office as both City Council president and later as mayor, he said he has not used drugs in 18 months."

Texas Prosecutors Seek To Remove Councilman From Office Due To Cocaine Record. The AP (6/20) reports Galveston County prosecutors "have filed a petition to remove a recently elected city council member who was convicted in 2000 on felony cocaine charges. State election law usually prevents someone who has been convicted of a felony from running for or being elected to office. Marc Hoskins, 28, was elected in May and had disclosed his past to the city attorney before the election."

The Houston Chronicle (6/20, Rendon) and Galveston County Daily News (6/20) also reported on efforts to remove Hoskins from office.

West Virginia Attorney Denied Bond On Firearms Violations. The Charleston (WV) Gazette (6/21, Searls) reports, "Evidence shows Charleston lawyer Dante di Trapano could be a danger to the community and regularly violates bond conditions, a federal judge ruled Tuesday in denying di Trapano's bond request." The Gazette continues, "U.S. Magistrate Mary Stanley said di Trapano, 43, had 'demonstrated time and time again that he is not willing to comply' with bond conditions and has 'shown total disrespect for the law' in an order denying him bond." The Gazette adds, "Di Trapano was indicted last week on single counts of being a drug addict in possession of firearms and for allegedly lying on a federal form by stating he was not addicted to drugs when he purchased a gun in February. … Federal agents found eight guns inside di Trapano's South Hills residence in April. Charleston Police Detective Tim Palmer, who is working with federal agents, testified that while the guns were loaded, all were in a gun safe or locked up. … Di Trapano's attorney, Michael Del Giudice, pointed out that none of the prosecutors' witnesses testified di Trapano had been violent, and said his client should be released. … Stanley disagreed and set an Aug. 23 trial date for di Trapano before Chief U.S. District Judge David Faber. Di Trapano is expected to remain in jail until then."

Maryland Man Indicted For Abortion Clinic Bomb Plot. The AP (6/21) reports, "A Maryland man accused of plotting to attack an abortion clinic with a pipe bomb and handgun was indicted Monday on weapons and explosives charges, the U.S. attorney's office said." The AP continues, "A federal grand jury indicted Robert Weiler, 25, on charges of possessing and making an unregistered destructive device, illegally possessing a firearm, and possessing a stolen firearm. … Weiler called the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives on June 8 from a western Maryland highway rest stop to confess to the plan, according to court documents. He told authorities he had built a pipe bomb, stolen a handgun from a friend and planned to attack an abortion clinic in suburban Washington. … That morning, the pipe bomb exploded in a house belonging to a friend of Weiler as a bomb technician tried to defuse it. No one was hurt, but the bomb set fire to the house. … Each count carries a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison. A preliminary hearing is set for Thursday."

IMMIGRATION:

Political Appointment Of Immigration Judges Comes Under Scrutiny. The Legal

DOJ_NMG_0036170

Times (6/21, McLure) reports, "It's just after 2 p.m. and Immigration Judge Garry Malphrus is looking at a long afternoon of deporting illegal immigrants. He punches a button on a tape recorder and intones: 'Respondent was scheduled for a master calendar hearing at 9 a.m. It is now 2:20 p.m.' Malphrus notes the immigrant's failure to appear, asks a lone Immigration and Customs Enforcement lawyer if an attempt has been made to contact the government (the inevitable response: 'no'), and then formally orders the immigrant's removal from the United States. Stop tape. … The routine continues for the better part of an hour. Next file. Repeat script. Stop tape." The Times continues, "Watching this tedious exercise, it's hard to imagine that being appointed a federal immigration judge would be considered a political plum. But that's how these career civil service jobs are increasingly treated, say immigration lawyers who practice before the courts. Malphrus, a former White House aide and Republican campaign veteran, had never practiced immigration law when he joined the bench last year. … 'The Bush administration has realized these are great jobs and maybe [it] shouldn't be left up to the civil service to determine who gets a job,' says Charles Kuck, a vice president of the American Immigration Lawyers Association. 'I believe that these folks without prior immigration experience tend not to be good judges.'" The Times adds, "Whether they're great jobs is a matter of opinion. But with the immigration courts under scrutiny by Congress and the attorney general after a series of federal appellate decisions blasting the courts as sloppy and inept, the issue of just who serves in an office with enormous influence over the lives of immigrants has received scant attention. And the practice of appointing judges with no immigration law experience is condemned by lawyers in the field, who say the complexity of immigration laws means judges such as Malphrus do their training on the job."

Hazelton, PA, Poised To Crack Down On Illegal Immigrants. The AP (6/21, Rubinkam) reports, "-With tensions rising and the police department and municipal budget stretched thin, Hazleton (PA) is about to embark on one of the toughest crackdowns on illegal immigrants anywhere in the United States." The AP continues, "Last week the mayor of this former coal town introduced, and the City Council tentatively approved, a measure that would revoke the business licenses of companies that employ illegal immigrants; impose $1,000 fines on landlords who rent to illegal immigrants; and make English the official language of the city. … 'Illegal immigrants are destroying the city,' said Mayor Lou Barletta, a Republican. 'I don't want them here, period.'" The AP adds, "Barletta said he had no choice but to act after two illegal immigrants from the Dominican Republic were charged last month with shooting and killing a 29-year-old man. Other recent incidents involving illegal immigrants have rattled this city 80 miles northwest of Philadelphia, including the arrest of a 14-year-old boy for firing a gun at a playground. … The City Council, which approved the measure in a 4-1 vote, must vote on it twice more before it can become law. The next vote is scheduled for mid-July."

House Hearings On Immigration Bill Seen As "Death Knell" For Bush Reform Plan. The Chicago Tribune (6/21, James, 643K) reports, "In a move that could sound the death knell for immigration-reform legislation in Congress this year, House Republican leaders said Tuesday they plan to hold numerous hearings on the issue this summer and only then start talks with the Senate that might lead to a final bill." The delay "raises the likelihood that Congress will end the year without passing major immigration legislation that President Bush has supported. That would be a signal defeat for the president."

The AP (6/21, Espo) reports, "In a defeat for President Bush, Republican congressional leaders said Tuesday that broad immigration legislation is all but doomed for the year, a victim of election-year concerns in the House and conservatives' implacable opposition to citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants." The AP adds that "in deference to the president," neither Speaker Dennis Hastert "nor any other Republican official in either house said publicly that the president's ambitious plan -- including a guest worker program as well as an opportunity for citizenship for many illegal immigrants -- was dead for the year." But "several Republicans in both houses, speaking on condition of anonymity, were less guarded. 'There will be no path to citizenship,' said one lawmaker who attended a strategy session in Hastert's office."

The Washington Times (6/21, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Aides in both the House and Senate said yesterday the developments mean immigration legislation is essentially dead for the year," and the New York Times (6/21, Hulse, 1.19M) says the hearings puts "an overhaul of immigration laws in serious doubt," adding "a White House spokeswoman said Mr. Bush would press for legislation. 'The president is undeterred in his efforts to pass a comprehensive immigration reform bill,' said the spokeswoman, Dana Perino, who said the White House was 'committed to working with members to see if we can reach a consensus on a bill that will help solve our nation's immigration problems.'"

USA Today (6/21, Kiely, 2.31M) quotes Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean saying, "Before the speaker will appoint conferees, he wants to get to the bottom of the Senate Kennedy bill." Bonjean's "characterization of the Senate bill, identifying it with Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, an icon of Democratic liberalism, reflects the deep divisions in the Republican Party over immigration."

The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Lueck, 2.11M) says the move "clouds the prospects for Congress to complete overhaul legislation before the November elections," while the Washington Post (6/21, A1, Weisman, Murray, 744K) says it "could bury…Bush's high-profile effort to overhaul immigration law until after the midterm elections." The announcement "was the clearest sign yet that House Republicans have largely given up on passing a broad rewrite of the nation's immigration laws this year." Roll Call (6/21, Ben Pershing) runs a similar report under the headline "Immigration Bill Chances Fading." The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Gaouette, 958K) also reports the story.

Dana Milbank in his "Washington Sketch" column in the Washington Post (6/21, A2, 744K) criticizes both parties for engaging in partisan political attacks rather than making serious progress on Iraq, immigration and the minimum wage. In response to Republican claims that Democrats wanted to "Cut and run" on Iraq, On Imus in the morning Sen. John Kerry said "My plan is not cut and run. Their plan is lie and die." Meanwhile on the cable news shows RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "There's a debate going on within the Democratic Party. … Some are saying we need to cut and run, others are saying we need to cut and jog, and still others are saying we need to cut and walk." His "metaphor may have been muddled – 'cut and run' involves anchor cable and sail lashings, not the human leg -- but he had lawmakers' sentiments right. If Democrats were cutting and running from Iraq, Republicans were cutting and running from a minimum-wage increase and immigration legislation."

Gutierrez Makes Case For Reform. The Hill (6/21, O'Connor) reports Bush "has toured the border in recent weeks with congressional Republicans, and Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez is touring parts of New Mexico and Texas this week to push the president's comprehensive reform plan. 'We need to have comprehensive reform,' Gutierrez said in a phone interview from Odessa, Texas. 'In order to secure our borders, we need to secure our interior and enforce employers.'" Gutierrez "echoed Bush's contention that border enforcement is the primary goal of any reform measure but that it is impossible to address enforcement realistically without accounting for the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in this country." The commerce secretary "said it is imperative for Congress to work together in resolving this complicated issue and find a workable solution on which all sides could agree."

Mehlman Says Securing Borders A Priority, But Comprehensive Reform Is Goal. RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman on CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Blitzer) was asked whether the failure of Republicans to proceed with a conference on the immigration bill was a sign Republicans wanted immigration "as an issue and don't want to compromise." Mehlman replied, "I don't think that's the case. Think of what Congress passed last week. They passed a significant amount of money for more personnel at the border, more technology at the border, and more barriers. The President, the House, Senate and Republicans all agree we need to secure our borders, first. But the President also believes and I think he's right, we want to do more than deal with the immediate problem. We want to fundamentally make sure that the reason we have so much illegal immigration in this country."

Former Illegal Supports Tightening Border. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Bustillo, 958K) reports on Evaristo Silva, an apple farm owner who came to the US as an illegal immigrant and became a citizen after President Regan's Amnesty. Silva is for tightening the borders and a guest worker program, a "stance…largely based on his own bottom line." He says "if half of Latin America keeps coming…you will reach a point where we don't all fit." Sliva also notes increasing urban problems and a decreasing quality of life.

LATimes Says GOP Politicizing Immigration Debate. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, 958K) editorializes that you can tell "a governing party is running out of steam" if "it controls all branches of government yet abandons even the pretense of addressing an issue most members claim is a 'crisis'," as the GOP-led House did in postponing reconciliation of the immigration bills. "House GOP leaders can barely conceal their preference for divisive politics over sound policy," and are naming "field meetings," which "are nonsense," in order to "deliver maximum demagogic effect."

These "Republicans…prefer clinging to the dangerous fantasy that a massive, militarized wall must be approved before discussions can even begin over what to do with the millions of indispensable, but vilified, workers already here," and "If inaction and xenophobia are all the party has left, this could be its last 100 days."

More Commentary. Lawrence Downes writes in the New York Times (6/21, 1.19M), "The arguments made by hard-line critics of immigration reform are depressingly simple, which makes them simply depressing. They boil down to this: the immigration problems we have today, and a vast array of other problems, begin and end with immigrants themselves, the people who have committed the offense of being here illegally -- or just being here, period, in undesirable numbers, with undesirable habits and undesirable effects on the health of the nation. Their presence here is seen as overwhelmingly if not entirely bad, an unpardonable offense for which American citizens are made to suffer. … It will be solved by keeping people out, and kicking people out. … It's no wonder some people compare immigrant workers to locusts, bacteria or an occupying army." Downes remarks on the "disturbing role played by fear" in the debate. Downes concludes, "It's dangerous. It's not rational. But the argument on the restrictionist side isn't about being rational. It's about being afraid."

TAX:

Wyoming Man Pleads Guilty To Colorado Tax Fraud Scheme. The Denver Business Journal (6/21) reports, "A Wyoming businessman has pleaded guilty for his part in a tax fraud scheme that began in Denver." The Journal continues, "Russell J. Brown pleaded guilty in federal court in Seattle to aiding and assisting in the filing of a false tax return for Paul Bekins, the former president and majority owner of a Seattle moving company. … Brown and Bekins were both members of Tower Executive Resources, a Denver-based organization that helped its members evade paying federal income taxes, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. The organization helped its members set up offshore bank accounts and corporations to hide income from the Internal Revenue Service. … Taxpayers paid as much as $50,000 to join Tower, the justice department alleged." The Journal adds, "Bekins previously entered a guilty plea. He was sentenced last year to six months of house arrest, followed by 18 months of supervised release and 300 hours of community service. The Justice Department said Bekins listed his 'other income' in 1999 as $77,515 when it was actually $2.6 million. … The government said Brown helped Bekins avoid paying $1.3 million in federal income taxes. … Brown will be sentenced later this year."

California Man Charged With $20 Million Tax Fraud. The AP (6/21) reports, "A businessman who has donated hundreds of thousands of dollars to local colleges and nonprofits is accused of defrauding the government of more than $20 million in taxes." The AP continues, "Gene Haas, the 54-year-old owner of Oxnard (CA)-based Haas Automation, was arrested Monday for investigation of conspiracy, filing false tax returns and witness intimidation. … Charges filed by the U.S. Attorney's Office accuse him of orchestrating a plan to list $50 million in bogus expenses that could be written off as business costs and save the company $20 million in taxes. Haas, of Camarillo, was being held without bail." The AP adds, "Haas Automation, which makes computerized machine tools, said in a statement that Haas was not guilty and that the tax issues 'revolve around' the company's former financial officer, John Phillips. … Last month, Haas Automation by default won a Ventura County Superior Court lawsuit accusing Phillips of cheating the company out of $27.5 million."

GOP Leaders To Push Compromise Estate Tax Legislation. The Washington Post (6/21, A4, Weisman, 744K) reports, "Republican leaders announced yesterday that the House will vote this week on estate tax legislation that falls short of full repeal, conceding defeat on a philosophical issue that has been central to the GOP economic plank for more than a decade." The bill, introduced by House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, "marks a major turnaround for congressional Republicans, who for years have made 'Death to the death tax' a political battle cry." The Post adds, "Senior House Republicans conceded that a long-sought permanent repeal of the estate tax is now out of reach. And with the possibility that Republicans will lose Senate seats in the midterm elections in November, GOP tax writers decided to grab the most lucrative deal possible in case Republican power begins to ebb."

The New York Times (6/21, Andrews, 1.19M) reports, "The latest proposal would eliminate the tax for all estates worth less than $5 million -- up to $10 million for couples." That "would cover more than 99.5 percent of estates, according to Congressional estimates. In addition, the compromise would reduce the tax rates on the few estates that would still be subject to a tax." The House proposal" is aimed at giving Senate Republican leaders another chance of passing legislation. Last week, Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, the majority leader, acknowledged that he could not pass a full repeal bill and would wait until the House voted on a new proposal before trying again in the Senate." The House bill "is similar to a compromise that Senate Republicans circulated two weeks ago, without success. But it includes a tax cut that would save timber companies about $900 million over the next three years, a new twist that could win as many as four more Democratic votes in the Senate."

IRS Collects Just Over 10% Of Fines On Preparers. USA Today (6/21, McCoy, 2.31M) reports that the IRS has collected just over 10% of every dollar in fines it has assessed on tax preparers since 2003. During the last three fiscal years, "the IRS fined 528 tax preparers roughly $4.7 million for taking unsubstantiated deductions, cashing clients' tax refunds or other violations of tax laws. But a USA TODAY review found the agency has so far collected about $518,000 of the penalties, or 11%. Roughly half the penalized preparers have paid nothing, while half have paid some or all their fines, according to the IRS."

IRS To Hire Private Debt Collectors. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Herman, 2.11M) reports in its "Tax Report" column that the IRS is resuming plans to hire private debt collection forms to collect large sums of unpaid taxes. The IRS "said this week it received the green light to proceed with the project's first phase -- in which three firms will begin pursuing about 40,000 people -- when the Government Accountability Office, a congressional investigative agency, rejected challenges by companies not awarded IRS contracts." The IRS plans "eventually to hire as many as 10 firms by 2008, when the program will be fully operational." Over the course of 10 years, "the IRS expects the private firms to help it collect an additional $1.4 billion in unpaid taxes."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

House Passes Pentagon Budget After Rejecting NSA Surveillance Cut. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, A8, Rogers, 2.11M) reports the House voted 407-19 to pass a $427.6 billion Pentagon budget, which includes an additional $50 billion for Iraq operations, "after narrowly rejecting," 219-207, "a bipartisan effort to curb funding" for the NSA's warrantless surveillance program. While Rep. John Murtha said he "now felt 'comfortable there are adequate safeguards,'" and House Intelligence Chairman Peter Hoekstra pledged a summer hearing on "a new legal framework for the program," 23 Republicans still "broke ranks in support" of the amendment, "which directly challenged President Bush by proposing to bar funding" for any domestic electronic surveillance that does not comply with FISA-required court review. The Journal says the "length and emotion of the House debate testified to the continued concern in Congress that the White House has been unilaterally circumventing the need to seek warrants under FISA."

Flake Attempts To Strip Hastert Earmark From Defense Bill. The Hill (6/21, Allen) reports, "Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.) escalated his anti-earmark crusade yesterday by attempting to strip a request by Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) out of a defense appropriations bill." Flake "offered an amendment designed to kill a $2.5 million provision intended for a technology organization created by one of Hastert's former aides. The amendment, one of about 10 he offered, was expected to fail miserably as of press time." The earmark "is for the Illinois Technology Transition Center, a program established late last year through a partnership between the Pentagon and a private outfit run by Thomas V. Thornton, a former policy director for Hastert in the early '90s. Neither Thornton nor Hastert's office replied to requests for comment on the earmark."

Senate Panel Approves Bill Designed To Cut Federal Spending. The AP (6/21, Taylor) reports, "In an election-year bid to polish their credentials as fiscal conservatives in an election year, Senate Republicans on Tuesday advanced a bill designed to force cuts in the spiraling growth of federal benefit programs while also reviving the line-item veto." The measure, written by Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg and "approved by that panel by a 12-10 party-line vote, combines several ideas aimed at putting the brakes on spending. Most striking, the bill would force mandatory cuts to the deficit, enforced by across-the-board cuts to benefit programs such as Medicare, Medicaid and unemployment insurance if Congress can't meet deficit targets on its own." Gregg "acknowledged that his bill won't pass the full Senate, and Republicans seem to welcome the prospect of a filibuster by Democrats." That "would allow them to accuse Democrats of being weak on controlling spending while sparing Republican moderates from having to vote on the bill's more controversial elements."

The Washington Times (6/21, Hill, 90K) reports the bill "would reinstate spending disciplines, including caps on non-entitlement programs, that helped balance the budget in the 1980s and 1990s. It would require the White House to order across-the-board spending cuts in every program but Social Security if Congress did not achieve the deficit-reduction goals." The committee "rejected an amendment by Democrats that would have reinstated required offsets to tax cuts and new spending programs, though former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan and other budget analysts said the policy helped Congress take control over the deficit in the 1990s." Roll Call (6/21, Rosenbaum) also reports the story.

GOP Sen. Judd Gregg, chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, writes in a Washington Times op-ed titled "Stop Federal Overspending" (6/21) that "the federal budget process is ailing. In fact, it is on life support. … It is time to get serious about spending restraint and resurrect the budget process to protect future generations and ensure that we hand our children, and our children's children, a government they can afford."

WSJournal Criticizes Democrats' "Pay-As-You-Go" Budgeting. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) editorializes on the Democrats' "ruse" that "goes by the name of 'pay-as-you-go' budgeting, which has the political virtue of sounding as if spending won't be able to exceed revenue." The Democrats' "Web site, HouseDemocrats.gov, claims that pay-as-you-go policy 'means that spending increases, as well as tax cuts, need to be offset by cuts in other areas -- like fewer corporate tax breaks.' A three-card monte dealer in Times Square couldn't have said it better. Paygo rules, to use the Beltway argot, were in place from 1990 until they expired in 2002, so we know how they work. And in practice all they really do is constrain tax cuts, not new spending. … The House Democratic agenda promises 'a new direction for America.' But when it comes to paygo and fiscal policy, the only change is their political marketing."

Senate Panel May Not Hold Paulson Hearing Until June 27. In its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (6/20, 2.11M) reported, "While the White House is pushing for the Senate to confirm Henry M. Paulson Jr. as Treasury secretary, the Senate Finance Committee may not hold his confirmation hearing until June 27 at the earliest, setting up a tight schedule for the full Senate to vote on his nomination before the July 4 recess."

Hastert Unlikely To Get Lobbying Overhaul By July 4. CQ (6/20, Kady) reported, "With no easy avenues for compromise on stripping unidentifiable earmarks out of bills or clamping down on so-called 527 groups, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert seems unlikely to get the lobbying overhaul he wants completed by July Fourth. … But Hastert, R-Ill., said he was not willing to back down on the provision regarding the '527' groups that run political advertisements but are free from many disclosure requirements, even if relenting would mean a quick agreement on the legislation (S 2349, HR 4975) that was intended to inoculate Republicans against election-year ethics attacks in the wake of multiple corruption scandals."

Regulations For 527s Suggested. Edward Kangas, the retired chairman of Deloitte Touche Tohmatsu and co-chairman of the Committee for Economic Development's subcommittee on campaign finance, and Charles Kolb, president of the Committee for Economic Development, an independent, nonpartisan, Washington-based organization of over 200 business and education leaders, write in The Hill (6/21) that "unregulated political contributions have the potential to undermine voters' confidence and involvement in our participatory democracy. … If we are serious about eliminating soft money in our campaign system, Congress needs to adhere to the following three provisions recommended by the Committee for Economic Development (CED)." All 527s "that spend money to influence federal elections should be required to register as political committees with the FEC. … Second, all Section 527 groups that broadcast advertisements that promote, support, attack or oppose a federal candidate should be required to pay for such ads only with money raised from individuals under federal contribution limits. … Third, if a group maintains both federal and nonfederal campaign accounts to support voter-registration drives and similar activities, at least half of the costs for such activities must be funded with 'hard money' contributions."

Merchant Marine Graduate Hugged Bush During Graduation. The New York Times (6/21, Mead, 1.19M) reports on Gabriel Whitney, a recent graduate of the United States Merchant Marine Academy. During Monday's commencement ceremony at the Academy, Whitney "hugged Vice Adm. Joseph D. Stewart, the academy's superintendent. … Elated and with his arms still upraised, he turned toward President Bush, who had just delivered the commencement address. Mr. Bush, wearing a quizzical expression, responded by raising his arms as well and moved in for a hug. … 'The president thought the big bear hug was funny,' said Dana M. Perino, a White House spokeswoman. 'He appreciates the terrific enthusiasm of our nation's graduates, and he was honored to be the first president to address the Merchant Marine Academy. It was quite a thrill for everyone.'"

Enzi, Kennedy To Offer Drug Safety Bill. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Mathews, 2.11M) reports that Sen. Mike Enzi, who chairs the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, and Sen. Edward Kennedy, the panel's ranking Democrat, plan to unveil legislation to substantially change how the FDA reviewed medications. According to the Journal, "The two lawmakers' views are particularly important as Congress prepares to consider legislation next year to renew the industry-user fees that fund many of the FDA's operations." The bill "is keyed to that user-fee renewal, and would likely depend on increases in the fees. Details could change before the final version emerges in the next several weeks."

The New York Times (6/21, Harris, 1.19M) reports that the Senators "still refuse to speak about the proposal, representatives for both said." The Times adds, "In broad terms, the bill would require that drug makers disclose the results of all large human tests of their drugs, known as Phase 3 and Phase 4 trials; create a detailed risk management plan to uncover and control any safety problems that arise after a drug is approved; and pay penalties if they fail to follow through with this plan, according to four experts who were briefed on the proposals."

Gingrey Says Seniors Are Happy With Medicare Drug Plan. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) Rep. Phil Gingrey, Co-Chair of the Republican Healthcare Public Affairs Team, writes, "Medicare reports that seniors are saving an average of $1,100 a year with prescription-drug coverage, and recent polls have shown that nearly 80% of seniors are happy with their coverage plan. … Seniors are seeing real savings under Medicare Part D. Unlike the Democrats and shadow organizations content to play politics with our seniors' health, Republicans have worked tirelessly to help seniors sign up and save. I firmly believe that come November, seniors will reward the Republican majority for finally delivering on the long-overdue promise of affordable prescription drug coverage."

Surveys Find Drug Prices Rose Sharply In First Quarter. The New York Times (6/21, Freudenheim, 1.19M) reports that separate studies form two large advocacy groups, the AARP and Families USA, have found that prices for the most widely used prescription drugs increased sharply in the first quarter of this year. AARP "said prices charged by drug makers for brand-name pharmaceuticals jumped 3.9 percent, four times the general inflation rate during the first three months of this year and the largest quarterly price increase in six years." Families USA "found similar inflation rates among brand-name drug prices."

Report Finds Expanded Government Contracting Doesn't Save Money. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Gehlert, 958K) reports that a congressional report released by Rep. Henry A. Waxman found that while "The Bush administration has greatly expanded the use of contracts with private companies to provide public goods and services even as the number of government employees has increased," this "failed to bring promised savings and has been characterized by 'significant waste, fraud, abuse and mismanagement.'" Many of "the types and terms of the contracts have made them ripe for abuse," including cost-plus contracts, no-bid contracts, and monopoly contracts Also, of "particular concern…were contracts related to domestic security, the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina recovery."

Specter Holds Private Lunches With Supreme Court Justices. The Hill (6/21, Bolton) reports that Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter is hosting a series of one-on-one lunches with members of the Supreme Court. Specter told The Hill that he uses the lunches to "hash out 'matters of concern.'" Specter "said he's already lunched with most of the justices. They have discussed the administration of the courts, their confirmation hearings and one of his pet issues: bringing television cameras into the court chamber. He has also grilled them about instances when the court has struck down laws by questioning what it called Congress's 'method of reasoning.' It was a concern Specter raised during the Supreme Court confirmation hearings he presided over months ago."

Ornstein Says Broadcast Decency Act Is "Just Grandstanding." Norman Ornstein writes in Roll Call (6/21) that last week Congress passed, and the President signed, the Broadcast Decency Enforcement Act." The bill "basically was just grandstanding. It's a poor piece of legislation, and one that reflects yet again the lack of any meaningful deliberation in Congress." Ornstein adds, "Here is what I propose: relieve the broadcasters of their onerous public interest obligations. All of them. In return, charge them fees that amount to a paltry 20 cents on the dollar for what they have been doing (or what they say they have been doing). That would be $2 billion per year. Do so for only seven years, and then leave them free and clear. Put the money into an endowment fund that ultimately would total $14 billion (plus interest) for public broadcasting."

NYTimes Blasts Plans To Have Ethics Panel Approve Junkets. The New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) editorializes, "The House ethics committee, ever wondrous in its irresponsibility, is preparing to set itself up as the arbiter of one-stop, conscience-free junket approval for gadabout lawmakers. … The end product would have the ethics committee — long a still-life study in Capitol dysfunction — snap into action to prejudge junketeering requests." The Times adds, "Clearly, lawmakers are gambling that the scandals nipping at their heels will pale by Election Day."

OTHER NEWS:

Housing Starts Rebound. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Conkey, Corkery, 2.11M) reports, "US home builders stepped up the pace of new construction in May after three months of declines, a sign that the housing market is softening but not collapsing." The Commerce Department "said housing starts rose 5% last month from April to an annual rate of 1.96 million units, but were down 3.8% from a year earlier. Building permits, an indicator of future trends in new residential construction, fell 2.1% last month and were running 8.5% lower than a year earlier." The Journal adds, "The faster pace of new-home building in May is confirmation that the housing market is experiencing what Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke recently described as an 'orderly and moderate' correction following last year's peak." That "bodes well for the economy, though analysts anticipate more weakness in the housing market during the rest of the year."

The New York Times (6/21, Peters, 1.19M), however, says "the increase was not a sign of an upward trend, but more likely a rebound after three months of significant declines, economists said. Many economists had predicted less of a bounce." Stuart G. Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial, "said the upturn in May probably 'marks one of the housing market's last hurrahs.'" The Washington Post (6/21, Epstein, 744K) runs a similar report.

Stock Markets Closed Mixed. NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 9, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Dow was up today more than 32 points [to close at 10,974.84]. NASDAQ was down just over 3 [to close at 2,107.06]." USA Today (6/21, 2.31M) says the Standard & Poor's 500 dipped 0.02 points to 1240.12. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Browning, 2.11M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

More Commentary On The Economy. Robert J. Samuelson writes in the Washington Post (6/21, 744K), "If the Federal Reserve raises interest rates at the end of June, as seems probable, it will likely be criticized for making a fetish of inflation and, in the process, risking an American or global recession. There are already signs that the US economy is slowing. Stock markets around the world have declined sharply. Why should the Fed make matters worse by nudging up rates even a tad? This is a sensible-sounding complaint. Based on what we now know, it's also wrong." He adds, "We have an inflation problem that we need to cure before it gets worse."

David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (6/21, A21, 744K), "The financial world has been suffering lately from Post-Greenspan Stress Disorder. The new chairman of the Federal Reserve, Ben Bernanke, has been accident-prone, and some investors have gotten the jitters." They "might be reassured if they paid more attention to the country's second most powerful monetary official, New York Fed President Timothy Geithner." Geithner "watches for the big, scary meltdowns that could threaten the entire financial system. Like his mentor, former Treasury secretary Robert Rubin, he's a worrier -- always looking for the 'systemic risks,' the cascading events that can trigger a panicky rush for the exits.

He's in a constant dialogue with the nation's biggest banks and investment firms about how they manage risk."

Democratic Party Committees Tout Edge In Cash On Hand. The DSCC is reporting a $33.5 million to $18.3 million cash on hand advantage over the NRSC, while the DCCC has a $24.5 million to $21.9 million cash on hand advantage over the NRCC. The AP (6/21) describes Democrats as "optimistic about their election-year prospects," but notes that while "the GOP committees trail in cash on hand, it has the advantage of the presidency and the fundraiser in chief as well as majority control of the House and Senate."

The Hill (6/21, Kaplan) says Congressional Democrats "yesterday trumpeted the sums of money they raised in the second quarter of the year." Roll Call (6/21, Whittington) notes "this is the first time in recent memory that House Democrats have banked more than Republicans." Roll Call notes that "the NRCC's heavy spending on the special election in California's 50th district accounted for the cash-on-hand difference." NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said, "We spent what it took in California 50 and we won. … And we will have a resources advantage come fall."

Emanuel Will Not Serve Second Term As DCCC Chairman. The Hill (6/21, Hearn) reports, "Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) will step down from the House Democrats' campaign operation after the November elections to spend more time with his family, he told The Hill yesterday." He "has been a leading strategist, fundraiser, cheerleader and recruiter for House Democrats as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) since the beginning of last year. His uncommon pairing of cunning efficiency and profanity-laced outbursts has won him both plaudits and opprobrium, but nearly all Democrats concede that he deserves substantial credit for their rosy election prospects this year."

President's Dinner Raised $27 Million For Republicans. CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Crowley) reported, "Some Republicans may not want the President campaigning with them, but all Republicans want him filling up the coffers. … The coffer is $27 million fuller as of last night's President's Dinner, where Bush racked up cash and laid out a campaign blueprint." CNN added, "So far this election cycle he has raised over $150 million, the kind of cash only a President can attract. He gives his party a cumulative edge, $92 million more raised by Republicans than Democrats since the beginning of 2005."

Morris Sees Possibility For Democratic Senate Takeover With Tennessee Win. Political analyst Dick Morris, in his column in The Hill (6/21) , writes that in addition to possible Democratic victories in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Montana Missouri and Rhode Island, a new "Zogby poll indicates that Harold Ford, the Democratic candidate to succeed Majority Leader Bill Frist (R) in Tennessee, is running a surprisingly strong race against his three possible Republican opponents. That could be the sixth seat" Democrats would need to take control of the Senate. The poll shows "Ford tied with former Rep. Ed Bryant, with each winning 42 percent of the vote, and trailing by a small margin, 43-41, against former Rep. Van Hilleary. A third possible candidate, Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, leads Ford by 46-42." Morris sees the possibility of a Democratic takeover as a sign "that President Bush had better shake himself up and address the gas-price and energy issues that he has so far failed to speak out about, except for one mention in his long-ago State of the Union address. It is only by an ongoing relevance to this nation's key problem that Bush can hope to avert the disaster looming on the horizon."

Democrats Seek To Bolster Lieberman Against Primary Challenger. The possibility that Sen. Joe Lieberman may run as an independent candidate for the Senate in Connecticut if he loses the Democratic primary to Ned Lamont is seen as posing a problem for national Democrats. In response, Roll Call (6/21, Stanton, Duran) reports, "Senate Democrats are making a point of rallying around Lieberman, with many lawmakers expected to travel to the Nutmeg State in the coming weeks. His Senate Democratic colleagues already have donated more than $49,000 since 2004 to his re-election campaign." But "Democrats acknowledge that Lieberman…could force his fellow Senators to choose between backing one of their own and abiding by the wishes of the state's Democratic voters. Lieberman's decision to leave the door open to an Independent run has angered many rank-and-file Democratic activists and has added an unwanted wrinkle to Democrats' long-shot efforts to gain control of the Senate in November."

Lieberman Ad Chides Lamont Supporters. Gov. Lowell Weicker recently endorsed Lieberman's challenger

Lamont and the Washington Post (6/21, A6, Goldfarb, 744K) reports, "Lieberman's campaign recently posted a Web ad poking fun at the Weicker-Lamont alliance. 'Remember Lowell Weicker? Well, bears never forget. He's never gotten over losing his Senate race to Joe Lieberman,' says the ad, which features animation of a bear. 'But instead of coming out of hibernation, he's sent his bear cub, instead -- Ned Lamont.'" The Post adds, "Lieberman spokeswoman Marion Steinfels explained the ad as having 'a little fun with the Greenwich billionaires uniting against Senator Lieberman.' Lamont spokesman Liz Dupont-Diehl called the ad 'pathetic.'"

Gore Declines To Endorse Former Running Mate Lieberman. The Washington Post (6/21, A6, Goldfarb, 744K) also notes, "Lieberman has won a string of endorsements from prominent Democrats around the state, including the state party chairman and state Senate majority leader. One endorsement he won't be getting is that of his 2000 running mate, Al Gore. In an interview Sunday with Al Hunt of Bloomberg TV, Gore called Lieberman 'my close friend' but said, 'I typically do not get involved in Democratic primaries.'" But Gore "did endorse former Vermont governor Howard Dean" who opposed the Iraq War "in the 2004 Democratic presidential primaries."

Columnist Accuses Lieberman Of Being Out Of Step With Party On Iraq. Howard Meyerson in his column in the Washington Post (6/21, A21, 744K) says "Lieberman's problem is not that he faces expulsion from a sect but that he has chosen to stand outside what remains a big, messy tent of a party. Moreover, he seems to have reversed the roles that the two parties play when it comes to Iraq."

Obama Urged To Run In 2008 Despite Lack Of Experience. Atlantic Monthly associate editor Ross Douthat in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) writes that with the 2008 presidential field wide open, running for president could "be the smartest thing" Sen. Barack Obama does. While "young and untested" Obama's "his political stock may never be higher than it is right now, when liberal Democrats and centrists alike project their dreams upon him, undimmed by the disappointments and compromises of a long career. For the moment, he's part Clinton, part Roosevelt, part JFK and MLK; but in eight or 12 or 16 years, he might be John Kerry." Losing in the presidential primaries "didn't hurt Al Gore's long-term prospects; it didn't hurt Ronald Reagan's future chances." And "Democratic bigwigs -- Mario Cuomo, Sam Nunn, Bill Bradley -- who declined to take on George H.W. Bush in 1992, preferring to wait for a more propitious moment" did not succeed.

Democratic Activists Launch Effort To Encourage Policy Debates. Democratic activists have launched a number of ventures seeking to encourage debates over serious policy issues. The Washington Post (6/21, A19, Balz, 744K) reports, "Those in the middle of these events share a similar conviction, which is that for too long Republicans have been winning the battle of ideas (and often campaign strategy) in American politics, in part because conservatives invested in what is now a well-funded infrastructure of organizations that have produced ideas, thinkers, publications, strategists, and politicians who now control the White House, Congress and increasingly the federal judiciary." The Post adds, "There is also a belief shared at least by some of the participants that Democrats have ridden for too long on what are the fumes of the New Deal and the Great Society, which sustained Democrats for half a century."

Stem Cell Therapy Repairs Spinal Cord Injuries In Rats. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 10, 2:00, Potter, 8.78M) reported, "It has been a long-sought and elusive goal. This rat was paralyzed in the hind legs by a virus. In a few months, it was able to move again. Researchers injected their rats with stem cells, plus a mix of chemicals to help the cells grow into nerve tissue. In 11 out of 15 tries, it worked." This is "the first in which stem cells actually created new, healthy nerves, known as motor neurons." But the "stem cells came from mouse embryos, which had to be destroyed when they were removed. So, the moral debate over stem cell research continues."

The CBS Evening News (6/20, story 5, 2:05, Kaledin, 7.66M) reported scientists "say they have done something they have never done before. These lab rats were once unable to move their hind legs. Now after treatment using embryonic stem cell, they can. This is the first time, scientists say, these specialized cells have successfully regrown the delicate circuitry between nerves, spinal cord and muscle, allowing movement where there was none before." Only "a tiny number of embryonic stem cells were needed to restore up to 40% of the rats' mobility."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 7, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This is research in rats, but many health officials are calling it a remarkable step in the long road to finding treatments for spinal chord injury and other diseases that cause paralysis. The scientists treated stem cells from mouse embryos with various chemicals so they would form new nerve cells in the spine." There's "a political angle here, and the question is where does this all sit regarding what has been President Bush's position on this issue?" Bazell: "Well, these are experiments in animals, so Bush's position doesn't matter at all, but if these continue to work as well as it have, it could only heat up the argument very much."

Publisher, Bush Appointee Merrill Reportedly Committed Suicide. The Washington Post (6/21, A1, Rich, 744K), in a front-page story, reports Philip Merrill, "the prominent publisher and former diplomat whose body was found floating in the Chesapeake Bay on Monday, suffered from a heart condition and apparently took his own life, his family said last night. Merrill, 72, was found with a shotgun wound to the head and a small anchor tied around one or both ankles, according to a source familiar with the investigation." Merrill "was assistant secretary general to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the early 1990s and president of the Export-Import Bank of the United States from 2002 until last year. He frequently took time away from his business to pursue diplomatic and intelligence assignments for the government. He served six administrations, mostly in the State and Defense departments."

Former Anchor Rather Departs From CBS News. The CBS Evening News (6/20, story 8, 4:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It has been rumored for weeks and today Dan Rather and CBS news made it official. Dan is leaving CBS." CBS (Mason) added Rather "interviewed nearly every major international leader, Saddam Hussein exclusively, twice. For '60 Minutes 2', he broke the story of the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal, but it was also on '60 minutes 2' that Rather became the center of his own scandal." Rather: "It was a mistake." Mason: "Shortly after admitting errors in the report about President Bush's National Guard record, Rather retired as anchor of the 'Evening News.'" But he "could not come to terms with CBS on new assignments. 'It just isn't in me to sit around doing nothing,' he said in a statement today. 'So, I will do the work I love, elsewhere.'"

ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 11, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Dan Rather and CBS News made it official today. After 44 years at the network, the former anchor is leaving. Rather joined CBS in 1962, reported on all the major stories of our time and anchored the Evening News for 24 years."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 11, 0:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Upon the retirement of the iconic Walter Cronkite, Dan took the anchor chair and held it for 24 years. He was forced to resign 15 months ago after what has since been dubbed 'Memogate,' a story about President Bush's National Guard service, for which Rather later apologized."

The Washington Post (6/21, C1, Kurtz, 744K) reports, "CBS officials heaped praise on the longtime anchor, even as they were ushering him out the door yesterday. Rather, for his part, made clear his frustration with the network for refusing to renew his contract or give him an ample workload at 60 Minutes."

The Washington Times (6/21, Harper, 90K) reports, "Recent press reports indicate Mr. Rather may take up a newscasting role with HDNet, a high-definition cable channel currently available in about 3 million homes."

Peter Johnson writes in USA Today (6/21, 2.31M) that 60 Minutes correspondent Steve Kroft "says Rather's CBS career, which came to its official close Tuesday, ended much like those of two other CBS News legends, Edward R. Murrow and Walter Cronkite: CBS wanted to move on and, news icons or not, they had to go." Johnson adds, "Rather's departure from CBS after 44 years — and the way it was handled — was topic No. 1 in news circles Tuesday. Some say Rather was owed a better sendoff; others say he got what he deserved."

Shales Says CBS Treated Rather "Shabbily." Tom Shales writes in the Washington Post (6/21, C1, 744K), "Those who have followed the awkward exit of Rather…often ask a simple question: How could a network for which Rather has done so much and served so loyally treat him so shabbily as the curtain falls?"

Exurbs Are Nation's Fastest Growing Regions. New population estimates from the Census Bureau show that exurbs in the Sun Belt and the Far West are the fastest-growing cities in the US. The New York Times (6/21, Lyman, 1.19M) reports, "The bureau's annual survey of municipalities with at least 100,000 residents shows that from July 1, 2004, to July 1, 2005, four outer suburbs in California, three in Florida, two in Arizona and one in Nevada were the country's most rapidly growing."

Study Finds Big City Schools Have Low Graduation Rates. USA Today (6/21, Toppo, 2.31M) reports on research released yesterday finds that students in some big city schools have a less than 50% chance of graduating from high school with their peers. Fourteen urban school districts "have on-time graduation rates lower than 50%; they include Detroit, Baltimore, New York, Milwaukee, Cleveland, Los Angeles, Miami, Dallas, Denver and Houston. The findings present a bleak picture and are sure to generate controversy as lawmakers and others push to keep U.S. students competitive globally." USA adds, "Among the nation's 50 largest districts, the study finds, three graduate fewer than 40%: Detroit (21.7%), Baltimore (38.5%) and New York City (38.9%)."

Encyclopedia Of Conservatism Published. The New York Times (6/21, Deparle, 1.19M) reports on the release of American Conservatism: An Encyclopedia. According to the Times, the volume, published by ISI Books, a conservative press in Wilmington, Delaware, "omits familiar names like Ann Coulter, Tom DeLay, Grover Norquist, Bill O'Reilly and Karl Rove," but "includes the journals University Bookman, circulation 2,600, and First Things. It gives Willmoore Kendall, a political scientist who died in 1967, three times as much ink as former House Speaker Newt Gingrich."

Lowell Says Link Between Lobbying, Fundraising Must Be Weakened. Abbe D. Lowell, who has represented lawmakers and others in ethics investigations, and who currently represents former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, writes in USA Today (6/21, 2.31M), "Real reform will not occur until the very relationship between lobbyists and public officials is re-examined." Lowell offers several suggestions "to weaken the link between lobbying and fundraising," including: "Require fundraisers to disclose publicly their interest in legislation. Require sponsors of "bundled" contributions (individual contributions arranged together for greater impact) to disclose their roles. Impose further limits on the total amount individuals can give in an election cycle. Provide additional public financing of campaigns. Help candidates pay for access to various media." Lowell concludes that "time has come for the entire process to be under investigation so that a better system can result."

NYTimes Says Emergency Rooms Should Stop Diverting Seriously Ill Patients. The New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) editorializes, "The nation's emergency rooms have been stretched thin for at least a decade or more, but a new analysis suggests that they have reached a breaking point. Their plight underscores how dreadfully unprepared we are to cope with a major disaster like pandemic influenza or mass casualties from a terrorism attack." According to the Institute of Medicine, a unit of the National Academy of Sciences, "Half a million times a year ambulances are diverted from emergency rooms that are full and sent to others farther away. … The most important change would be to stop diverting seriously ill ambulance patients and divert instead the poor patients who clog emergency rooms seeking routine care. That would require extending health coverage to the uninsured and providing more primary care clinics and doctors in poor neighborhoods."

Iran Talks Take Center Stage As Bush Meets With EU Leaders In Vienna. There was no network news coverage of President Bush's trip to Vienna. CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Blitzer) reported, "President Bush is in Vienna, Austria, for a one-day stop at the European Union Summit. He and his EU counterparts face a host of international threats and conflicts, including Iran, Iraq, the war on terror." CNN added, "Bush sits down with European Union leaders here in Vienna to highlight what they can agree on rather than focusing on lingering disagreements. He'll be in Vienna for just one day, but for President Bush, the US/EU Summit is a chance to demonstrate that the US and Europe are on the same page when it comes to Iran's nuclear ambitions." CNN added, "After Vienna, the President will visit Budapest, Hungary, to deliver remarks commemorating the 50th anniversary of the Hungarian revolution, when tens of thousands of Hungarians rose up to demand an end to Soviet rule." Bush's comments there "will be likely be listened to closely by Russian President Vladimir Putin. Putin has expressed his displeasure with recent US comments criticizing Moscow for backsliding on democracy."

The Washington Post (6/21, A15, Abramowitz, 744K) reports, "In meetings here Wednesday, Bush and European Union officials are to confer on issues including trade, energy security and their mutual efforts to persuade Iran to halt activities that could lead to the development of nuclear weapons. Officials have dampened expectations of any major announcements, because Iran has yet to respond to a package of inducements and penalties…aimed at ending its enrichment of uranium. Speaking with reporters aboard Air Force One, Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, said Americans and Europeans were strongly committed to having Iran completely shut down its enrichment program."

Bush Not Expected To Address Controversial Aspects Of War On Terror. The Washington Times/AP (6/21, Jahn), in an article titled, "Iraq Threatens Bush Agenda At EU," reports Bush's meetings are "scheduled to focus on Iran's nuclear ambitions and economic concerns, but the United States' conduct of the war on terrorism will be an unspoken theme. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley has said he doubts Mr. Bush will have much to say about the U.S. prison for terror suspects at U.S. Naval Base, Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, charges of prisoner abuse in Iraq and suspected killings of Iraqi civilians by Marines in Haditha. For millions of Europeans, however, these are the issues that matter -- and their concerns are shared by politicians."

Administration Pressing Donor Countries To Honor Iraq Pledges. The Washington Times (6/21, Dinan, 90K) reports national security adviser Stephen Hadley "said countries have an obligation to fulfill their monetary pledges to help rebuild Iraq, but refused to name the nations that are $10 billion behind their commitments, according to Bush administration calculations.

The Christian Science Monitor (6/21, Grier, 61K) reports, "For nations that in the past have pledged to help Iraq rebuild, the United States has this message: Get out your checkbook. In recent days, administration officials, from President Bush on down, have insisted repeatedly that it is time for others to live up to monetary commitments to Baghdad, most of them made in 2003. … In coming months, non-US donor nations and international institutions should become increasingly important to the reconstruction of Iraq, according to US officials. Money in the main US reconstruction account, the Iraq Relief and Reconstruction Fund, is dwindling." The Monitor notes Bush "has mentioned the issue often in public in recent days. And the administration has sent Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt and State Department counselor Philip Zelikow to visit world capitals and figuratively rattle the tin cup."

Bush's Unpopularity Among European Public Noted. The Washington Post (6/21, A15, Abramowitz, 744K), in an article titled, "Bush's Unpopularity In Europe Hangs Over Summit," reports Bush arrived "at a time when the populace remains generally wary of him despite concerted efforts by political leaders on both sides of the Atlantic to patch up their differences." The Post adds, "if relations at the political level have improved, public opinion has lagged far behind. Bush remains unpopular with the public in many European countries over the war in Iraq and alleged abuse of detainees by U.S. forces at Guantanamo Bay…and other facilities. … Diplomats and experts on Europe say public opinion is a significant drag on Bush's ability to expect much from political leaders here -- for instance, for his renewed effort to secure international assistance for the new Iraqi government."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/21, LaFranchi, 61K) reports Bush will "confront a European public that has such a poor view of America that in some countries, the United States is seen as the biggest threat to global stability today - surpassing Iran. … Indeed, the US image abroad has continued to deteriorate, despite a concerted effort by the Bush administration to turn things around by mending fences with key allies, taking concrete steps to make diplomacy work, and expanding public-diplomacy efforts in the Middle East and other regions."

The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Gerstenzang, Rubin, 958K) reports, "Austrians want their leaders to confront Bush's policies in Iraq, the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and the 'rendition' of suspected terrorists to countries that permit torture. Newspapers and TV talk shows have discussed little else in recent days, with people at both ends of the political spectrum denouncing the treatment of terrorism suspects who have not been charged with crimes.

The Los Angeles Times (6/21, 958K), in an editorial, writes, "President Bush's trip to Europe is being welcomed like an infectious disease. Bush was unpopular in Europe from day one of his presidency, but a charm offensive launched last year — and a more conciliatory approach toward European concerns — was meant to change that, or at least nudge the approval rating up a notch. Instead, recent polls show he is more unpopular than ever across the Atlantic."

The AP (6/21, Hunt) reports Bush "began a quick trip to strengthen ties with European allies unhappy about Iraq. …

On his 15th trip to Europe since taking office, Bush and his wife, Laura, were greeted by Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel. As Bush was driven to his hotel, curious onlookers, most of whom remained motionless and expressionless, gathered along Vienna's streets. One group struggled unsuccessfully to unfurl a 'Go Home' banner from a restaurant balcony in time for it to be seen by occupants of the speeding motorcade."

The Washington Times (6/21, Dinan, 90K) reports, "Anti-Iraq-war protests are scheduled for Mr. Bush's stay in Vienna, but the president will be departing even as the main protest is under way today. … The president has not carved out much time for cultural activities in his two days on the ground in Europe, though he is expected to see the Vienna Boys Choir perform."

US Said To Have Abandoned Hungary During 1956 Uprising. In an op-ed for the Washington Post (6/21, A21, 744K) Johns Hopkins' Charles gati writes, "Bush will be in Budapest tomorrow to visit a good ally -- a member of the coalition of the willing. The first item on his agenda, according to the White House, is to 'celebrate Hungary's historic sacrifices in the name of freedom by commemorating the 50th anniversary of the 1956 Hungarian Revolution.' … The truth is that at a critical juncture in the Cold War, when Hungarians rose against their Soviet oppressors, the United States abandoned them."

Bush Hopes For WTO Breakthrough On Farm Subsidies. AFP (6/21) reports President George W. Bush "hopes European leaders will improve their offer on agricultural trade to help bring about a breakthrough in stalled global trade talks," a White House official said. National security advisor Stephen Hadley told reporters on Air Force One that Bush "sees a deal as possible" this year on the Doha Round of World Trade Organization talks. "We really need to see a response from the Group of 20 countries and from the Europeans that is comparable to this offer," Hadley said, referring to the group of developing nations. "If they can move in this direction, we are going to be in the sight of getting an agreement by the end of the year and I think we will see the president encourage everyone he talks to on this trip not to miss this terrific opportunity to advance trade and advance development and help raise people out of poverty," the spokesman added.

Bush's "Personal" Involvement Said To Show Importance Of Talks. In a Wall Street Journal (6/21, A12, 2.11M) op-ed, professor Bernard Gordon of the University of New Hampshire, says the president's "personal effort to kick-start world trade talks" during his trip to Europe "should end the idea that he was downgrading US trade goals when Rob Portman was transferred from trade chief to budget director." Instead, Gordon says the president "has made clear the US insists on a genuine big deal for world trade—or no deal at all."

Barroso Warns Bush US "Protectionism" Could Inspire Backlash. The Financial Times (6/21, Proissl, Schmid, Dombey) reports José Manuel Barroso, the president of the European Commission, warned, "A rising tide of protectionism could endanger European investment in the US." Barroso said he has talked with President Bush "several times about the risk of introducing new barriers on investment because of worries about globalisation or terrorism." According to the Times, "EU officials believe the failure of Dubai Ports World's attempt to buy US ports this year showed a willingness by Congress to block foreign investment on grounds unrelated to economic criteria."

The AP (6/21, Hunt) reports Bush "planned to press Europe to eliminate agricultural subsidies so that talks for a global free-trade pact can proceed."

US-EU Draft Declaration Addresses Concerns Over Russia's Energy Policies. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, McKinnon, Pulizzi, 2.11M) reports, "A U.S.-European Union draft declaration raises concerns about Russia's energy policy and erosion of political freedoms, just weeks before that country hosts its first meeting of the Group of Eight powers. The draft declaration sets the stage for a tussle over energy policy at the coming G-8 summit, where Russia has made energy security the primary agenda item. The Bush administration believes Russia has been seeking to use its vast energy resources as a political weapon, particularly in Central and Eastern Europe.

Bush, European Leaders Concerned By Chinese Regulatory Regime. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Echikson, 2.11M) reports President Bush and EU leaders "agree on…the need to dissuade China from becoming a third global regulatory power. Businessmen and officials on both sides of the Atlantic said China's desire to set its own regulatory requirements for goods sold there is becoming a big concern, because car makers and other exporters would have to tailor products to meet another set of expensive requirements in order to compete in China's huge market. … So while the U.S. and EU have been slow to harmonize their regulatory regimes, the prospect of China adding another layer of costly rules is fostering greater interest in trans-Atlantic cooperation."

US Activates Missile Defense In Response To North Korea Preparations. North Korea's missile launch preparations were reported on in a full segment by CBS and briefly mentioned by ABC and NBC. The CBS Evening News (6/20, story 3, 2:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Belligerent as always, the North Koreans declared today they have every right to test long-range missiles, weapons that could reach America's West Coast. And they have one on the launching pad and appear to be fueling it." CBS added, "The missile now on the North Korean launch pad is exactly the missile the American system, a network of radar and interceptor rockets, was designed to defend against. It is still experimental, but it has been activated and could fire in the unlikely event it is needed." CBS noted, "Even under test conditions, their record of hitting a target is only 50/50, so several of them would have to be launched to increase the odds."

ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 4, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Two senior military officials have told ABC News the Pentagon has activated its missile defense system, and put it on high alert. That, just in case the missile might head this way."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 4, 0:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Today, North Korea insisted it has every right to conduct missile tests. That led Japan and South Korea to say they would join the US in trying to stop any such thing from happening."

Fox News' Special Report (6/20, Hume) reported, "There is information that the US has activated the ground-based missile defense system from test mode to operational mode. The purpose is a response to the possible missile launch by North Korea." Fox (Angle) added, "The US deployed the system 18 months ago and it is described as having a modest capability. Tests of the system have produced successes and failures. On the diplomatic front American officials worked feverishly to come up with a worldwide response."

US Officials Won't Confirm Missile Defense Activation Reports. The Washington Times (6/21, Gertz, Dinan, 90K) reports White House officials "would not say what the consequences would be if North Korea tested a missile, and officials at the Pentagon and State Department refused to comment on whether the U.S. ground-based interceptor system was up and running, as The Washington Times reported yesterday. 'There are many options, and we are simply not going to tip our hand as to what the possible response should be,' White House spokesman Tony Snow told reporters traveling on Air Force One with the president."

The New York Times (6/21, Cooper, Gordon, 1.19M) reports, "Missile defense proponents said North Korea's missile preparations would strengthen the case for building more robust missile defenses. 'I think the activity by North Korea clearly makes the case that a missile defense is necessary for American security,' said Representative Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who is chairman of the House Armed Service Committee."

Missile Defense Described As "Unproven" And "Rudimentary." The Washington Post (6/21, A15, Ricks, Cho, 744K) reports, "The U.S. military yesterday moved ships into position off the coast of North Korea to detect the launch of any long-range ballistic missiles and prepared its new, unproven missile-interception system to attempt a response if necessary. It was apparently the first time that the U.S. government has readied its rudimentary missile-defense system other than to test it. But officials played down the possibility that the interceptors might be used against a North Korean missile. … Two U.S. Navy ships with sensors that could swiftly detect and track a missile's flight were operating off the North Korean coast yesterday, a Pentagon official said." The post adds, "Pentagon officials said that steps had been taken to ready the U.S. interceptors in much the same way that they would proceed for a test of the system. … But they declined to confirm a Washington Times story yesterday that said the system had recently been activated, and that the Bush administration is considering shooting down the North Korean missile.

USA Today (6/21, Kelley, 2.31M) reports, "the U.S. missile-defense system remains a patchy and unproven shield, government studies and outside experts say. The Pentagon now spends about $8 billion a year toward development of a network of systems designed to destroy enemy missiles, particularly those from Iran and North Korea. One of the most developed parts of that system is the handful of ground-based missile interceptors at Fort Greely in Alaska and Vandenberg Air Force Base in California. … Those interceptors have never been fully tested under real-world conditions, and the past two tests fizzled when the interceptors failed to launch."

South Korea Challenges US Intelligence. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Demick, 958K) reports, "If anything, North Korea's intentions have become less clear because of a growing controversy over the intelligence data. South Korean officials today challenged the U.S. assertion that North Korea had completed the fueling process, making a launch both inevitable and imminent. The National Intelligence Service told the National Assembly today that only 40 fuel canisters were observed around the launch site at the Musudan-ri missile base, and that the number was far too little to fuel what is said to be a 115-foot long, 65-ton multistage missile. In addition, the South Korean government is questioning whether the missile in question is for military use."

USA Today (6/21, Nichols, 2.31M) reports National security adviser Stephen Hadley "said it was difficult to judge whether North Korea had actually completed fueling a missile in preparation for a test. 'They seem to be moving forward toward a launch, but the intelligence is not conclusive at this point,' he said."

North Korea Claims It Is Not Bound By 1999 Moratorium. The New York Times (6/21, Cooper, Gordon, 1.19M) reports the government of North Korea "said Tuesday that it was not bound by its own moratorium on long-range missile tests, as tension over the country's missile intentions continued to mount." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said Monday that the United States would regard a missile launching as an 'abrogation of obligations that North Korea undertook in the moratorium that they signed on to in 1999, that they reiterated in 2002.'" However, Charles Kartman, "the United States special envoy who negotiated it with the North Koreans, said the understanding had been worked out on the assumption that the two countries would conduct further talks on an American proposal to ban the testing, production and export of long-range North Korean missiles. But such negotiations have not been held since 2000." Kartman is quoted as saying, "The Bush administration's disinterest in continuing the missile negotiations would have, of course, canceled out the 1999 moratorium."

The Financial Times (6/21, Pilling, Sevastopulo) reports Ri Pyong Dok, a North Korean foreign ministry official, "told Japanese journalists in Pyongyang that a long-range missile test launch 'is not bound by any statement such as the Pyongyang Declaration', Kyodo news reported."

Preemptive Attack On North Korea Considered "Unlikely." The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Demick, 958K) reports, "The Bush administration has limited options to prevent North Korea from test-firing a multistage missile that could reach U.S. interests in the Pacific. In many ways, a missile deployment could constitute grounds for a preemptive attack, such as an airstrike against North Korea. But that is unlikely to be considered a serious option given the U.S. entanglement in Iraq and objections from China."

Concerns Over Iran And North Korea Reanimate Missile Defense Debate. In an op-ed for the Washington Times (6/21, 90K) Peter Huessy, president of GeoStrategic Analysis, writes, "The twin nuclear and missile threats from Iran and North Korea have transformed the missile defense debate. It is no longer 'should we deploy,' but 'how should we deploy?' Policy-makers face a tough decision: How much to invest in some protection now, vs. future, complimentary technologies that offer enhanced protection?"

The Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) editorializes, "It's possible we'll wake up to the news that Pyongyang has tested the long-range ballistic missile that is fully fueled and which U.S. satellites have monitored for more than a month. If so, we hope we'll also learn that the U.S. responded, as defense officials said late yesterday it might, by testing its newly operational missile defense system and blowing the Korean provocation out of the sky. What better way to discourage would-be nuclear proliferators than to demonstrate that the U.S. is able to destroy their missiles before they hit our allies, or the U.S. homeland. Even a miss would be a useful learning experience all around."

Missile Preparations Seen As Central To Kim's Diplomatic Strategy. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) former Pentagon official Chuck Downs writes, "Even if the Taepodong rocket is never launched, the next few months will see American interests subjected to significant strains. Pyongyang has created an opportunity to break out of the negotiating deadlock that has stymied the regime for years, dissolve the international consensus on how to deal with the regime's illicit smuggling and counterfeiting activities, and change politics in South Korea and the U.S. And perhaps most importantly, if Kim Jong Il plays his cards right, he will prove to his inner circle that he is the genius he claims to be, renewing his hold on power at a time when he was facing his most severe challenges."

The Los Angeles Times (6/21, 958K) editorializes, "Diplomatic condemnations are easy, of course, and North Korea's plans are worthy of them. But if there is anything good to come of Kim's latest adventure, it will be a renewed sense of urgency among the U.S. and its allies to focus on the peninsula."

White House Mulls Ways To Keep Bolton In UN Post. The Washington Post (6/21, A19, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that the White House "is looking for ways to keep controversial U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton in his post well beyond the expiration of his recess appointment at the end of this year. One possibility is to bring his nomination up for vote in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee next month. Bolton supporters on the Hill first want to pass the defense appropriations bill before they leave for the August recess and say they did everything needed for the troops…before they turned to the nomination. Senate Republicans don't want wait until the fall and risk a potential loss right before the midterm elections."

Iranian Regime's Proscription Against Unconventional Weapons Questioned. The Washington Post (6/21, A15, Vick, 744K) reports, "Iranian officials often assert the peaceful intent of their nuclear program by insisting that the religious law that governs their country expressly prohibits weapons of mass destruction. … Yet interviews with a range of clerics and other students of Islamic teachings indicate that while Grand Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini indeed barred Iranian forces from unconventional weapons during the 1980-88 war with Iraq, the religious underpinning for such a ban is regarded as less than absolute, with ample justification available in scriptures for almost any course except first use." According to the Post, "Those arguing for the loopholes include clerics closely identified with the country's most hard-line conservatives, the most ardent defenders of Iran's theocratic system." The Post goes on to report that after "Iraqi forces used chemical weapons on the battlefield" in their war with Iran, and "also launched rocket attacks on Tehran and other metropolitan areas, pressure for Tehran to retaliate was intense." However, Iran never responded by targeting Iraqi cities because the Ayatollah forbade it.

Administration Reaches Compromise With Congress Over India Nuclear Deal. Roll Call (6/21, Rasmussen) reports the Bush administration "has reached a compromise with Congressional leaders on one of the most prickly aspects of the pending U.S.-India nuclear deal, a provision that had rankled key Congressional Republicans and Democrats who worried about its potential to curb Congressional powers. While much of the public debate over the U.S.-India nuclear deal has revolved around nonproliferation and global security issues, the biggest hang-up for many in Congress was the administration's initial insistence that India be treated as a country in compliance with the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978, which it is not." Roll call goes on to report, "The Bush administration has reached a tentative agreement to only ask Congress to expedite the final approval of the bill by taking an up-or-down vote free of amendments. A public announcement of the procedural agreement is expected from the Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nick Burns later this week."

Israeli Missile Kills Three Children In Gaza. The Washington Post (6/21, A16, Wilson, 744K) reports, "An Israeli airstrike in the Gaza Strip on Tuesday killed at least three Palestinian children and wounded 14 people, many of them children as well, according to witnesses and Palestinian health officials. Israeli military officials said the target of the strike, which occurred around 7:30 p.m., was a car carrying gunmen from the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, the armed wing of the Fatah party. … But Palestinian witnesses said the men escaped from the Volkswagen Golf station wagon before the missile struck the car, which was passing through a busy commercial district of Gaza City. The scene turned quickly into an angry rally with demonstrators denouncing the attack and vowing to take revenge on Israel." Hospital officials in Gaza confirmed "three children -- Mohammed Roqa, 5; Samia al-Shariff, 5; and Belal al-Hessi, 15 -- suffered fatal wounds in the attack."

The New York Times (6/21, Fisher, 1.19M) reports, "The airstrike was the third this month to kill civilians, infuriating Palestinians and raising an impassioned debate in Israel about its military response to the firing of homemade rockets from Gaza into Israel. On June 9, eight civilians — seven from one family — were killed on a beach in Gaza during an Israeli bombardment. … The Israeli military later denied that its munitions caused the deaths, a contention disputed by Palestinians and human rights officials. Four days later, another strike in Gaza killed at least two militants and another eight civilians."

Effort To Bring Red Cross/Red Crescent To Israel And Palestine Stalls. The Washington Times (6/21, Stuhldreher, 90K) reports, "Last-minute maneuvers may have jeopardized a deal for Israel and the Palestinian territories to enter the International Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement after decades of ostracism, according to officials at a conference in Geneva. The International Conference of the Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies, at a two-day meeting that began yesterday, had been expected to formally endorse the use of a new religiously neutral emblem facilitating the move. … Adoption of the new symbol, a diamond-shaped 'red crystal,' would end the more than 50-year stalemate. But the deal was thrown into doubt when Pakistan and Tunisia unexpectedly introduced a politically charged amendment to the resolution yesterday." Israel "said the suggested rewording, which effectually condemned Israel's occupation of territories, was unacceptable, according to Agence France-Presse."

Al Aksa Establishes College On Site Of Former Jewish Settlement. The New York Times (6/21, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "A Palestinian college is growing from the rubble of an uprooted Israeli settlement. … On nearly 41 acres surrounding what used to be the largest school in what used to be called the Gush Katif bloc, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, decreed a campus. He granted it to Al Aksa University, affiliated with his Fatah party."

Georgia-Russia Tension Raises Concern Over Potential Armed Conflict. The Washington Times (6/21, Mainville, 90K) reports, "Growing diplomatic tensions, a Russian trade embargo and a massive boost in Georgian arms spending are raising fears of conflict in the volatile Caucasus region along Russia's southern border. Analysts say a meeting last week between Russian President Vladimir Putin and Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili failed to defuse the tension and that Russia's open support for the leaders of Georgia's separatist regions of South Ossetia and Abkhazia is pushing the limits of Georgian patience. The tension is expected to be discussed when Mr. Putin hosts heads of state from the Group of Eight club of wealthy nations in St. Petersburg next month. It also will be discussed in Washington July 5 when Mr. Saakashvili meets with President Bush."

India Rebuffs Some Chinese Firms' Expansion Attempts. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Wonacott, 2.11M) reports that in India, "Just as they have in the U.S. and Europe, some of China's big companies have run smack into security concerns and other delays, say industry executives and lawyers. Protracted government reviews have tripped up Chinese forays in telecommunications and infrastructure -- sectors where India generally welcomes foreign capital and expertise. In part, India's concerns mirror fears in the U.S. and Europe about China's corporate ambitions in the West and Africa, and its growing influence overseas. … But the delays also reflect continuing unease between India and its fast-growing neighbor, as both nations emerge as new economic powers wooing capital and pursuing rapid development."

Security Council Votes To Extend East Timor Mission. The New York Times (6/21, Hoge, 1.19M) reports the U.N. Security Council extended its mission in East Timor "by two months and asked Secretary General Kofi Annan to plan for a 'strengthened presence' of the United Nations there in light of recent violence that killed 30 people. The United States voted for the resolution despite a statement by its ambassador, John R. Bolton, questioning the need for returning peacekeepers."

The Washington Post (6/21, A18, Smith, 744K) reports, "International troops…tightened security across the capital as hundreds of protesters gathered to demand the ouster of Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri, some handing out fliers calling him a terrorist and murderer. … Many East Timorese say Alkatiri's decision to fire 600 disgruntled soldiers in March was to blame for the subsequent clashes and gang warfare that have left at least 30 people dead."

Sudanese President Says UN Troops Will Not Be Allowed In Darfur. USA Today (6/21, 2.31M) reports Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir "said Tuesday that he will never allow United Nations peacekeepers into Darfur. … The U.N. wants to send troops to replace a 7,000-strong African Union force that has been unable to stop the violence."

The New York Times/AFP (6/21) reports Bashir was quoted as saying, "Sudan, which was the first country south of the Sahara to gain independence, cannot now be the first country to be recolonized."

International Community Mulls Deploying Peacekeepers To Somalia. The Christian Science Monitor (6/21, Crilly, 61K) reports, "The rapid rise of Somalia's Islamist militias has prompted a flurry of diplomatic efforts to stabilize the troubled country in the Horn of Africa. Earlier this week, the African Union and Western diplomats decided to send officials to Somalia to assess the possibility of deploying a peacekeeping force to a country ripped apart by 15 years of anarchy. That has the backing of President Abdullahi Yusuf, head of Somalia's virtually impotent transitional government, who flew to Ethiopia Tuesday to demand speedy intervention. Regional powers support intervention out of fear of an Islamic state on their doorsteps, while Western governments are worried the country could become a haven for terrorists."

Liberia's Taylor Arrives In The Netherlands For War Crimes Trial. The New York Times (6/21, Simons, 1.19M) reports the former president of Liberia Charles Taylor "arrived in handcuffs in the Netherlands on Tuesday, and was immediately taken to the jail near The Hague." Taylor "will be tried in the Netherlands by a specially created outpost of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, the United Nations-backed tribunal that has indicted him on charges of crimes against humanity and war crimes."

The Washington Post (6/21, A16, Moore, 744K) reports, "The U.N. Security Council, which approved the move from Freetown to the facilities of the International Criminal Court in The Hague, cited concerns that trying the case in Sierra Leone could destabilize Liberia, Sierra Leone and neighboring countries."

Arrests In Spain And France Disrupt ETA Funding. The New York Times/AP (6/21) reports, "The police in Spain and France arrested 12 people on charges of acting as intermediaries between the armed Basque separatist group ETA and businesses that were forced to pay a 'revolutionary tax,' the Spanish Interior Ministry said."

Latin America Choosing Chinese Or Indian Investment Models. The New York Times' Thomas Friedman (6/21) writes, "I would describe the big question facing Latin Americans this way: Are they going to emulate India or get addicted to China?" China "is almost exclusively focused here on extracting natural resources — timber, iron, soybeans, minerals, gas, fish meal — to feed its voracious appetite and keep jobs and factories humming in China. … But countries that get addicted to selling their natural resources rarely develop their human resources and the educational institutions and innovative companies that go with that." On the other hand, according to Friedman, the "India example…focuses on developing human resources."

WSJournal Decries Mexico's Telecom Monopoly. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/21, 2.11M) says Mexico's telecom monopolist, Carlos Slim's fortune "has come partly at the expense of Mexico's poor and middle class, who have had to suffer more than a decade of monopoly pricing for telecom services under his ownership of Mexico's Telmex. His anti-competitive political machinations are among the biggest obstacles to making Mexico a faster growing and more globally competitive economy." The Journal adds, "There is little debate among development economists about the importance of competition to moving people out of poverty. … But with special interests blocking market reform in most poor countries, introducing economic competition is an uphill climb."

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Seeks Dismissal Of Surveillance Suit. The Bay City News (6/21) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has told a federal judge in San Francisco that allowing a surveillance lawsuit against AT&T Corp. to proceed 'would cause grave harm to the nation's security.'" The BCN continues, "U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker is scheduled to hear arguments on Friday on the government's motion for dismissal of a lawsuit filed against AT&T by the San Francisco-based Electronic Frontier Foundation on behalf of four Californians. … The government contends the case must be dismissed because there is no way it could be litigated without revealing state secrets vital to national security." The BCN adds, "In a brief filed with the judge last week, Justice Department lawyers wrote that 'the very subject matter of the case is a state secret.' … The lawsuit alleges that AT&T has violated communications privacy laws and the plaintiffs' constitutional rights by allegedly giving the National Security Agency records of millions of Americans' telephone and Internet communications. … But the government argues in its brief, 'Plaintiffs cannot establish whether or not such cooperation exists because that factual question is itself a state secret.'"

Cheney's Role In Launching War On Terror Analyzed. Frontline (6/20) last night examined the Administration's response to the September 11th, 2001 attacks in a segment called, "The Dark Side," a reference to comments made shortly after 9/11 by Vice President Cheney. The focus of the documentary is on the Vice President's supposed role as the architect of the US war on terrorism. Cheney, bolstered by his close alliance with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, is portrayed as using the formal and informal levers of power in Washington to marginalize the Central Intelligence Agency and State Department in order to imprint his preferences on the Administration's policy choices.

A key element of the Cheney strategy, according to the Frontline documentary, was his use intelligence analysis process: in fighting the war, the US was to "spend time in the shadows," will "work to the dark side, if you will," in Cheney's words. The tenor of the piece was markedly skeptical of the credibility of Administration officials such as Cheney, Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and others, and cited prominent critics of the Administration such as former CIA official Michael Scheuer and State Department official Lawrence Wilkerson. Some defenders of the Administration's approach, such as Defense Department official F. Michael Maloof, were also quoted for balance.

Frontline portrays Cheney as successfully swaying President Bush, who developed a close relationship with CIA Director George Tenet, from backing CIA priorities in the pursuit of terrorists in Afghanistan in late 2001 to turning to the confrontation with Saddam Hussein that led to the war with Iraq in 2003. Cheney accomplished this by first seeking to establish a link between Saddam and al Qaeda and later focusing on intelligence on Iraq's supposed weapons of mass destruction.

In one instance, Frontline notes that after the successful prosecution of the Afghan campaign in 2001, Vice President Cheney "wanted information that linked Osama bin Laden and Saddam Hussein." Author James Bamford: "But they weren't getting that information from the CIA. And so, he put pressure, I think, on Rumsfeld and on the Pentagon to come up with their own estimates." Frontline added, "Inside the Pentagon bureaucracy, Rumsfeld could easily and quietly grow a nearly invisible operation." Melvin Goodman, former CIA officer: "They needed an office that would produce the intelligence that the CIA wouldn't produce. Rumsfeld said, 'I can solve your problem,' and he put Douglas Feith on that issue."

Frontline added, "They needed people with experience in the world of intelligence, but they hired politically connected policy analysts." F. Michael Maloof, former Defense Department intelligence official: "I got a phone call. The next thing I know, I'm being detailed on over to Doug Feith's office, and that I would be joined by Dave Wurmser, who today works in the office of the Vice President." Frontline: "The information was rarely vetted. Instead, it moved up the chain of command to the office of the Vice President." Lawrence Wilkerson, former chief of staff to Secretary of State Colin Powell: "And this became material that was then used, sort of in white paper-like fashion, to be leaked to journalists or to create links between Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda."

In a second instance, after the CIA was directed to hurriedly provide a National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq's weapons of mass destruction systems, Frontline says, "Many members of the CIA believed the Vice President himself was determined to control the content of the NIE. The Vice President and his chief of staff, Scooter Libby, had made about ten trips to CIA headquarters, where they personally questioned analysts."

Current, Former Officials Question Some Accounts In Suskind Book. CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Snow) reported that Ron Suskind's book "The One Percent Doctrine" details "pivotal moments inside the White House and among top government officials in the days leading up to the 9/11 attacks and the years that followed. Some of the book's accounts are being questioned by current and former counterterrorism officials." CNN added, "A number of officials say some of the information is accurate, such as a 2003 plot believed to be linked to al Qaeda to disperse cyanide in New York City's subway system. While officials in New York don't comment on intelligence information specifics, the book claims that a computer hard drive of New York City buildings and landmarks was discovered that contained what was described as a very professional casing effort of the city."

Suskind Calls Cheney "One Percent Chance" Statement "Eye-Popping." Author Ron Suskind was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/20) what "the most eye-popping piece of information" he learned in the course of your researching his book "The One Percent Doctrine." Suskind said, "The broadest part, the thing that covers the most, is this one percent doctrine. It explains everything. That's why it's the title of the book." Suskind explained that two months after 9/11, Vice President Dick Cheney was "being given harrowing intelligence. … Cheney says something fascinating. He says for these low probability high impact type of events, we need to think about them in a different way. Then as the briefing goes on, he stops the proceedings and says, 'Here it is. If there's even a one percent chance that WMDs have been given to terrorists, we need to treat it as a certainty. Not in our analysis but in our response.'"

Suskind Says Cheney Creates Platform For Bush To Be Effective. Author Ron Suskind said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/20), "Bush is one of the least experienced presidents to come into office. Cheney, the most experienced vice president. They had to work out how they're going to work together." After 9/11, Cheney "really is embracing the broad, sweeping doctrinaire thinking. What are the big strategies? He essentially creates an architecture, a platform, where Bush can be Bush, a man of action and still be effective as president. That's the relationship. Cheney essentially sets the framework, Bush acts within it."

Suskind Says Al Jazeera's Kabul Office Was Bombed On Purpose. Author Ron Suskind said on CNN's The Situation Room (6/20) that the bombing of al Jazeera's office in Kabul "was done on purpose, precisely to send a message to Al Jazeera, and essentially a message was sent." Suskind added, "There was great anger at Al Jazeera at this point. We were pulling our hair out. We thought they were a mouthpiece for bin Laden. And we acted."

Dowd Says Administration Rejected Need For Evidence In War On Terror. Maureen Dowd writes in The New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) that Adam Smith and Edmund Burke "would blanch at the shape W. and Karl Rove have given conservatism — the political muscle of the Christian right, the withering of the social contract, greedy capitalism, fiscal profligacy." Ron Suskind reports in his new book, The One Percent Doctrine, that Vice President Dick Cheney "dictated that the war on terror allowed the administration to summarily reject the need for evidence and analysis before action. Mr. Suskind describes the Cheney doctrine: 'Even if there's just a 1 percent chance of the unimaginable coming due, act as if it is a certainty. It's not about "our analysis," as Cheney said. It's about "our response." ... Justified or not, fact-based or not, "our response" is what matters. As to "evidence," the bar was set "so low that the word itself almost didn't apply."

Grassley Aleges FBI, Mueller Tried To Cover Up "Botched" Terrorism Probe. The Washington Times (6/21, Seper, 90K) reports that in a letter to Director Robert Mueller, Sen. Charles Grassley alleges that "the FBI sought to cover up a 'botched' investigation into a terrorist financing scheme by classifying a probe into the case as secret and misleading Congress about how the inquiry was handled." Grassley "said the FBI blocked the full release of an investigative report he sought last year from the Department of Homeland Security and the Justice Department of what he called a 'turf fight' between the FBI and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement" in a Houston terrorism probe. Grassley "also targeted Mr. Mueller, saying that during a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing in May, the director painted 'a distorted picture' of findings in the report from the inspectors general at Homeland Security and Justice, reading 'selectively' from unclassified portions."

Canadian Terror Probe Expands To Britain. The CBS Evening News (6/20, story 4, 2:35, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The investigation of that terror plot in Canada that charged 17 with plotting to behead the prime minister and bomb government buildings has now spread to Britain. Scotland Yard is now holding six young men and today in Canada, bail hearings were underway for the original suspects."

Al Qaeda Says Saudi Killed In 2004 Was To Have Been 20th Hijacker. The New York Times/AP (6/21) reports, "Al Qaeda has identified a would-be 20th hijacker for the Sept. 11 attacks as a Saudi who was killed in a 2004 shootout with his country's security forces. In a statement accompanying a new video, whose authenticity has not been verified, Al Qaeda's propaganda arm asserts that the Saudi, Fawaz al-Nashimi, also known as Turki bin Fuheid al-Muteiry, would have rounded out a team that ultimately took over United Airlines Flight 93, which crashed in Pennsylvania before reaching its target." The Washington Post (6/21, Shrader, 744K) also reports the story.

Arkansas Man Acquitted Of Terror Charges, Convicted Of Immigration Violations. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (6/21) reports former University of Arkansas graduate student Arwah Jaber "has been acquitted of attempting to provide material support to a Palestinian terrorist organization but convicted of immigration charges. … The government moved to revoke his citizenship after the jury returned its verdicts Monday." The AP notes, "Jaber was born on the West Bank and became a U.S. citizen in 1994." He "said he now expects to leave the country with his wife,

DOJ_NMG_0036197

Dawn, and find a teaching position in the Middle East. 'I am not a terrorist. (The jury) knew it,' Jaber said after Monday's verdict." The Springdale (AR) Daily News (6/21, Mehaffey) adds, "Jaber still could face jail time on the charges of making false statements to obtain a passport and unlawful procurement of naturalization and credit card fraud. He will be sentenced within 90 days after a presentencing investigation is completed. The defense is still considering whether it has grounds for an appeal." The New York Times (6/21, Barnes, 1.19M) also briefly reports the verdict.

Judge Orders Prosecutors To Provide Padilla Defense With Detailed Evidence. The AP (6/21, Anderson) reports, "A federal judge ordered prosecutors Tuesday to turn over more detailed evidence to back up allegations that Jose Padilla and two co-defendants conspired to kill, injure or kidnap people overseas as part of a global Islamic terrorist network. U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke said she agreed with many of the claims made by defense attorneys that the federal indictment against Padilla and the others is 'very light on facts' that would link the defendants to specific acts of terrorism or victims. … Cooke ordered the government to flesh out its charges by providing defense lawyers with names of unindicted co-conspirators, broad descriptions of intended victims of alleged acts of violence and specifics about false statements Hassoun allegedly made about the meaning of phone calls intercepted by the government."

Judge Hears Arguments On Defense Motion To Suppress Evidence From FBI Search. The AP (6/21, Anderson) also reports US Magistrate Judge Stephen Brown yesterday heard arguments from codefendant Adham Amin Hassoun's "lawyers seeking to suppress evidence seized by the FBI from his Broward County home, saying the FBI 'frightened and intimidated' his wife before seizing a handgun and other key evidence such as documents in Arabic and videotapes." But FBI Special Agent Gregory McDermott "testified Hassoun's wife freely consented in writing to the search of the home…after he was arrested on an immigration violation on June 12, 2002." McDermott said, "She didn't have a problem with that. It was very professional and friendly."

"LA 8" Figure Testifies At Deportation Hearing. The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Spano, 958K) reports, "A man at the center of a long-running immigration legal fight that came to be known as the 'L.A. 8' case returned to court Tuesday to renew his two-decade-long quest for citizenship." Aiad Barakat "fielded a barrage of questions in a bid to avoid deportation. Almost 20 years ago, federal officials sought to deport Barakat and seven others because of their association with causes promoting Palestinian statehood, such as the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. The eight were never accused of an act of terrorism or of any other crime." The Times notes, "The only question in court Tuesday was whether Barakat should be denied citizenship for allegedly lying about his association with Palestinian advocate Ali Kased when he sought U.S. citizenship. The government plans to introduce an FBI surveillance videotape of a meeting Barakat attended with Kased…in 1985 outside of Los Angeles."

WPost Urges Administration To Design New System To Try Terror Suspects. The Washington Post (6/21, A20, 744K) editorializes, "In the next few days the Supreme Court is expected to pass judgment on the administration's effort to establish military commissions -- a long-dormant trial system the executive branch seeks to revive in order to try al-Qaeda terrorists." But "even if the court lets the commissions stand, the administration should go back to the drawing board, to create a fairer system for trying alleged war criminals in which this country can have confidence." The Post adds, "The conflict with Islamic extremists will not be over soon. The nation needs now, and will continue to need, a means to try some of the most fateful criminals of all time according to fair rules that bear the stamp of democratic approval: legislative enactment. Only the administration's rigidly ideological approach to this problem prevents its timely resolution."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Police Skirt Privacy Laws Through Use Of Data Brokers. The AP (6/21, Bridis, Solomon) reports, "Federal and local police across the country have been gathering Americans' phone records from private data brokers without subpoenas or warrants." The AP continues, "These brokers, many of whom market aggressively on the Internet, have broken into customer accounts online, tricked phone companies into revealing information and sometimes acknowledged that their practices violate laws, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press." The AP adds, "Legal experts and privacy advocates said police reliance on private vendors who commit such acts raises civil liberties questions. … Those using data brokers include agencies of the Homeland Security and Justice departments – including the FBI and U.S. Marshals Service – and municipal police departments in California, Florida, Georgia and Utah. Experts believe hundreds of other departments frequently use such services. … 'We are requesting any and all information you have regarding the above cell phone account and the account holder ... including account activity and the account holder's address,' Ana Bueno, a police investigator in Redwood City, Calif., wrote in October to PDJ Investigations of Granbury, southwest of Fort Worth. … An agent in Denver for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Anna Wells, sent a similar request on March 31 on Homeland Security stationery: 'I am looking for all available subscriber information for the following phone number,' Ms. Wells wrote to a corporate alias used by PDJ. … Congressional investigators estimated the U.S. government spent $30 million last year buying personal data from private brokers. But that number probably understates the breadth of transactions, since brokers said they rarely charge law enforcement agencies."

Congress Looking Into Data Sellers' Methods. USA Today (6/21, Eisler, 2.31M) reports that Congress today will begin hearings on "the techniques used by private data-collection companies to obtain phone records and other information. Law enforcement agencies often go to such companies for information. They do so to save time and avoid seeking subpoenas or warrants for the information, even though the data brokers do not always obtain their information legitimately, according to an investigation by the House Energy and Commerce investigations subcommittee." A panel subcommittee, chaired by Rep. Ed Whitfield, "will hold a series of hearings on the matter."

TSA Delays Registered Traveler Program. The AP (6/20) reported the Transportation Security Administration has delayed the Registered Traveler program "as the government and private businesses grapple with ways to ensure retention of tough security standards." The program, which "would have allowed certain airline passengers to quickly go through a separate airport security lane if they paid a fee, passed a government background check and submitted fingerprints," was scheduled "to be rolled out gradually starting Tuesday." TSA spokeswoman Yolanda Clark said "the agency was still working with private firms running the program to make certain that it 'does not decrease security in any way'" or "hold up travelers who aren't enrolled."

HHS Places Order For Anthrax Drug. The New York Times (6/21, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "The Department of Health and Human Services has placed a $165 million order for 20,000 doses of a new anthrax drug that it hopes to put in a biodefense stockpile starting in 2009." The drug, Abthrax, "neutralizes the deadly toxin that anthrax bacteria produce."

New Plan For 9/11 Memorial Proposed. The Wall Street Journal (6/21, Frangos, 2.11M) reports, "A simpler plan for the World Trade Center memorial will include several cost-saving design changes, while aiming to preserve the overall look and feel of the project." In a report commissioned by New York Gov. George Pataki and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg, "real-estate developer Frank Sciame suggested modifications that would bring the cost of the memorial and an adjacent museum to $510 million, plus another $150 million for underground infrastructure." New York State "would spend an additional $80 million on a visitors center. A cost estimate in May showed the project, minus the visitors center, approaching $1 billion." USA Today (6/21, Moore, 2.31M) says the plan is "part of a redesign to cut the project's cost to $500 million from nearly $1 billion." The Washington Post (6/21, Kugler, 744K) also reports the story.

House Approves Bill To Increase Penalties For Disaster Fraud. The AP (6/20, Abrams) reported in the wake of a GAO report that found FEMA "was defrauded of up to $1.4 billion as it rushed to provide relief after last year's hurricanes Katrina and Rita," the House approved legislation Tuesday that would impose "sentences of up to 30 years for fraud related to disaster relief. … The legislation, which now goes to the Senate, imposes a fine of up to $1 million and prison terms of up to 30 years for wire, radio, television or mail fraud in connection with a presidentially declared major disaster or emergency."

CQ (6/20, Schuler, Stern) reported, "The legislation targets public officials involved in bribery or extortion, as well as anyone who makes a 'materially false, fictitious or fraudulent statement or representation' to obtain benefits, property or services after a disaster or declared emergency."

National Guard Returns To New Orleans To Help Combat Crime Wave. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 7, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Nine months after Hurricane Katrina, the National Guard rolled back into New Orleans. This time, the problem, not floods, but crime." ABC (Osunsami) added, "Already this year, 53 people have been murdered in New Orleans. This morning, just a few hours before the troops arrived…residents woke up to murder number 54." Mayor Ray Nagin "asked the Governor for the troops after five teenagers were murdered over the weekend at this intersection. Three other teenagers were killed at this same intersection in April."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 6, 2;15, Williams, 9.87M) reported Operation Crescent Guard "will send the soldiers into large areas of the city like Lakeview, New Orleans East, and the Lower Ninth Ward, where there is still plenty of damage but not many people." Officials "insist it's not that crime is so bad, it's that the New Orleans police force remains weakened by Katrina."

The AP (6/21, Burdeau) reports "troops, dressed in full camouflage fatigues, carried M-16s, handguns and belt clips of ammunition as they arrived in a convoy of 75 vehicles. They parked their Humvees and tanker trucks in formation in front of the Convention Center, drawing waves and thumbs-up from onlookers." The AP adds, "Many of the soldiers that arrived Tuesday were sent to New Orleans during Katrina, but they had not seen the city since those desperate days."

Post-Katrina New Orleans Sees Spike In Suicides. The New York Times (6/21, Saulny, 1.19M) reports, "New Orleans is experiencing what appears to be a near epidemic of depression and post-traumatic stress disorders," as well as "a suicide rate that state and local officials describe as close to triple what it was before Hurricane Katrina struck and the levees broke 10 months ago. Compounding the challenge, the local mental health system has suffered a near total collapse, heaping a great deal of the work to be done with emotionally disturbed residents onto the Police Department."

NYTimes Criticizes New Orleans' Lack Of Progress On Rebuilding Plan. The New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) editorializes that 10 months after Katrina, "there is still no redevelopment plan for New Orleans." With billions of dollars from the federal government headed to the city, "There are no more excuses for local officials, no more pointing toward Washington. It is time for southeastern Louisiana to rebuild itself." The fact "that it will be six months before a 'master planning document,'" as the Times reported Sunday, "is totally unacceptable." Meanwhile, the decision to send National Guard troops to help city police deal with an upsurge in violence "does not bolster our confidence that the city will be able to govern itself." The Times says Mayor Ray Nagin needs "to speak difficult truths" about where to rebuild. Residents "deserve answers. They have waited long enough."

WAR NEWS:

Senate Democrats To Offer Competing Troop-Withdrawal Plans. Knight Ridder (6/21, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Democrats, searching for a unified stance on Iraq, will kick off a Senate debate Wednesday over competing troop-withdrawal proposals that reflect mixed public opinions about the war." One proposal, offered by Democratic Sens. John Kerry and Russ Feingold, "would set a hard pullout deadline of July 2007. A more broadly backed bill, proposed by Democratic Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island, calls for troops to begin moving out of Iraq this year, but sets no timetable for final withdrawal." Knight Ridder adds, "Though the measures were designed to distinguish Democrats from Republicans on the dominant issue of the day as November's congressional elections near, they also exposed Democratic divisions on the war. Some top Republicans dismissed both proposals as 'cut and run' policies and evidence of Democratic incoherence on Iraq."

USA Today (6/21, 2.31M) quotes Kerry saying, ""We cannot retreat. We cannot surrender. We cannot go wobbly." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (6/21, Bellantoni, 90K) reports that last night, in a speech at the Hyatt Regency Washington to Republican volunteers, "Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said, 'Republicans unite on the need to stay on the offense to confront terrorists; Democrats are having a debate in their party.'" He "characterized the Democratic debate as some 'say we need to cut and run; some people say we need to walk ... and other people say we need to jog.'" On CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Blitzer), Mehlman said that if the US set a specific timetable for withdrawal as Democrats suggest "the enemy would see it as surrender and it would make America less safe. … The reason we are attacked is because for a generation we did what Jack Murtha suggested which is when they hit us, we backed down as opposed to the way we win this war on terror, which is the way we won World War II, the way we won the Cold War is the offense not the defense."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported Democrats "vigorously deny the charge, noting that most Senate Democrats oppose a firm deadline for withdrawing the troops. Cut and run, they say, is nothing more than a Republican campaign slogan." Sen. Harry Reid, Minority Leader: "Two things that don't exist in Iraq and have not -- weapons of mass destruction and cutting and running." Reid: "But in fact, some leading Democrats are badly split on when to bring the troops home. Senator John Kerry, for example, was cheered by liberal activists recently when he called for a timetable." But Senator Hillary Clinton "was heckled by the same group because she opposes a deadline."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Bash) reported that "behind closed doors, we understand, there were some impassioned pitches made by Sens. John Kerry and Russ Feingold on the one hand. They say they really think it's imperative, both from a policy point of view and a political point of view, to draw a hard line between Democrats and the Bush White House by saying there should be date certain for troops to come out of Iraq. Now, on the other hand in that lunch, we know that Senator Carl Levin and Jack Reed also made their pitch to say that's simply the wrong way to go, that that is not necessarily responsible and that it's better to take a more cautious approach, say that we should perhaps begin to be withdrawn this year." Minority Leader Harry Reid tried "to put best face on this, essentially saying that Democrats are united on one thing and that is, they don't think the Bush approach is right."

The Washington Post (6/21, A4, Babington, 744K) runs a similar report titled "Democrats Divided On Withdrawal Of Troops," and says Senate Republicans are "happy to clear the way for Democrats to showcase their divisions. Senators predicted that few, if any, Republicans will embrace the Democrats' proposals, mirroring the nearly unanimous support House Republicans displayed last week for Bush's policies."

Republicans Said To Be Hoping To Use Iraq War Debate For Political Purposes. NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported Republicans "are apparently hoping to use the debate" in the US Senate "as a chance to score political points that will help them in November." NBC (Reid) added, "In the past week, Republicans, led by chief White House strategist Karl Rove, have taken the offensive, accusing Democrats of advocating a strategy of cut and run." Emboldened by "the killing of al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and a slight up tick in the President's approval rating, congressional Republicans have relentlessly repeated the charge."

Democrats Say Kerry Jeopardizing His Party's Prospects In 2006. The New York Times (6/21, Zernike, 1.19M) reports, "When Senator John Kerry was their presidential nominee in 2004, Democrats fervently wished he would express himself firmly about the Iraq war." Kerry "has found his resolve. But it has not made his fellow Democrats any happier. They fear the latest evolution of Mr. Kerry's views on Iraq may now complicate their hopes of taking back a majority in Congress in 2006." The Times adds "interviews" with Democrats "suggest a frustration with Mr. Kerry, never popular among the caucus, and still unpopular among many Democrats for failing to defeat a president they considered vulnerable. Privately, some of his Democratic peers complain that he is too focused on the next presidential campaign."

The AP (6/21, Sidoti) reports Feingold "was the first Democratic senator to call for a withdrawal timetable, but his position has been overshadowed by Kerry, who has a stronger national profile because of his status as the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee." Both "are posturing for possible presidential runs in 2008, and their positions on Iraq play well with the liberal wing of the party -- the Democratic faithful who will vote for the next Democratic presidential nominee."

McCain Says Situation In Iraq Marginally Better. On the CBS Evening News (6/20, story 2, 1:20, Schieffer, 7.66M), Sen. John McCain said the situation in Iraq is "I think marginally better. I think we are progressing. It's long and it's hard and it's difficult and it's two steps forward and one step back. But the consequences of failure, I believe, are enormous."

Durbin Calls For "Reasonable Timetable" For Withdrawal. Sen. Dick Durbin said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/20) that Democrats "understand that the current strategy is not working well. There's no end in sight. As of today, this morning, we've lost 2,502 of our best and bravest soldiers, we've spent over $300 billion. We've been in this war for over three years, and there is no plan to bring it to an end." Durbin added, "I think we should have a reasonable timetable. There should be some considerations there, if circumstances arise, that would make a difference. But by and large, I think the Iraqis have to understand, now that they've trained 264,000 soldiers with our help, at our expense, that they have to stand and defend their own country."

Hutchison Says Setting A Timetable Sends Wrong Message. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison said on MSNBC's Hardball (6/20), "All of us look forward to the time that our troops can come home. There's no question about that. But if we set a timetable, we are saying to every ally we have ever had, we'll be with you until times get tough. And worse, we are saying to the enemies, if you just make it hard for America, pretty soon our attention will flag and we will cut and run. That couldn't be a worse message from the United States of America."

Sessions Says Senate Will Reject Proposed Timetables For Troop Withdrawal. Sen. Jeff Sessions was asked on Fox News' Your World with Neil Cavuto (6/20) about the upcoming Senate vote on a Democratic proposal to set a timetable to getting our troops out of Iraq. Sessions said, "It's a resolution that I don't think has any good in it, and only mischief. We only voted a few days ago, 93-6 to reject a timetable as of the end of this year. And I think we'll reject this proposal."

Harman Calls For "Regime Change" At Pentagon. Democratic Rep. Jane Harman, appearing on CNN's Larry King Live (6/20, 9:42 p.m.), said, "We need to resolve now to change our strategy in Iraq. I would call it 'cut and win.' I think we should be redeploying troops now on a schedule set by the generals, focusing on achievable political objectives. And I should add one more thing: It's time to have regime change at the Defense Department. A new secretary of defense will help change our strategy."

US Embassy Memo Outlines Iraqi Employees' Security Fears. A memo by a junior US employee of the US Embassy in Iraq outlines the security risks faced by the Embassy's Iraqi employees. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 3, 1:45, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "The memo is called 'Snapshots from the Office.' And it's based on the reports from Iraqi employee of the US Embassy, written by a junior US Employee of the Embassy. Today, the snapshots add up to one very grim portrayal of life in Baghdad. The Iraqis say terror and violence have become a part of everyday life. The brother of one employee kidnapped. Another claims to attend a funeral every day. They fear informants, who the memo says have become more entrenched, as Iraqi security forces fail to gain public confidence." There are "also serious complaints about quality of life, chronic power outages and long gas lines."

In an editorial today, the New York Times (6/21, 1.19M) says the cable painted "a far grimmer picture of the mounting difficulties faced by its Iraqi employees," and "told of embassy employees running a daily gantlet of religious dress-code enforcers and harassment by militia-style security guards — even at checkpoints surrounding the fortified Green Zone, where the embassy is located. When the Iraqi employees return to their homes, they face sweltering neighborhoods without regular electric power, daylong gasoline lines, and families torn by religious and ethnic tensions and mounting fears for the future." The report "is only a raw snapshot of the daily experiences of embassy employees, not a systematic nationwide survey. Yet embassy employees are in many ways better off than most Iraqis. At least they have jobs and someone to turn to for help. … Now that he's home, Mr. Bush needs to take a hard, unfiltered look at the more disturbing picture relayed by America's embassy."

US To Keep Presence In Iraq At Current Levels Into Next Year. The New York Times (6/21, Shanker, 1.19M) reports, "The Pentagon announced Tuesday that it planned to send 21,000 troops to Iraq in the next rotation of forces. That would keep the American presence at current levels into next year, unless the security situation improved." The Times adds, "Senior military officials said that the announcement of units to be deployed between August and January could change, depending on conditions in Iraq, and that so-called off ramps for the troops bound for Iraq were still under discussion." Bryan G. Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said after the announcement, "One should not read into this a decision" about "long-term troop levels in Iraq." But "at a minimum, the announcement represents a decision that for planning purposes at least, American troops in Iraq would be replaced on a one-for-one basis for now."

US Distances Itself From Iraqi Official's Comments. The Financial Times (6/21, Sevastopulo, Dinmore) reports, "The Bush administration on Tuesday sought to distance itself from remarks by the Iraqi national security adviser that he envisaged a significant reduction in US troops in the country this year with most leaving next year." Writing in the Washington Post on Tuesday, Mowaffak al-Rubbaie, the Iraqi national security adviser, "said that while there was no 'defined timetable for coalition troops to leave Iraq, there was an 'unofficial roadmap' for troop reductions based on 'the achievement of set objectives for restoring security in Iraq.'"

Australia May Eye Troop Drawdown This Year. The AP (6/21, Foley) notes Canberra "will review its troop deployment to Iraq by the end of this year, the defense ministry said Wednesday, the first time the government has hinted at a possible timeline for eventual withdrawal." Defense Minister Brendan Nelson "said Australia would evaluate the success of the Iraqi forces in protecting Muthana province before reassessing its military presence in Iraq. … 'If we can see that the provincial Iraqi government in al-Muthana can successfully manage its own affairs and its own security then I would expect that by the end of this year we would be starting to think about our future deployment.'"

The New York Times (6/21, Onishi, 1.19M), meanwhile, runs a story reporting "Japan announced Tuesday that it would start pulling its ground troops out of Iraq, putting an end to the country's most significant military mission since the end of World War II."

Bodies Of Kidnapped US Soldiers Found. The bodies of PFC Kristian Menchaca and PFC Thomas Tucker, the members of the 101st Airborne captured by Iraqi insurgents, were found three miles from the location where they were abducted. The US military says the two were tortured and brutally slain. The story was the lead on each of the networks, and ABC and NBC ran follow-up stories on the reaction to the soldiers' deaths. ABC World News Tonight (6/20, lead story, 2:35, Marquez, 8.78M) reported, "US troops found the men last night after a tip from a local resident. But they were not able to recover their bodies until this morning. Troops first had to maneuver their way through explosives that had been planted around the bodies." In an "Internet posting, an insurgent group claimed that the new leader of al Qaeda in Iraq had 'beheaded the two captive crusaders.' Sources say that one of the soldiers was, in fact, beheaded and both were mutilated and burned."

In a separate story, ABC World News Tonight (6/20, story 2, 2:20, Reynolds, 8.78M) reported, "The reports of kidnapping and possibly torture at the hands of their captors have added fuel to the domestic debate about the war."

The CBS Evening News (6/20, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "It was like a story from the Middle Ages in the age of the Internet. 'We have slaughtered the crusaders,' read the message on a terrorist Website and the bodies of those American soldiers who had been kidnapped by al Qaeda were found. They had been tortured, and they were meant to be found. They had been laid out as lures in a booby trap." CBS (Cowan) added, "The same umbrella terror group that claimed al Qaeda had captured the men yesterday today posted another note on an obscure website, boasting the men were slaughtered by no other than Abu Hamza al-Muhajir himself, the man the US believes is the successor to terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, lead story, 3:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight there is a real fear that just days after the US was able to find and kill Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who as the head al Qaeda in Iraq became the very face of evil in this war, there may be a new face of evil already -- the new man in charge of al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, the same man believed to be behind the two murders of these two US soldiers." NBC (Boettcher) added, "

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 2, 2:05, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "US military officials tell NBC News the kidnapping and killing of the two American soldiers has all the earmarks of an al Qaeda operation." The "posting also claimed the two American soldiers were killed by al Qaeda's new leader in Iraq -- Abu Hamza al-Muhajir -- who experts believe was out to prove he's every bit as ruthless as his predecessor, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, killed in a US air strike two weeks ago."

NBC Nightly News (6/20, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On the floor of the US Senate today there was anger and revulsion over the killings of these two American soldiers."

CNN's The Situation Room (6/20, Blitzer) reported, "Military sources tell CNN a tip from Iraqi civilians lead them to the bodies in the Yusufiyah area south of Baghdad. They say the area was booby-trapped and the bodies were mutilated beyond recognition."

The Los Angeles Times (6/21, Moore, 958K) reports, "The investigation into the circumstances of their capture has been opened by Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, chief of day-to-day military operations in Iraq." The Mujahedeen Shura Council, "an al-Qaida-affiliated group posted a message Tuesday on a jihadist Internet site taking responsibility for the killings, but offered no proof of its involvement."

The Washington Post (6/21, A1, Finer, Partlow, 744K) reports Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell "declined to describe the condition of the soldiers' bodies, saying it would be 'inappropriate until I know what the families were told.'" He "said it was clear the soldiers had died of wounds suffered in captivity, rather than at the site of the attack on the checkpoint, but that the cause of death could not be immediately determined."

The Washington Times (6/21, Scarborough, 90K) and New York Times (6/21, Filkins, 1.19M) run similar reports. The New York Times (6/21, Alvarez, 1.19M) also reports a profile of the dead soldiers, headlined "Relatives Describe Young Men Determined To Serve Country." USA Today (6/21, Bazar, Loew, 2.31M), meanwhile, describes the soldiers' families as "devastated" by the news.

US Says Al Qaeda In Iraq Religious Leader Captured. The CBS Evening News (6/20, lead story, 3:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The US forces got one of al Qaeda's key people as well. Didn't they?" Cowan: "They did. It was actually the very same day that these two soldiers went missing. They say he was the leader, the religious leader of al Qaeda in Iraq. They say getting him in an air strike was yet another dent to this organization that they hope will stop or at least limit more attacks on US soldiers."

McCain Says Zarqawi's Elimination Hasn't Eliminated Threat. On the CBS Evening News (6/20, story 2, 1:20, Schieffer, 7.66M), Sen. John McCain said, "It's, again, the nature of the enemy. We saw this, of course, with Zarqawi and now obviously, we see this with his successor, which is why we should be extremely guarded in our optimism about the elimination of Zarqawi, because there are obviously people who are willing to take his place. This is still a long, tough slog in Iraq."

FBI Cracking Down On Phony War Heroes. In a front-page story, USA Today (6/21, Zoroya, 2.31M) reports, "The FBI is cracking down on phony war heroes, who often buy medals on the Internet and wear them at public events. This year, federal agents have launched a dozen investigations against people allegedly masquerading as decorated veterans. At that pace, the FBI would open about twice as many cases as it did last year." FBI Special Agent Thomas Cottone said, "These people, by wearing those medals, are literally stealing the valor and recognition of those who legitimately did the act. And this is absolutely disgraceful." USA notes, "The most recent conviction: Theodore Bantis…who pleaded guilty Tuesday to posing as a Marine Corps officer who had won the Navy Cross."

In a second story, USA Today (6/21, 3A, Zoroya, 2.31M) recounts the story of New Jersey resident Gerard Smigel, who pleaded guilty this month to impersonating a highly-decorated Marine Corps Lt. Colonel and "was sentenced to three years of probation and fined $3,000." USA adds, "Masquerading as a war hero has become riskier — but more tempting — during this time of war. 'Right now, most everybody loves the military, and that's why I'm seeing more and more of these impostors,' says…Cottone. The FBI has investigated 58 cases of people allegedly wearing fraudulent military decorations since 2001," and "the FBI could end up investigating more cases of medal fraud this year than in any other previous year, Cottone says."

DOJ:

Gonzales' Response To Question About Children's Music Downloading Noted. The "Reliable Source" column in the Washington Post (6/21, C03, Argetsinger, Roberts) quotes Attorney General Alberto Gonzales response to a reporter's question about whether his two children ever download music illegally: 'Of course not. I remind them: I AM the law!'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Greenberg Sues AIG Over Board Notes. The AP (6/21, Chase) reports, "The former CEO of American International Group Inc., Maurice 'Hank' Greenberg, filed a lawsuit Tuesday seeking records associated with the company's $1.6 billion settlement of allegations that it engaged in deceptive accounting practices." The AP continues, "Starr International Co., a private company led by Greenberg, alleges in the Chancery Court filing that AIG is violating Delaware law by refusing to allow representatives of Starr, which is AIG's largest shareholder, to inspect the company's books and records." The AP adds, "Starr is seeking minutes, notes, transcripts and any other records relating to AIG board and committee meetings dating from Feb. 9, 2005 to the present. … Starr alleges that AIG responded to a June 9 demand letter by offering only heavily redacted 'nonprivileged minutes' of board and audit committee meetings relating only to worker's compensation payments made in connection with the settlement announced Feb. 9 of this year. … In the settlement, AIG, one of the world's largest insurance companies, agreed to pay $1.64 billion to settle allegations by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer that the company used deceptive accounting practices to mislead investors and regulatory agencies. The Securities and Exchange Commission filed and settled allegations of accounting fraud with the company simultaneously. … The settlement did not cover Greenberg, who was named in the suit but vowed to fight it in court."

US Subpoenas Delta Petroleum in Options Probe. The AP (6/21) reports, "Delta Petroleum Corp., a natural gas and oil producer, said late Monday it has received a federal subpoena requesting records back to 1996 over its granting of stock options." The AP continues, "The company said it believes the request comes because it was identified May 16 in a 'third-party report' as being at-risk for having backdated stock options for executives. On May 22, the Denver company said its board had formed a special committee to review Delta's option granting practices and related accounting. … The subpoena is from the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York."
